THIS very interesting line of Railway will connect the county towns of Berkshire and Surrey (Reading and Guildford), and will extend from the latter across "the Garden of Surrey," to Reigate; at the same time communicating with four trunk lines—the Great Western, the South Western, the Brighton, and the South Eastern, Railways. To the pleasure tourist we scarcely know any line presenting so many picturesque attractions. Its route lies from Reading, on the Great Western line, across Berkshire, by Wokingham and Sandhurst; entering Surrey by Farnham; then crossing the South Western line, onward with a bend to Farnham; at the base of the Hog's Back, to Guildford; next by a branch to Godalming; and continuing at the foot of the celebrated range of chalk hills, past Dorking to Reigate. We have alluded to the picturesqueness of the Surrey portion, which will be new ground to many a tourist; though it is, perhaps, the most beautiful accessory of its class in England. Its landscapes present a rich succession of bits for the painter, in its picturesque uplands, woodland dells, verdant valleys, rocky hills, and undulating parks and heaths, all lying within the eye of the traveller along this new line.

The works were formally commenced yesterday week (the 20th inst.), in a field verging on Broome Park, the seat of Sir Benjamin Brodie, Bart., at Betchworth, or Leigh Beeches, about midway between Reigate and Dorking.

Among the company, who took part in the proceedings of the day, were Mr. D. Salomons, Chairman of the Reading, Guildford, and Reigate Railway Company; Mr. Mcgregor, Chairman; Mr. Pritchard, Vice-Chairman of the South Eastern Line; Earl Somers; Mr. W. J. Denison, M.P. for West Surrey; Mr. Alcock, M.P. for East Surrey; Mr. D. Mangles, M.P. for Guildford; Mr. D. Barclay, M.P. together with a host of Directors of the Line, and of the South-Eastern Company The principal rendezvous was the Reigate station, whence carriages were provided to the ground. At Reigate they formed in procession, and, headed by a band, marched three miles, by scenery delightful, through lanes such as Boddington and Creswick would delight to paint—by the primitive village of Buckland, to Broome Park, a portion of which Sir Benjamin Brodie has delightfully placed at the disposal of the Directors. The park gate was not the least interesting scene of the day; for, here were assembled a very numerous body of railway labourers, bearing several gay banners and flags, with appropriate devices thereon. As the company entered the Park, they were cheered most lustily by the workpeople

The arrangements within the Park were excellent. It is a charming estate, and in time long since was called "Tranquil Dale." To-day, it presented a gay and lively scene. A long marquee had been erected by the Railway Directors for the accommodation of their visitors; and the site could not have been more judiciously chosen, in command of a view through the luxuriant plantations. The company, in addition to the arrivals from Reigate, was very numerous; we recognised several of the leading gentry of the county, in their carriages, and on horseback. In about half an hour, a line of procession, with an excellent band of music, the banners and flags, was formed to the adjoining field, just on the lower slope of the Surrey hills. Here the company having ranged themselves into a circle,

Mr. D. Salomons addressed them, explaining that the intended line of railway was only 45 miles, but that its importance should be measured by the magnitude of the lines which it united; it being a cross line, connecting the south-eastern and southern parts of the kingdom with the south-west, the west, and the north of England, without the inconvenience of passing through London. The inhabitants of Bristol and the west of England, and of Oxford, and the midland counties, who wished to go from Dover to the Continent, or to visit Brighton, might now do so without going to London at all; while the fruit-growers of Kent and Surrey, would be able to send the produce of their orchards and gardens to the large cities of the west and north of England, without the delay and expense which had hitherto met them on arriving in the metropolis. The intended railway would also be a direct narrow-guage line from Reading and the places north and west of it to the most populous and commercial part of the metropolis, namely, London-bridge. Mr. Salomons then adverted to the origin of the new railway; and illustrated the advantage of railways being contracted by public companies instead of being Government undertakings. Had the existing lines of railway been laid out by Government engineers, they might have been here and there more direct between the large towns, and less expensive in their construction; but the public, he was satisfied, would not have enjoyed the same advantages of celerity, comfort, and facility of communication, which were secured to them by the present system of frequent trains, conveying all classes of passengers at the same rapid rate (Hear, hear) The worthy Chairman then, in proof of the benefits conferred by the new Railway on its locality, stated that already a large tract of land in the neighbourhood of Reigate was being built upon, and a considerable addition of population would, no doubt, be tempted to place itself in a place so beautiful. (Hear.) Indeed, if the sanguine views of the building projectors were to be realised, who could tell, whether, even in the lifetime of those whom he had the honour of addressing, there would not be found around the Reigate Station a population large enough to claim from Parliament the privilege of representation which was lost by its neighbour Gatton, which borough, for want of a population, had been placed in Schedule A.? (Cheers.) Mr. Salomons concluded his eloquent address by stating that the line was expected to be opened in about eighteen months; and by expressing the obligations of the Directory and Proprietary of this line to the South-Eastern Company, without whose aid it would never have been made, and whose property it would ultimately become.

The Assistant-Engineer of the Reading, Guildford, and Reigate Company then presented Mr. Salomons with a handsome silver spade, beside which stood a wheelbarrow, of solid mahogany, and elegant design, emblazoned with the arms of Mr. Salomons: the spade and barrow were manufactured for the occasion, by Messrs. Winter and Rush, of Bankside. The spade has a polished mahogany handle, the upper part of which is relieved with chased silver, encircling the arms of the Chairman, richly engraved. The worthy Chairman then stuck the spade into the soil, and partially filled the barrow with earth, amid the cheers of the assembly.

The Chairman of the South-Eastern Company was next called upon to assist in the work, when, in his energy, he upset the barrow; but, eventually, it was wheeled along the plank, and the work finished more legitimately. Hearty cheers were then given for the success of the new Railway, and the company returned to Broome Park, to partake of a well-appointed dénûner, laid out in the marquee by Mr. Relf, of the White Hart Inn, Reigate.

About 250 guests, among whom were a great number of elegantly-dressed ladies, sat down to the repast, abundantly furnished with iced wines, of excellent quality. Mr. D. Salomons filled the chair, and was supported by Earl Somers, Mr. Denison, M.P., Mr. Alcock, M.P., Mr. Mangles, M.P., Mr. D. Barclay, M.P., Mr. Macgregor, &c. After the customary loyal toasts, the company were addressed by each of the above gentlemen, upon the advantages of the new Railway; and after several other toasts, including the healths of Mr. Salomons, and of Sir Benjamin Brodie, at about six o'clock, the guests retired, highly gratified with the day's proceedings. During the repast, the band played several airs in admirable style; that of "The Fine Old English Gentleman," played after the health of Mr. Denison, who has sat in Parliament for the county nearly thirty years, was loudly applauded. Nor, in the festivities, were the railway labourers forgotten, but regaled to their heart's content, in the Park.

To Mr. T. H. Bayly, the indefatigable Secretary to the new line, special acknowledgment is due for the judicious arrangements of the day, among which the transit of the visitors to and from Broome, called forth unceasing courtesy.

Our Artist has represented the scene in the field the commencement of the Railway; showing in the distance, the bold outline of the Surrey hills, here crowned with a single clump of trees; a short distance onward in the same line, is Brockham Hill, thickly clothed with plantations; and the far-famed Box-hill, with its magnificent steep of evergreen. In the contrary direction, towards Merstham, was dug much of the stone used for rebuilding Windsor Castle, in the reign of Edward III; and there is preserved a patent of that date, ordering the Sheriff to apprehend such men as should refuse to work, and send them prisoners to Windsor: an abuse of feudal times altogether anomalous with the spirit of our railway enterprise.

OCCUPATION OF FERRARA BY THE AUSTRIANS.

INTELLIGENCE has been received, through the Corriere Livornese, of the occupation of Ferrara by the Austrian forces. On the 15th inst. the troops took possession of the posts of the Grand Guard, and four city gates; the Cardinal Legate protesting loudly against this new act of hostility; or, as one authority states, requesting time for deliberation, &c. The post of the Castle remained in the hands of the Pontifical Volunteers, and those of the Prisons in the hands of the National Guard.

At eleven o'clock in the morning, two Austrian battalions, one of chasseurs, and the other of Hungarians, on the left, and a body of hussars on horseback, drew up on the esplanade of the walls which is situate in front of the Austrian fortress. On the right were stationed three pieces of field artillery and the band; at each piece of artillery were posted the gunners on horseback with lighted matches. The guns of the fortress were also pointed towards the city, and the gunners stood prepared to fire them. The troops were made to take an oath. The Major of the chasseurs, with an Adjutant and a Decree, proceeded to the residence of the Cardinal Legate, to communicate to him the despatch of their General, who, in the most insolent manner, and with new and increased powers, demanded that the posts of the Grand Guard in the Place Publique, and those of the city gates, should be given up to him. The Legate protested against this demand, and immediately despatched a courier to Rome.

Advices from Bologna of the 16th inst. state that matters continued in statu quo, but that 20,000 Austrians were concentrated on the banks of the Po, ready to cross that river at a moment's notice. The municipal councillors of Bologna voted, on the 16th, an address to Cardinal Amati, in which they protested against the occupation of Ferrara, and declared that they were prepared to defend, with their lives and property, the independence of the dominions of the Church.

BRETT AND LITTLE'S ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH CONVERSER.

THE invention of the Electric Telegraph, almost contemporaneously with the Railway, is one of the most striking facts in the history of modern science. It would appear almost as if ordained to complete the efficiency of that vast system of communication which, Briareus-like, is stretching its thousand arms over the whole civilised world. Thus far the importance of the Electric Telegraph as part and parcel of the Railway System; besides which, its agency promises to be extended to the transmission of "the workings of human thought and human will," and thus to become an every-day medium of intercourse.

Hence, the perfecting of the Electric Telegraph is an object of paramount importance; and every advance to it becomes extremely interesting. Messrs Brett and Little have just made several successful moves in this direction, in their "Patent Electric Telegraph Converser," now to be seen at their chambers, in Furnival's Inn. The inventors claim ten improvements; but, as it would occupy considerable space to detail all these, we shall describe only the most striking.

First, is an improved means of generating and economising a more constant and powerful electric current. This increased power is obtained by their "Hydraulic Battery," in which the acid to the sand, or other retainer of moisture, is supplied from above, drop by drop, and escapes from below, drop by drop, so as thereby to keep up continuously a percolation through the sand, carry off the sulphate of zinc, and prevent its becoming crystalised on the plate, and thus diminishing the force of the battery. The apparatus, as our illustration shows, consists of three troughs, placed one above another. The highest is a reservoir of the exciting power, diluted sulphuric acid, in the trough beneath is the galvanic battery, containing the copper and zinc plates, divided by cells or compartments of fine sand, and the lowest trough receives the vitiated liquid from the battery. In each case the transmission is through small perforated cones. By this means, the sand which surrounds the metallic plates is kept saturated; and as a constant supply of acid is kept up from above, and the vitiated fluid as constantly escapes below, the formation of crystals is prevented by this self-relieuing process, and the whole surface of the plates is exposed to the action of the acid

THE HYDRAULIC BATTERY.

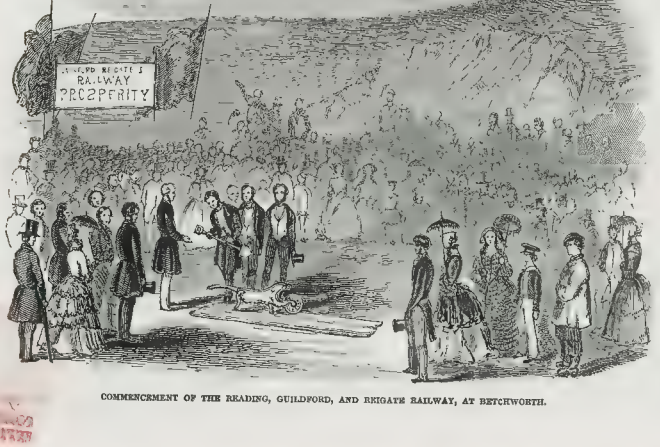
The next improvement is a new alphabet, and the altered face of the dial. The indications hitherto employed, have been generally magnetic, and their incessant vibration through electrical and other disturbing atmospheric causes, has caused much uncertainty and inconvenience. For these Messrs. Brett and Little have substituted indicators which are not magnetized, and show no vibration whatever. These indicators are worked by a single handle, instead of two. The improved dial-plate has two vertical columns containing numerals from 1 to 26. The centre of the plate is retained for the symbolic arrangement of letters and figures, by which the whole of the letters of the alphabet can be designated. When the indicators are in a state of rest, they are in an angular position; but when put in action they move to a position nearly vertical, but are prevented from passing the vertical line by a pendant bar. In transmitting a signal or signals, the letters of the alphabet are designated by single or repeated motions of either of two indicators (right and left hand), or of both in conjunction. Thus, the letter A, which is placed opposite to fig. 1, is indicated by one motion of one left-hand indicator; the letter B, which comes opposite to fig. 2 by two motions of the same indicator; the letter E by four motions, two left and two right; and so on.

Among the other improvements, are an apparatus for conducting the atmospheric electricity to the earth; the more perfect insulation of the long circuit wires; a partially magnetized ring, in combination with a reel or coil of wire whereby the electric current so acts that the motions take place in a direction transverse to the axis of the coil, and parallel, or nearly so, to the planes in which the coil of wire lies. There is, likewise, an "accident bell," &c.

Another important improvement is a deflector, in combination with an earth-plate to each instrument, for diverting the electric current, and insulating the instruments, so as to allow them in two or more stations in a long line to communicate with each other, independently of the other stations.

The patentees show, in one room, seventeen of their instruments, representing as many stations; and the electric current which agitates the indicators in each instrument, traverses a coil of wire, equal to 1000 miles in length!

The series of improvements is an extremely interesting exhibition not only to the man of science, but to every one anxious to comprehend the working of the Electric Telegraph.



COMMENCEMENT OF THE READING, GUILDFORD, AND REIGATE RAILWAY, AT BETCHWORTH.

HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO SCOTLAND.

SCENE AT THE BROMILAW, GLASGOW.

In our late edition of last week, we chronicled the Royal Progress to the close of Wednesday; but, too briefly in proportion to the interest of the day.

The anchoring of the Royal Squadron in Rothesay Bay, on Tuesday night, was one of the most imposing sights since the entrance of the Royal party into the Clyde. The picturesque Bay was splendidly illuminated; a large bonfire blazed for a length of time; fireworks were sent up at Rothesay, and from the steamers Admiral and Viceroy; and the whole scene was a "hearty Highland welcome."

The main event of Tuesday was the Royal Visit to Dumbarton Castle, described in our Journal of last week; which we were not then enabled to illustrate, but have now engraved.

WEDNESDAY.

To-day, the Squadron started from Rothesay at eight o'clock, and, passing through the Kyles of Bute round Lamont Point and up Loch Fine, entered Loch Gilp. The scenery of the Kyles is soft and beautiful, the land rising gently from the water's edge, clothed with brushwood, and the distant landscape closed in by fine ranges of green hills. The principal objects are Kalmes Castle and the Tower near it, the ancient seat of the Bannatynes; Arduu with its tumuli, supposed to have been erected over some roving Norwegians slain in battle; the Burnt Isles, with their vitrified forts; and the island of Ellen Greig, where, in 1685, Archibald, Earl of Argyle, had his military stores taken from him by a naval force in the service of King James.

The Royal Visit to Inverary Castle was the great event of Wednesday. The preparations were in magnificent style. A battery of field-pieces was mounted near it were pitched ten handsome marquees, the quarters of the clan Campbell; and in their centre, a booth externally covered with tartans. At the pier, a tastefully-canopied walk was erected, of about 160 yards in length. It was constructed of pillars, festooned with evergreens and flowers, supporting a roof of white cloth fringed with blue, the floor of which was covered with scarlet cloth. From this covered gallery to the entrance to the Duke of Argyle's grounds, trees were planted on the side of the street next to the Loch, giving it somewhat the appearance of an avenue. A magnificent triumphal arch, gracefully festooned with flowers and evergreens, and two galleries were also erected; the galleries being for the accommodation of the public. The Loch, with its tiny fleet of fishing craft, neatly and newly painted alike, and bearing each a little pink ensign, with the Marquis of Stafford's pleasure yacht, fluttering with flags off the quay, presented a very animated appearance. From the quay to the Duke's Gate, the Islay clansmen formed a living avenue, clad in their dark tartans, with broad red facings, and all the Highland accoutrements, including the formidable Lochabar axe. A body of the Duke's men, clad entirely in their own tartans, without the red facings, also kept a portion of the ground. The Highland Guard, including the Celtic Gentlemen, the clansmen of Islay, and the tenantry of the Duke of Argyle, mustered from 300 to 500 strong. The Duke of Argyle, in his Highland costume, as Mac-Callum-More, with Campbell, of Islay, directed the placing of the Celtic Guard of Honour. Here, too, were Lord Blantyre, and the young Marquis of Stafford, and his crew.

A gun from the Castle gave token of the Fairy being in sight, and she rounded Stone Point at twelve o'clock, and moored inside the Shearwater; closely followed by the Garland, amidst the cannonade from the Castle. The bands played "God Save the Queen." Her Majesty was then rowed ashore, and, leaning on the arm of the Duke of Argyle, and followed by Prince Albert, with the Duchess of Norfolk; the Duchess of Sutherland, the Duchess of Argyle, Lady Blantyre, Lady C. Leveson Gower, the Prince of Saxe Leiningen, the Duke of Norfolk, Earl Grey, the Marquis of Stafford, Lord Blantyre, Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, &c., walked along the arcade, the Celts giving the salute, the company making their obeisance, and the people loudly cheering. The Queen was evidently highly gratified with her reception; her Majesty wore a blue and white striped silk dress, broadly fringed; a black damask silk visite, with a deep flounce, bracelets, and primrose gloves; white chip bonnet, trimmed with straw-coloured crape, and white marabout feathers, with dark green velvet flowers inside; and she carried a green parasol.

The Royal Party having taken their seats in the carriages, addresses were presented from the county, and from Inverary; as well as the freedom of the burgh, in a massive chased silver box, through Earl Grey, to Prince Albert. After a drive through the grounds of the Castle, the Royal Party alighted at the principal entrance; and the Queen, in ascending the steps, recognised the little Marquis of Lorne, a graceful child, about three years old, in Highland costume; when her Majesty stooped down, and took the little fellow by the hand and lifted him up, and kissed him. By command of the Queen, a carriage was then sent for the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal, and shortly drew up at the Castle gate, amidst loud plaudits. The Prince of Wales was very plainly, but neatly dressed in nursery costume, as if the sending for him had not been premeditated. He lifted his little cap to the assemblage in acknowledgment of their cheers, but looked soft and delicate. The Princess Royal wore a pea-green silk Polka, a purple or brown dress trimmed with fringe, and a straw bonnet.

At two o'clock, luncheon was served within the Castle, to the Royal Party; and, on retiring to the drawing-room, several presentations took place. At three o'clock, the Queen, guarded and escorted by the Celts and Highlanders, re-embarked; and the Fairy, followed by the Garland, steamed down the Loch, and stood away for Ardrishaig, which they reached at half-past four o'clock. The Royal yacht, the Undine, and other vessels of the fleet, had been previously sent round the mull of Cantyre, and came into Loch Crinan at nearly the same hour when the Fairy came up to Ardrishaig. At the latter place, the Queen was received by the authorities of the neighbourhood, Sir John Orde, of Kilmorey, and some other gentlemen. The concourse of people at the secluded village which the Queen had now reached was immense. From the quay, the Queen and suite were accommodated in the carriages of some of the county gentlemen, to a road specially constructed for the occasion, upward to the canal bank, where the Royal barge was in waiting. The centre of the quay and the middle of the new road were carpeted. At the canal bank, the Queen and her party passed under a tasteful arch of flowers, topped by the national heather, a nicely-formed crown, and V. R. in flowers. At the canal bank, the Queen was received by Messrs. George and James Burns, of Glasgow; and the former gentleman had the honour of escorting her Majesty to the Canal Barge, fitted up as we engraved it last week. The Queen and her suite then embarked in the Barge; they were greatly pleased with this part of the journey, and with the excellent arrangements made for them by the Steam Packet and Canal Companies.

A great concourse of people were assembled at Crinan, where the canal falls into the Loch, in order to witness the landing from the barge, and the embarkation on the Royal yacht, which was lying on the calm water of the land-locked Loch Crinan. The crags around the landing place are very romantic; and, the situation is altogether unique in its features. At half-past seven o'clock, the barge appeared: on landing, the Queen and her party had to walk some distance to the quay, where two barges were waiting to convey the Royal Party to the yacht. They were received by Mr. Sheriff Bruce, of Argyleshire, and several other gentlemen; the pathway lay between rows of heath, covered with the tartan of Mr. Malcolm, of Poltallach; and it was spanned by an arch of flowers, inscribed with "Teamh Dia a Bhan Righ."

As the barge was rowed to the yacht, the sun was setting behind the hill of Jura, and thus allowed the Royal Party to see one of those magnificent colourings of the landscape which last but only for a few minutes, when his beams are falling almost level on the still waters of a land-locked western loch. After sunset, the fleet of steamers anchored in Crinan.

During the evening, fires were lighted on the hills around the Loch, and on

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 28, 1847.

SOME time before the close of last Session the proposed change in our system of secondary punishments was under discussion. Sir James Graham took the opportunity of stating some facts respecting the amount of crime in England anything but satisfactory or consoling to those who advocate the mild and reformatory penal systems against the harsher code transmitted us by our forefathers, who never dreamed of changing men, but took everything as they found it. The late Home Secretary stated distinctly that the crimes formerly punished with death have greatly increased since the penalty was abolished; and that, from the reluctance of Juries to convict in those cases where the last punishment still applies, was holding out a facility of escape to criminals, of which the Gentlemen showed they were taking advantage. We should despair of any improvement in this direction if we thought Sir James Graham's deductions perfectly just and sound. We believe that the number of prosecutions and convictions have, in certain classes of crimes, increased; but, may not the increase be caused by the greater readiness of parties to prosecute? The inquiry ought to be, not whether more criminals are punished, but whether more crimes are really committed. When forgery was punished with death it is well known that some banks and many mercantile firms submitted to losses rather than pursue a fellow-creature to death. But when the crime was placed in the second class of punishment, there was no reluctance to prosecute; the number of convictions greatly increased, and many sticklers for the old system pointed to the fact, as a proof of the danger of relaxing the grasp of the Law. Yet no one could be now found to declare that property is less safe than formerly from this offence. The same principle might, probably, be traced in the legislation on other crimes. But, from the Assize Intelligence, it is evident we are being compelled to fall back on harsher practice. In some cases we are even reverting to the old system of Corporal Punishments. While we are gradually abolishing the use of the lash in the army, we are restoring it in our prisons. Two recent Acts have revived it. One gives Magistrates a power of ordering a whipping to juvenile thieves, to whom transportation or even a long term of imprisonment, would be ruin; the other leaves it to the discretion of the Judge to punish a person convicted of sending threatening letters, by transportation, or a long term of imprisonment, with "public whipping." A boy was sentenced at the late Session at the Old Bailey to the latter punishment. We have no wish to extenuate the prisoner's offence, which is a dangerous one; but "public whipping," in the old mode of inflicting it, has long been disused. How is the punishment now to be carried out? We cannot think a revival of the demoralising scenes of the "cart's tail" are to be re-enacted in the streets of the Metropolis, though the public mind accepts of the term. Some explanation ought to be given on the matter. Is a flogging within the walls of the prison to be considered "public," or is the sentence to be literally carried out, more majorum? It may or may not be advisable to return to corporal punishment, if all others have been found ineffectual; but as to inflicting it publicly, we trust the Secretary of State will prevent it; we are confident it will have bad consequences. We cannot perceive this tendency to retrograde towards old barbarities without uneasiness, and feel bound to notice it. In another Session or two a revival of the pillory may be anticipated.

RAILWAY Meetings, the Funds, and failures in the Corn Trade, have furnished the home topics of conversation during the week. One of these failures was more remarkable for this reason—the Governor of the Bank of England was a partner in the firm. It has been stated that, of the nine last Governors of this centre of wealth, no less than six have been embarrassed or insolvent! The fact would denote singular ill luck, or great incapacity in conducting their private affairs; and if the state of things was known in each case, to ordinary men it would not have held out much promise of their proving fortunate and able Governors of a great corporate body. It is evident that their position at the Bank did not get them out of their difficulties; so that we may presume no improper use was made of their power. But the fact does not look well in a great commercial community; and the policy of alt ring the constitution of the Bank in this particular has been discussed. It is believed by many that the Governor of the Bank of England should not be engaged in private mercantile business, always liable to risks and fluctuations; and two years is too short a term of office. The Governor of the Bank of France is appointed by the Crown, and for life; and he is invested with extensive powers.

THE current number of the United Service Magazine contains a statement respecting Regimental Messes, which will interest many of our military readers, whom our more bulky contemporary may not reach. We have heard many complaints of the expences a commissioned officer is put to, and we know that many regiments are virtually closed to any but a wealthy man; the pay is utterly inadequate to meet the outlay required of him. Something of the splendour of the following description may be laid to the account of peace and permanent quarters, for we fancy the "shine" would be considerably taken out of it in active service.

"The cankers of a calm world and long peace" have done material injury to mess society. Regimental messes were originally formed to give the officers a respectable dining-place, and cheap; the furniture and utensils were all of the plainest and most substantial kind, suited to the consumption of spoon and solid meat, with plain table glass, just enough for the party and any guest or two that might add to the number. What a change! The table covered with the finest damask linen, cut glass, plated dish covers, and lighted by splendid candelabra, filled with wax lights; the sideboard groans; and well it may, for it is in general richly with the weight of pondrous chased silver, much of which is of no use—all this to gratify the vanity of some commanding officer, or to please the fancy of moneled dandies who come into the army to pass a few years, and like to have guests at the mess by way of "astonishing the natives." All this is very fine, but it is at variance with the principle of making the mess economical to suit the tastes or means of the provident or the poor.

Here is another part of the question:—

You can dine cheaper at a London club than at any mess in the army. Why is this? Not, surely, from the annual subscription. To keep up the mess every subaltern in the army contributes more than the subscription of the clubbist, and he is obliged to pay for his daily dinner whether he eats or not. The man of the club pays not when he eats not, and has further privilege in the way of feeding; if he wishes to go to the theatre, or has an engagement for the whole evening, he can have, before four o'clock, as much cold meat, bread, and beer as he pleases for sixpence; if economy be his object, he can dine there most frugally. Now, the officer has no advantage of this kind: if he goes to the mess to eat luncheon, he pays more for it than at the club, and is also obliged to pay for his dinner, although he may be twenty miles off.

Of Regimental Messes generally, the writer says:—

Their value has been altogether overrated; they might be dispensed with, and no loss occur to any one. There is a set of patent phrases about messes "the honour of the service," "the respectability of the corps," "the comfort of the officers," &c. In the French service they know nothing about regimental messes, an 99 out of 100 of the officers live on their pay, yet they are pretty good in their way, as we have found out and then to our cost. The Foot Guards have no mess; yet, are they less respected than their neighbours? Nonsense!

In France, we may observe a commissioned officer by no means takes so high a social status as that exacted from him in England; the standard of manners and usages is different. In a French garrison town, the table d'hôte, where he is cheaply served, and mixes with the tradesmen and civilians of the place, is the resort of the unmarried officer. A French Captain of the Line will smoke a short pipe over his game of dominoes and demi-tasse, in the ordinary café in the evening we have seen it done. An English officer of the same rank would lose caste if he descended to a similar level here. Perhaps, we err a little on the side of too much luxury and splendour.

THE WEATHER.

The weather during the past week, on the whole, has been fine. The sky has been mostly cloudy The average temperature has been about that of the season. The following are some particulars of each day —

Friday, the sky was covered by cloud till four P.M., and nearly cloudless after this time; the direction of the wind was N., but during the greater part of the day, the air was in a calm state; the average temperature of the day was 53½°. Saturday, the sky was cloudless during the whole day, with the exception of a few cumuli and cirri scattered about the sky during the afternoon; during by far the greater part of the day, the air was calm; it blew with gentle motion, from the S.S.W.; the average temperature of the day was 60½°. Sunday, the sky was covered by cloud throughout the day, except towards the evening, when a few breaks in the clouds took place; during the morning, rain in small quantities fell at different times. The direction of the wind was S.W.; the average temperature of the day was 59½°. Monday, the sky was nearly covered by cloud throughout the day—a few light showers of rain fell in the afternoon; the direction of the wind was from the N., and it blew strongly from that quarter particularly during the afternoon. The day was cold; its average temperature was 56°. Tuesday the sky was, for the most part, overcast during the day; the directions of the wind were N. and N.N E. The day was cold: its average temperature was 56°. Wednesday the sky was overcast early in the morning, but during the remainder of the day it was for the most part clear, a few cumuli and cirri being prevalent. The direction of the wind was N.E. chiefly. The average temperature of the day was 62½°. Thursday, the sky was covered by cirrostratus cloud till 10h. A.M.; and after this time it was partially free from cloud; that which prevailed was ill-formed cumuli. The direction of the wind was N.N.E., but light. The average temperature of the day was 64½°, and that of the week was 60½°.

The extreme thermometrical readings of each day were:—

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE BRITISH MUSEUM.—On Tuesday evening the trustees obtained possession of all the houses required in Great Russell-street for the erection of the east wing of the Museum, including the extensive buildings belonging to the Carlisle, Medical, and General Life Assurance Company, clearing the ground entirely to Montague-street, Russel-square.

PROPOSED RAILWAY TERMINUS AT THE WEST-END.—On Wednesday evening a meeting of civil engineers, surveyors, and others connected with the railway interest, met at the King's Arms Tavern, Bridge-street, Blackfriars, to consider the expediency of establishing a Railway club. Mr. Valentine, C.E., was called to the chair, and explained that the growing extent of railway enterprise, and the immense increase in the number of the body, not only in the country but resident in London, rendered such an institution desirable and necessary. Resolutions for carrying out the objects of the meeting were proposed and carried unanimously by Messrs. E. W. Gooch, Warren, Jesson, Gram, and other engineers, and the meeting was adjourned for a month

ROYAL FREE HOSPITAL, GRAY'S INN-LANE.—On Wednesday the usual meeting of the governors of this charity was held at the offices of the institution. The report stated that the committee had to regret that the want of funds daily compelled them to refuse admission to many most urgent and distressing cases. The building is adequate to accommodate 300 beds

NEW STREET NEAR WESTMINSTER ABBEY.—Workmen are now employed in pulling down the old houses opposite to the west front of Westminster Abbey, in order that the proposed new street from that point may be proceeded with without delay

THE BIRTHS AND DEATHS IN THE METROPOLIS.—The number of births during the week ending Aug 21, was 1233, of which 628 were males, and 595 females. This number is less than that of the previous week by 9. The number of deaths was 1057, of which 520 were males, and 537 females. This number exceeds the weekly average for the last five summers by 117, is less than the number of the preceding week by 51, and is less than the number of births by 156. A man, who had been a pauper at St. Marylebone, is reported to have died at the advanced age of 102 years.

COUNTRY NEWS.

THE HARVEST.

Our Agricultural Reporter has just returned from a rapid ride through some of the northern and midland counties, where he has been making a glance survey of the crops; and from his report we select the following remarks:—

"Through the greater part of Lancashire, from the southern side to the northeastern, the crops (for that district) are fair average ones—all 'white unto harvest'—and a great portion of them cleared (secured) by this time. Before the end of this month it will be want of hands, prudence, or weather, if it is not all housed

"From the western part of Yorkshire down to the German Ocean, to the north of Hull, the crops of wheat are redundant, in beautiful condition, and ere this, notwithstanding the earliness of the season, are more than half secured.

"From the southern borders of Yorkshire, through Derbyshire, Nottinghamshire, Leicester shire, Bedfordshire, Buckinghamshire, and Hertfordshire, the same pleasing appearance exists, only that as you progress south the harvest is more advanced; in fact, in the five last counties, nearly the whole of the wheat is housed.

"The dread of scarcity now is only a bugbear used by monopolists and interested parties. Wheat through the country will be more than an average crop, and of good quality and condition; barley excellent, and a fair crop; oats not so great in quantity; and beans deficient. So that if Providence favour us with ten days' more fine weather, the reckless speculator will suffer, the fair trader will be advantaged, and the poor of the land will rejoice."

The accounts of the harvest, generally, are also favourable in the extreme. It is in many places nearly concluded, and the yield is good and abundant.

THE AMBERGATE, NOTTINGHAM, AND BOSTON, AND EASTERN JUNCTION RAILWAY.

On Tuesday the usual half-yearly meeting of the above line of railway was held in the Exchange Hall, Nottingham.

The Chairman, Mr. W. F. N. Norton, at some length entered into explanations required by the shareholders. Sir James Duke, M.P. for Boston, and Messrs. Plant, Bradley, Hawkins, and Robertson, much entre from the directory, and would be replaced by gentlemen representing a large proportion of the capital of the Company. He (the Chairman) was glad to say that the differences which had unhappily existed for some time between the Directors and a portion of shareholders had been adjusted. They had not yet made a call upon the proprietary, nor should they make one at present; they should put it off to as long a period as possible. (Applause.) The Chairman called on the Secretary (Mr. John Gough), who read the report of the Directors, and also that of the Engineers.

The chairman of accounts appeared to the accounts, and the total receipts to have been £215,271, and the expenditure £101,038, showing a balance in hand of £.98,233

The Chairman moved and Mr. Bishop seconded the adoption of the report.

Mr Gee censured the conduct of some of the shareholders, but his remarks appeared to excite but little sympathy. He went on to remark that the termini of the railway were not at the ends of their names, but at the western and eastern seaports (cheers)—and the scheme ought to be carried out to the fullest by the Directors. The next great fault alleged was, that the Directors were all local; but that he thought was an advantage rather than a fault. He thought the charges so little justified by realities, that the parties who had acted upon them ought to be ashamed of their conduct. Why, he had met one of those who blamed the Directors for buying canals at Bingham, and trying to purchase the Grantham canal for another railway. (Mr Ingram was understood to dissent from this statement.) Well, he went to make an offer for it

Mr Ingram said, if he did not go to Bingham to arrange matters he did not go to disarrange them. (Cheers) He thought all differences were settled; but if necessary he was quite ready to go into all the grievance of which they had complained.

After some further conversation, Mr. Wilkinson, as one of the Committee, said he would agree to a full explanation being made, but he thought it unnecessary. With regard to the new Directors proposed to be appointed, he begged to remind gentlemen that there were 400 shareholders in the county of Middlesex, 500 in Yorkshire, 300 in Lancashire, while in the county of Nottingham there were but 150. (Laughter.) And it was not unreasonable that great men at a distance should have a voice in the management, when they were the parties who found the money; and particularly when they remembered what had been the state of the money market for the last twelve months.

After long delay, and the expression of some difference of opinion, the Secretary read a number of minutes of interviews that had taken place between the Committee of Shareholders and the Directors, from which it appeared, that, at the suggestion of the former, the latter had agreed to increase the number of Directors from thirteen to sixteen, seven to be elected by the shareholders, four by retire at the present meeting, and the other three to be elected at the special meeting. The other principal condition stipulated was, that, whenever a Committee of Shareholders shall wait on the Directors, the latter shall give them every explanation required of any matter affecting the interest of the Company.

Mr. Gee moved, and Mr. Cartwright seconded, an amendment upon the report, to the effect that the number of Directors be limited to thirteen, as heretofore, principally on the ground that an increased Directory would cause an increased expenditure.

The amendment was put, when 38 gentlemen voted for, and 47 against it, leaving the future number of Directors to be sixteen. The report was then carried unanimously.

Messrs Benjamin Badger (London), William Durham (Manchester), Herbert Ingram (London), and Richard Septimus Wilkinson (London), were elected Directors

Mr. Francis Sames Alliott was re-elected Auditor to the Company.

THE CHARTISTS IN LANCASHIRE.

A meeting of Chartists, to the number of nearly 10,000, took place at Newton Common, on Sunday. The object was to address the operatives in the manufacturing districts of Manchester. Bolton, Rochdale, Bury, Preston, Liverpool, Wigan, &c., on the land and labour questions.

Shortly after one o'clock, Mr. Feargus O'Connor, M.P., accompanied by Mr. W. H. Ashton, the miners' advocate, from Manchester, appeared on their way to the platform. Both these gentlemen were received amidst the loudest demonstrations of applause.

Mr. Stallwood having been duly proposed and seconded, assumed the office of chairman He addressed the meeting at much length on the progress and prospects of Chartism, and encouraged the vast multitude then before him to take courage from the past, and work with determination and zeal for effecting the great cause of the people's charter.

A resolution, proposing that a committee, or a conference of delegates, should go to London, to escort Mr. O'Connor into Parliament on its opening, was agreed to.

Mr. O'Connor then came forward, and spoke at great length. He reviewed the great progress of Chartism, abused the Whigs, and browbeat the press. He next narrated the plans he had adopted, and was adopting, for the benefit of all who become Chartists. He anticipated great results from his scheme of labour palaces —denied the propriety of being placed in the election returns as a feather in the quill of Whiggery—was an earnest advocate for the amelioration of Ireland, and still willing and determined to agitate for their cause; he would go to Parliament, and record his fresh motion for "The People's Charter, and No Surrender."

The meeting was conducted in a very orderly manner.

QUEEN'S COLLEGE, BIRMINGHAM.—On Wednesday the annual meeting was held in the theatre of the College, in connexion with the institution, at Birmingham, for the purpose of receiving the report. The annual report of the Council was read by Dr. W. S. Cox, the Dean of the Faculty. It set forth that a spirit of zeal and application had pervaded the students, and, in proof of this, referred to the matriculation list of the University of London, where four students had presented themselves in July last, and had all passed. In a subsequent part of the report, it was stated, "That a supplemental charter of incorporation had been obtained, whereby the connexion of the Queen's College with the Queen's Hospital, and to give encouragement to such pupils as manif stdiligence and acquirements in their respective studies, the council have received, under the charter, the power to elect such as may hold a diploma in medicine or surgery, or are graduates in medicine, law, or arts, to the honourable distinction of "fellows," with such powers and privileges as may be determined upon from time to time." In moving the adoption of the report, the hon. and rev Grantham York, congratulated the meeting on the encouraging character of its tone; and expressed his satisfaction that the principles of the institution had been so ably vindicated by Lord Lyttelton in his letter to Sir Charles Shakspeare, just published. After paying a compliment to the officers and the council, he declared it to be his opinion that this institution would be found to be one of the most important elements to the education of medical men to be found in the kingdom. Mr. Newdegate, M.P., seconded the motion for the adoption of the report, with the remark that it was satisfactory to find such an institution distinguishing itself by the excellence of its principles. The report was adopted.

SHAKSPEARE'S HOUSE.—A preliminary meeting, convened by the mayor, was held at Birmingham, on Monday, for the purpose of promoting subscriptions for the purchase of the memorial house of the immortal bard. Numerous persons in the town and neighbourhood were present. They formed themselves into a committee for this object; and it is understood that a public meeting of the inhabitants will be called on an early day.

EXECUTION AT CARLISLE.—On Saturday last John Thompson, who at the last assizes at Carlisle was tried and found guilty of poisoning his wife, Mary, with whom he lived at Carlisle, underwent the extreme penalty of the law. It being market day, the city was immensely crowded. The chaplain having read a part of the burial service, &c., in which the culprit seemed most fervently to join, the executioner proceeded to fasten the fatal cord round the neck over the bolts were drawn, the drop fell, and, after a struggle of about twenty-two seconds' duration, death put an end to the existence of the unfortunate individual. His body having hung for upper time, it was cut down, and buried within the precincts of the prison.

SINGULAR CAUSE OF DEATH.—As two men were engaged in fishing in the Mill Pond, at Sudbrook, near Chichester, last week, about twelve o'clock, one of them was suffocated by a small fish leaping into his throat, and there becoming fixed. No proper assistance being at hand, his partner could not extricate the fish from its position, and in five minutes the poor fellow was a corpse. He has left a wife and three children. He was supposed to be engaged in pulling the fish by his teeth from the meshes of the net in which it was fixed, when the fish slipped into his mouth and throat.

POSTSCRIPT.

FRIGHTFUL EXPLOSION ON BOARD THE "CRICKET" STEAM-BOAT.

A frightful accident occurred yesterday (Friday) morning on board the Cricket steamer, one of the boats for some time past running between the City and the West-end at the fare of one halfpenny.

The Cricket had already made two passages between the Adelphi Pier and London Bridge, and was lying off the former landing place at the moment the accident occurred—half-past nine o'clock.

It appears that the vessel was about to leave the pier for London-bridge, having on board somewhere about two hundred passengers, all quietly seated, when, without the least previous intimation to those on deck, a sudden report was heard, followed by an instantaneous explosion. Immediately the vessel, which had to that moment been almost filled with persons, was nearly cleared—some of the passengers being actually blown up into the air, falling into the water—others had jumped over the sides, and were struggling in the water for their lives—the greater part, but a few, awe-stricken and dumbfounded, remained in the uninjured part of the boat. About forty persons were seen at one time floating in the water, which fortunately happened to be at low tide—some of whom, it is to be feared, sank before assistance could be rendered them, although every exertion was made for their rescue that the instantaneous nature of the accident rendered possible.

The boiler were tubular, and differ but little from the kind of boiler now obtaining such general use, excepting that the pressure of the steam must necessarily be much higher than among the ordinary condensing, or low pressure engines.

The Cricket, it appears, at the time of the accident, was aground, and, the inclination of the shore being considerable, she was listed off towards the river. During the attempt to get her off the explosion occurred, and it will therefore probably be found, if the exact cause ever be discovered, that the water must have been off the flues or tubes, owing to the inclination of the vessel; and possibly, that the same force that was used to get her off the ground may have been the occasion of the pressure of steam being temporarily increased.

The bow rudder was fixed for the nonce, and every thing prepared to start, so soon as she could be got off, when the fatal scene of the boiler was blown off to a distance of fifty or sixty yards, and now lies partly exposed on the shore at low water. The sides of the vessel were blown outward, if we may judge from the circumstance of the paddle-boxes being expanded outward—that is to say, the sides are inclined outwards, diverging from each other.

The explosion took place in what is usually termed the after part of the vessel, namely, in a direction opposite to the course she was about to steer. The bow or deck remains comparatively uninjured; and the passengers, therefore, in that part of the boat were in comparative safety.

Remains of wood, fruit, baskets, clothes, and other materials, lie strewed in fragments on the shore, and in every direction.

The engines appear to be uninjured, which indicates that the explosion occurred either upwards or aback, but it is most probable that it was principally upwards.

One part of the boiler was hurled 100 feet towards the Waterman's Adelphi pier, at the bottom of George-street, and another portion of it in a contrary direction towards Waterloo-bridge

It is reported that as many as thirty persons were in the cabin of the boat when the explosion took place, who have perished. Their bodies cannot be recovered till the tide recedes

Two bodies lie at St. Martin's workhouse. One is that of a watchmaker, of the name of Bisnil, whose residence is not known, and the other is that of a coalheaver, who has not yet been identified. In the Westminster Hospital one man, who is at present unknown, but is believed to have been one of the crew of the ill-fated vessel, is dead.

One person among those picked up dead was well known to the people on the pier as being a daily passenger. He had £1 10s. in gold in his pocket, and 10s. in silver. He wore a gold chain and silver watch. Some of his linen was marked "J. M. B." There was a letter in his pocket, which may possibly lead to his identity. It is dated Wednesday, and commences thus:—

"Dear John—I am going to Watson's this afternoon," and ended—"I shall expect to see you to-morrow (Thursday) without fail. (Signed) "WM. N. SMART."

Captain Carter (captain of the vessel) had only left the engine-room about one minute, himself, as he thought, ascertained that all was right and safe, when the boiler burst. Some time since a slight accident occurred to the boiler, and she has very recently been undergoing repair.

Up to half-past two o'clock, twelve individuals (all males) had been taken to the hospital; one since dead, and the call-boy (Shades) dying. The injuries of the others are not considered dangerous.

ANOTHER ACCOUNT.

Immediately on the explosion being heard, crowds rushed to the spot from all parts of the town and the neighbourhood, and a great many have since died from the Surrey side of the river to behold the dreadful scene. For at least ten minutes after the fatal event, several persons were busily engaged in taking up the unfortunate passengers. Very few of them were able to walk ashore, and those unhurt—several had heads, legs, arms, or some other members broken or injured; a great many who were precipitated into the river, although not killed by the explosion, were unable, from the effect of the shock, to attempt to extricate themselves, and were drowned before their bodies were discovered, or assistance could be rendered to them; and there were others who were killed directly by the accident.

The Cricket, at the time of this terrible explosion, was crowded with several hundred passengers, and there were a great many running along the pier to get on board. She was fortunately moored to the pier-head. The engines of the Cricket were high-pressure engines. The unfortunate call-boy had his head broken in a frightful manner, and the engineer and stoker are supposed to have been buried in pieces by the river.

The fore part of the boat is little injured, and those persons who had the good fortune to have taken up a position in that part escaped with comparatively little injury. Several as this unusual accident is, and great as must be the number of lives lost, it is a source of some consolation that the vessel had not proceeded on her trip to London-bridge; for if she had done so, and were in motion, and in the mid-stream, the loss of life would have been infinitely greater, and the injuries sustained by the survivors still more serious and extensive.

As yet (this account is written at ten o'clock) no certain account of the number of killed or wounded can be ascertained; but we saw at least forty or fifty persons carried upon people's backs, because they were themselves unable to walk. The appearance of those unfortunate persons was most appalling. Their faces and clothes were quite wet and black, and the frightful appearance was increased by the manner in which they were disfigured with blood and wounds. A sensation of horror appeared to prevail over the spectators, who looked on their body, as they were conveyed from the immediate neighbourhood of the boat along the pier, with sorrowful and horror-stricken countenances.

Upon getting close to the water's edge a still more fearful spectacle presented itself. Every now and then a body was raised into a boat and brought to the shore. The terrors of death were increased by the soiled and dripping clothes, and the blood-stained and mangled faces. Among the spectators there were several of those who had fortunately escaped, and who returned thanks aloud to the Great Disposer of Events for having so miraculously saved them from so sudden and fatal an end; and there were others who had friends and acquaintances, for whose safety they were anxious and alarmed

The concussion of the air caused by the explosion was so great as to be very perceptible in the houses all along the river side of the Strand. Others, in Fleet-street reaching the pier, about ten minutes after the accident occurred, the spectacle that presented itself was of a very terrible kind. The dripping bodies of pale and bleeding men were being carried away to the hospital. Others who had been more fortunate, and had escaped without other injury than that caused by falling in the river, were making the best of their way from the pier with bare heads, and clothes and faces covered with mud and dripping with water. The narrow passage leading down to the boats was densely crowded, and it was with considerable difficulty that we got down to the pier; there a cluster of policemen were endeavouring, in vain, to keep the crowd off; they forced through the mud (for it was low water, fortunately), and scrambled over barges, piles, and chains, to satisfy their curiosity, and to lend ready assistance where it was wanted. The steam boat lay with the after part shattered and shapeless. A fleet of skiffs, wherries, and boats of all kinds crowded round, picking up different things that had fallen overboard. Fragments of timber were floating all round. Every now and then, as some hat or other article of clothing appeared upon the surface, a number of boats pushed in the fear of finding, or in the hope of rescuing, a new sufferer. The steam-boat itself was a mass of unimagined confusion. The whole deck was torn up and intermingled with a heap of broken pipes and pieces of metal, the fragments of the exploded boiler The fore part of the vessel still stood together, but even that, the least injured part of the whole, was torn and broken. Twenty or thirty active volunteers were busy in the stem of the boat, if such it could be called, clearing away as rapidly as possible as much of the wreck as might be supposed to conceal the bodies of poor victims to the terrible disaster.

The force of the explosion may be estimated from the effect, that it perceptibly shook the houses in the Strand as far as Waterloo Bridge.

There were upon a moderate calculation, at least 200 to 300 persons on board The captain, Mr. Carter, is unhurt; and the engineer and stoker had just left the engine room when the unfortunate accident occurred.

One of the persons who was going by the boat to London Bridge, and who had just taken his seat when the disaster occurred, thus relates the occurrence:—"I had barely seated myself on the fore-cabin deck, when a scene, which I shall never forget, took place. The boat at first seemed to heave slightly and then down; and what it was considering what it could be, I saw the whole of the middle blow up with a fearful noise. At the same time I saw one of the passengers, whom I had noticed standing at the side of the chimney, ascend into the air with the boiler. The rush of smoke and steam that followed prevented me from seeing anything else, and I immediately leaped over the side of the boat, and by laying hold of one of the chains of the pier, I got on to the dumb lighter, and by that means saved myself. I have no doubt that considerably more persons were driven into the river than have yet been found. I am led to this conclusion from the number I saw in the boat, and the comparatively few that I saw afterwards leaving. I should think that there were from 100 to 150 on board, and I don't think more than 80 left afterwards."

The top of the steam-chest was hurled by the explosion on to the bank, within a few feet of the Waterman's Adelphi Pier, where many persons were standing Fragments of the boiler and machinery fell on Mr. Pugh's wharf, under the Adelphi-terrace, and one end of the vessel was blown out.

No accident has occurred in the metropolis for many years that has created so great a sensation

The following are the names of persons lying at the Charing-cross Hospital, more or less seriously injured:—

Mr. Cahn, ancle injured.
Thomas Willets, arm cut, and very much shaken
James Hollo, severely scalded.
Henry Rowland, shaken.
James Sleman, wrist badly cut and much bruised.
Virgo Birks, severe fracture of right leg
William Kay, head and eye much injured.
William Redgrave (boy), fractured leg.
Benjamin Reepe. William Hutt. William Ayre.

LATEST PARTICULARS.

The youth Shades (call-boy), died yesterday afternoon about three o'clock.
Virgo Birks, one of the sufferers, has had his right leg amputated by Mr Avery, assisted by Mr. Young, house-surgeon, and Mr. Hancock. The unfortunate man is going on well, and no danger is at present apprehended.

The other sufferers are doing remarkably

The body of the person who died shortly after being removed to Charing Cross Hospital has not yet been identified

On the inquest, which is being given to Mr. Bedford, the Coroner, that gentleman said that he should require the evidence of several eminent engineers to assist in the inquiry, and, consequently, he did not at present think it right to hold the inquest before Monday.

Up to seven o'clock last evening, fifteen persons, more or less injured, had been taken to the workhouse, and the Charing-cross Hospital. Of these four are dead; the others are under medical treatment. The escape of policeman F 111, and his family, was most miraculous. The man, with his wife and children, had gone on board the boat, with the intention of proceeding to London-bridge. They had seated themselves on deck, when suddenly, on the explosion taking place, they were all blown up into the air, and descended into the cabin or the vessel, which was under water, the sides having been blown out, and they managed all to scramble on shore, by the broken sides of the vessel, unhurt.

The Rev. Mr. Smith, the chaplain of the St. Martin's workhouse, with his lady, were among the persons who had paid their fare to go to London-bridge. Mr. Smith had got on board, and Mr. Smith was on the pier about to step on board when the explosion took place. Mrs. Smith was scalded by the steam, and was blown into the water, but was fortunately rescued. Mr. Smith escaped unhurt, the explosion having taken place as he was in the act of stepping on the lighter in order to get on board the boat.

The following is an accurate list of the persons killed:

The Call-boy
A man dressed as a sailor—name unknown.
John Litteton, 6, Bloomsbury-street.
John Hunt, jun., watchmaker, 3, Vauxhall-bridge-road.
Two, we understand, are lying in a dangerous state at the hospital.

The engineer's statement is to the following effect: He says he was in the engine-room at the time, and that he did not recover his consciousness until he found himself lying on the pier! There must, to all appearances, have been considerable neglect. We are informed that the sister of the unfortunate boy, at the time the disaster happened, was waiting on the pier with his breakfast.

HER MAJESTY IN SCOTLAND

ABERDEENSHIRE, August 24.

The Duke of Athol called, yesterday, to pay his respects to her Majesty and his Royal Highness the Prince Albert

Her Majesty and the Prince walked in the Forest to-day. The Royal children walked out, attended by their governess, Miss Hillyard

Her Majesty now having safely arrived at her destination, the Royal movements at present have become merely of "Court Circular" interest.

THE LATE ATTEMPT AT MURDER IN MARK-LANE.—Yesterday John Overstone, charged with having attempted to kill and murder Mr. Crawley, of Mark-lane, was brought before the Lord Mayor at the Mansion-house for examination. He looked dreadfully ill—John Yates, the clerk to Mr. Crawley, gave in evidence the facts already known. Mr. Judy, the senior surgeon of St. Thomas's Hospital, expressed his confidence that Mr Crawley would recover, but doubted whether he would be able to be examined before a fortnight.—John Strickland (policeman 169), who took the prisoner into custody, said that as he was conveying him to Guy's Hospital, he said it was that villian Crawley who caused it, and that he was sorry the ball had not gone through his brain. The prisoner was remanded. The fortnight intervals of giving the examination with his expressed. He sighed frequently, but uttered not a word.

SHAKESPEARE'S HOUSE.—On Thursday, a public meeting was held in the Stratford House Tavern, for the purpose of taking measures to promote a subscription for the purchase of Shakspeare's house at Stratford-upon-Avon. It was stated that communications had been received from the Earl of Ellesmere, the Earl of Chichester, and Earl Howe, deploring their non-currence in the object of the meeting, and their regret that they were unable to be present at the meeting; similar intimations had been also made by Lord Morpeth and Mr. Macaulay, the former being prevented from attending by a severe attack of gout, and the latter having made arrangements to leave for Holland that morning. Mr. J. P. Collier was called to the chair, and, in opening the proceedings, briefly adverted to the steps taken by the Stratford on Avon Shakspearian Club, and their Secretary, Mr. Brocebridge, to accomplish the object which the meeting had been called to promote.—Professor T. Taylor moved the first resolution, declaring the expediency of raising a subscription for the purchase of Shakspeare's house, to save it from removal and demolition, and preserve it as a national monument. The resolution was seconded by Mr. C Knight, and was carried. Mr. C. Knight and other gentlemen addressed the meeting in furtherance of the object in view. Other resolutions were agreed to, and a list of subscriptions was read.

THE TRAGICAL MURDER AND SUICIDE IN PARIS.

The Journal des Débats gives the following additional particulars connected with the suicide of the Duke de Praslin:—"From Tuesday morning the state of M de Praslin caused his approaching end to be expected. An attack of delirium with observable intervals. It may be recollected that, after the arrest of the Duke, the magistrates discovered in one of the pockets of his dressing gown a phial which contained laudanum. M. de Praslin had swallowed a portion of that liquid, but there remained sufficient in the bottom of the bottle to be submitted to a chymical analysis. The contents of the phial, and the matter vomited by the Duke at the moment when the first symptoms of the poisoning were manifested, were handed by the Count de Pears to the examination of M. Chevallier, Professor of Chymistry at the Central School of Pharmacy. The result of that analysis has been stated in minutes which are to be published. The presence of arsenic in a quantity sufficient to cause the death of several persons has been ascertained in these different matters—that is, in the substance found in the bottle, and in that which was vomited.

MARRIAGE OF THE MARQUIS OF DROGHEDA.—On Wednesday the marriage of the Marquis of Drogheda and the Hon. Mary Caroline Stuart Wortley, eldest daughter of Lord and Lady Wharncliffe, was solemnized at St. George's, Hanover-square.

DEATH OF LADY WESTPHAL.—We announce, with regret, the death of Lady Westphal, which took place on Wednesday, at Brighton Sir George and Lady Westphal had arrived only a week ago at their residence in Brunswick-square in that town.

HISTORICAL FACT.—It may not be unworthy of mention, at this time, that Bangue, the Thane of Lochaber, and who resided in the castle of Inverlochy, was the progenitor of the Stuart family, from whom many of the crowned heads of Europe are descended. So that it is no wonder that our gracious Queen should select Fort William, the capital of Lochaber, for her landing-place on her visit to this part of her ancient kingdom of Scotland.

DREADFUL HOMICIDE. A coroner's inquest was held on Saturday, near Coote hill, in the county of Cavan, on the body of a poor labouring man, named Moore, who came to his death under the following circumstances, detailed in the evidence adduced: Owing to the extreme destitution which prevailed in the neighbourhood, the poor people were in the habit of stealing potatoes, turnips, &c., and a small farmer, named Kemp, was a sufferer from these depredations. On the night of the 17th of August, he proceeded to a field of potatoes, armed with a gun—loaded with powder only—and seeing the deceased pulling up the roots, at once discharged it at him, and slightly wounded him. A scuffle ensued, and King, by repeated blows of the gun, fractured the wretched man's skull, broke his arm, and several of his ribs. He languished till Friday night, when death put an end to his sufferings. The jury returned a verdict of "Manslaughter" against King, who has been committed to prison to take his trial for the crime

FATAL ACCIDENTS ON THE GREAT SOUTHERN AND WESTERN RAILWAY The Cork Examiner states that "last week two accidents, which were both attended with loss of life, occurred on the works of this railway in the vicinity of Mallow. One man was killed at Annabella, on Wednesday, by the falling of an embankment, which was incautiously worked under too far. On Friday, the death of another labourer was caused at Godfrey-hill, by a loaded waggon rolling over him. He was engaged in preventing it from descending too rapidly over a declivity; but the drag became insufficient, and in endeavouring to resist its course, he was caught by the wheel, and crushed to death in a frightful manner."

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The old Medway Canal, on the Gravesend and Rochester Railway, which had been closed for some time in order to fill up the canal and lay down a double line of rails, was re-opened for traffic on Monday by its present proprietors—the South Eastern Company.

Such is the appearance of the orchards in Devonshire at present, that prime old cider is selling at 20s. per hogshead. It is fully expected that new cider will be sold at 10s. per hogshead. The apples are growing fast, and the crop promises to be both excellent and abundant.

On the 9th inst. King Otho opened the Session of the Greek Chambers at Athens by a speech from the throne. Only a portion of the elections have yet taken place, and not more than half the number of Deputies to which the country is entitled are yet arrived. The Royal speech alludes to having obeyed the pressing demands of the English Government, by having paid the interest on the loans due in March last.

many of the mountain tops between that and Oban. On the estates of Mr. Matheson alone fifteen of these fires were kindled, and the effect on the water was truly splendid.

THURSDAY.

All the accounts concur in stating this day's journey to be the most interesting in the Royal Progress; introducing "the strangest intermingling of stern and beautiful scenery, famed in song and story, and rich in stirring historical memories."

The Royal Yacht left Crinan Loch, at seven, A.M. The morning was fair and clear, permitting a beautiful view of the islands that stud and the mountains that surround the Loch. The yacht, followed by the Scourge, passed out of the northern corner of Jura, keeping wisely the celebrated gulf of Corryvreckan, the Maelstrom of the west, and Scarba island to the left, proceeding up the Sound of Luing into Loch Limhe, passing next Seil Island and Easdale on the right.

The Easdale slate quarries are the property of the Marquis of Breadalbane, whose long and wide estates here dip into the Atlantic, and extend eastward, in one unbroken line across the country, to the neighbourhood of Perth.

The Queen was received with loud enthusiasm by a large body of labourers from the Easdale quarries; as well as by 300 hardy watermen from the coasts of the Breadalbane estates; they were in boats, each carrying its little flag. Their rendezvous was off Luing Island, and their dressing and drawing up exhibited no little taste and discipline. The boats in each of the two lines were so close that the men, while receiving the Queen, resembled two solid bodies of infantry drawn up two or three deep, as a guard of honour, on the waters. Those who are in the habit of seeing many pageants, and saw the compliment paid to Royalty by the Breadalbane men, call it the most imposing and striking thing of the sort that they have ever witnessed. From the hills above the village of Easdale a Royal salute was fired; and passing the entrance of Loch Feochan on the right, and Gylan Castle on the left the yacht entered the narrow channel between Kerrera Island and the mainland, and ran into Oban Bay, which is almost land-locked, and completely sheltered by the island.

The Bay was crowded with various craft, including a Government steamer Soon after ten o'clock, the Royal yacht, its tenders, and two other steamers, left the bay westward, for the Sound of Mull, for Stafford and Iona. The crew of the Government steamer had, most loyally, dressed with flags the ruins of Dunolly Castle, on the right. To the right, the yacht passed Lismore, one of the most fertile of the Western Isles; and at this point, the entrance of which is really to be considered the Sound of Mull, the Royal tourists commanded one of the finest of our Scottish views. The farm-houses had all their little flags fluttering away in the breeze; there, too, was the lighthouse, and clusters of picturesque cottages: all Lismore was green and cheerful. Morven was on the right, frowning in a darker colour and a sterner form; and here were the curious ruins of Duart Castle—once the seat of the M'Leans—on the left, in Mull.

The Royal yacht was placed under the pilotage of Captain M'Killop, of the

THE ROYAL YACHTS OFF STAFFA.

Dolphin; and, from her frequent crossing and re-crossing of the channel, so as to command the best points of the view, it was evident that the Queen and her party were greatly delighted with a passage which Sir Walter Scott describes as so tempting in "fine weather."

The ruins of Ardtornish, once the stronghold of the Lords of the Isles, were next passed; where the present proprietor, Peter Sellar, the notable sheep farmer of the Highlands, and the agent of the Sutherland estates, has built himself an unsightly abode, of glare and whitewash.

In every mile or two were passed ruins of castles that it has been found more difficult to destroy than the ruins of cottages, but we may be assured that the castles did not flourish without the cottages. The latter are forgotten, and they have not been replaced, while the former are passing fast through all the stages of decay. There, on the right, on the mainland, was the seat of the late Sir Charles Gordon, so well known as the secretary of the Highland Society; and on the left was the narrow entrance to the bay of Tobermory. Here, a Royal salute was fired by an Admiralty frigate, stationed on the coast, and various demonstrations of respectful loyalty were made by the inhabitants. Our artist has sketched this beautiful scene. The village of Tobermory was commenced about fifty years ago, under the auspices of the Society for the Encouragement of British Fisheries

After passing various other points, the Squadron moved up the Atlantic, in the direction of Staffa, where the whole cast anchor.

The Times' report of this portion of the Royal route is very graphically written, and admirably describes the wild and wonderful coast, which,

Along many a winding bay and far-extended headland, stretches
Where th' Atlantic's waves pours o'er the stormy Hebrides.

"On either shore, as the fleet steered up the Sound of Mull, far off to the south and east stretched the mountains of Appin and Lochabar, flanked by Ben Cruiachan at the one extremity, and Ben Nevis on the other. On the west lay the stately Ben More, and eastward Morven—the country where Fingal fought and Ossian sang; or where, to use more guarded language, Macpherson said they did so. The sea, which was as smooth as glass, reflected on its surface every feature of the adjacent heights, and at short intervals, on either side, the ruins of ancient strongholds rise on the sea-side, their grim and solitary aspect calling back the mind to times of violence now past.

"Doward Castle, once the stronghold of Maclean of Doward, appeared on the left, and on the right the ancient fortresses of Ardtornish and Mingary. The former belonged in remote periods to the Lords of the Isles, and the latter to the Macians of Ardnamarchan. In one or both of them James IV. and V. resided when visiting the Highlands to compel the submission of the refractory chiefs; nor have these wild shores and deserted promontories been since visited by the Sovereign, until yesterday her Majesty surveyed them from the deck of the Victoria and Albert. The changes which have been wrought on that coast in the interval are striking enough, for few can help recognising the distinction between the peaceful objects of Queen Victoria and the mission of her predecessors; or, observing, that lands which, in the 16th century, must have produced a numerous, hardy, and adventurous race of mountaineers, now support little else than black-faced sheep, and are entirely devoted to pasture.

"As the Royal Squadron cleared out from the Sound of Mull, and round the northern extremity of that island, a noble prospect lay before it, the steep and barren headlands of Ardnamarchan stretching away into the Atlantic on the right, on the left the precipitous cliffs of the Mull coast, and far away and embosomed in the ocean, the fantastic and varied forms of the adjacent islands. The horizon toward the north was a good deal obscured by haze, but, notwithstanding, Skye was distinctly visible.

"Having steamed round the point of Callnch, where Campbell composed the greater part of his 'Pleasures of Hope,' the fleet at length stopped off the lonely island of Staffa, and her Majesty in her barge was rowed to the furthest extremity of the great cave. The construction and appearance of this wonderful natural temple have been so often described that it is unnecessary to attempt giving any account of it here, yet the circumstances of yesterday's visit to the cave were so striking and novel as to impress most powerfully the minds of those who witnessed the scene. The deserted and solitary aspect of the island was brought out with strange and startling effect by the presence of so many steamers; and as her Majesty's barge with the Royal standard floated into the cave, the crew dipping their oars with the greatest precision, nothing could be more animated and grand than the appearance which the vast basaltic entrance, so solemn in its proportions, presented."

Our Artist has sketched the Royal Squadron at Staffa; as well as her Majesty entering the sublime temple of Fingal's Cave.

The Royal Squadron next steamed, in an hour, to Iona, where, the Royal yacht having cast anchor, Prince Albert, with the Prince of Leiningen, the Duke of Norfolk, Earl Grey, and Sir James Clark, proceeded ashore. The Islanders were mustered in force to receive the Royal and Noble visitors. "Bright grey sand," says the Morning Chronicle, "had been strewed upon the winding path which leads, amongst ferny wastes and mossy ledges and the r fields of oats and barley, to the ruins of the antique religious buildings—the grey pillars and crosses, the mouldering remains of cloister, and abbey, and nunnery, where matins and vespers were sung when all Britain beside was as pagan as New Zealand—the historic burying-ground, where the ancient Kings of Scotland, Ireland, and Norway, lie side by side beneath their mouldering tombstones—around the crumbling central tower, on the summit of which St. Columba—so say the natives—sits one starlit night in the year to count the number of the Western Isles."

The Royal Tourists, after leaving Iona, bore away for Loch Sunart, and passed down the Sound of Mull, into Loch Linnhe. Her Majesty reached Fort William about noon, and a number of Highland gentlemen, dressed in the national costume, were assembled on the pier to receive their Sovereign, but it was intimated that it was the intention of her Majesty to remain on board all that day, and to land on the following morning, at ten o'clock. In the meantime, Prince Albert, attended by several gentlemen of the suite, left the yacht, and proceeded to Glencoe, famous for the sombre magnificence and loftiness of its mountains, as well as for being the dark scene of the almost total extirpation of the clan to which that country then belonged. At night, the Squadron moored in Tobermory Bay.

FRIDAY.

This morning, there was an entire change in the weather: stormy gusts of wind tore up the waters of Loch Linnhe, and drove before it masses of grey vapour, which swept along the ridges of the hills. The Royal Squadron left Tobermory Bay shortly after seven o'clock. The course lay down the Sound of Mull, and betwixt the mainland and the island of Lismore. Had the day been as favourable as its predecessors, the mountains of Morven, Kingarloch, and Ardgour, on the one hand, and the islands of Lismore and Shuna, Appin-house, Balnagown Bay, Balahulish, Loch Leven, Glencoe, and the Appin Hills, on the other, would have been seen to great advantage. The Royal Squadron, consisting only of the two Royal yachts and the Garland, the others having preceded her Majesty, passed into Loch Eil shortly before ten o'clock. At Corran of Ardgour, Colonel M'Lean was out with three hundred of his tenantry to cheer her Majesty. Lochiel, with a party of his men, was stationed on South Corran, to swell the cheer. At eleven, the fleet came to anchor off Fort William, the artillery of the fort firing a Royal salute. It had been notified that Prince Albert would ascend Ben Nevis in the afternoon, the Queen remaining on board; but as mighty Ben had not, by mid-day, divested himself of his mantle of mist, the intention was abandoned: Prince Albert and Prince Leiningen, with the Royal Children, however, landed and drove to Glencoe.

SATURDAY.

This morning, at nine o'clock, her Majesty landed at Fort William, under a Royal salute from the guns of the fort. At the landing-place were the Sheriffs of the county, next to them were Lord Lovat, Keith Stewart Mackenzie, of Seaforth, Lord Ward, Grant of Glen Morriston, and others, proprietors in the county. A detachment of the 97th infantry, under Capt. Williamson, and Highlanders in the national garb, lined the pier on both sides. On the quay, a slightly raised walk was formed, and covered with Royal Stuart tartan, upon which the Royal party walked to their carriage. Across the pier was a triumphal arch, composed of heather and solly, flowers, and the red berries of the mountain ash, surmounted by a crown, over a Gaelic inscription, signifying "two in one," in allusion to a cockade suspended beneath, the one-half of which was white, and the other black, the colours of the Stuart and Brunswick houses being thus united. Her Majesty was greeted with tremendous cheering. The main street was filled with people, and from the roofs of the houses were extended flags bearing the inscriptions (in Gaelic), "Welcome, Queen of the Highland hearts;" "The Queen for ever;" "Hail, Queen of Albyn." Her Majesty drove slowly through the town, by a road past the mouth of Glen Nevis, and the base of the Great Ben, crossing a moor of several miles in length, the only objects of interest in which are Inverlochy Castle and the battle-field of Inverlochy. The Castle is supposed to be one of the oldest ruins in the kingdom, and was originally the property of the Cummings. One of its towers is yet pretty entire; the walls are at least ten feet thick. In front of the Castle are four cannon, nine feet in length, though only six-pounders, supposed to have formed part of the Royal armament at Culloden. Beneath the towers of Inverlochy, the Marquis of Montrose, in 1645, defeated the troops of the Duke of Argyle—a battle in which Sir Walter Scott makes his eccentric character, Dugald Dalgetty (legend of Montrose), take a prominent part. In the reign of James the First of Scotland, Inverlochy was the scene of a bloody contest betwixt Donald Balloch and his clansmen on the one part, and the Royal forces on the other. From Inverlochy, the road proceeds through a rude country. About ten miles from Fort William the road enters Strath Spean, where the Royal cortège was met by about 300 of the Mackintosh's tenantry. The Royal travellers changed horses at the farm of Tullich, betwixt which and Loch Laggan inn, a distance of some fifteen miles, only three or four houses, mere shepherds' huts, are to be seen. A drive along Loch Laggan side can scarcely be surpassed for beauty; winding with the shores, now ascending and now descending, crossing by short leaps the many courses of rain-fed burns, the old roots of oaks and birches sending out fantastically-shaped trees, through which the wind, sounding a soft measure—hills, woods, and waters uniting, give variety of colour and picturesqueness.

The road to Ardverikie passes round the north end of Loch Laggan, crossing the Padtock-water by an ingenious boat-bridge. At this point Macpherson, of Cluny Macpherson, with about thirty of his tenantry, in the costume of the clan; Duncan Davidson, of Tulloch, and a few of his followers; Sir John Mackenzie, of Selvin, and other, were assembled, the Highlandmen armed with broad-sword and target. About 80, thus armed, lined one side of the road, and the same number, unarmed, lined the other; while about 500 persons of both sexes, in holiday costume, posted themselves on the face of the hill. The Marquis of Abercorn, in full Highland costume, and wearing the Order of the Garter, with the Duchess of Bedford, was also present.

Shortly after eleven o'clock, a signal was made from Ben Nead that the Royal party were approaching. Cluny then put himself at the head of the Highland men, and behind him stood the standard-bearer, with the venerable green silk flag of the Macphersons, which was "out" in the rebellions of 1715 and 1745. Cluny himself wore the shield which Prince Charles Stuart carried at Culloden The Royal cortege drew up opposite the bridge, the path to which, as well as the bridge, was carpeted. Having greeted the Marquis and Cluny, her Majesty shook hands with the Duchess of Bedford, and, with the Prince, repeatedly acknowledged the cheering of the people. The last carriage having passed, an ankar of whisky was brought forth, with cakes and cheese, to feast both great and small. Cluny then proposed "Health and Happiness to her Majesty," which was drank with nine cheers, enthusiastically given; and the crowd, after discussing some forty gallons of whisky, dispersed.

The Marquis of Abercorn dined with the Royal party to-day, and returned in the evening to Loch Laggan Inn, which he has fitted up for his own accommodation. The Duchess of Bedford returned early in the day to her own residence in Perthshire.

Her Majesty was not accompanied by military, and, in the evening, all the county police were dismissed, the force of seven London police being considered more than sufficient for the protection of her Majesty and the Royal party.

SUNDAY

The weather continued cheerless, high wind and rain prevailing almost without intermission, which rendered a wish for storm, damaging the wooden houses, tents, and temporary buildings, which had been erected for the use of the retinue at Ardverikie Lodge. A large wooden hall, 36 feet by 18 feet, was completely demolished.

The Royal party remained within doors the whole of this day; divine service, of course, being privately performed. It was expected, in the event of favourable weather prevailing, that her Majesty would have attended the Presbyterian church at Laggan, where, in anticipation of such a visit, preparations had been completed.

MONDAY.

This day, his Royal Highness Prince Albert was to commence Grouse-shooting at Shrivamoor, adjoining the residence of Mr. Macdonald, which on former occasions was used by Prince George of Cambridge, and the Marquis of Douro.

The moors in this district are of considerable extent, and abound with game of every description. The forest of Ardverikie will be exclusively confined to deerstalking, which sport her Majesty intends to view on a little black, pony about 12½ hands high, the property of the Marquis of Abercorn, who purchased it from Mr Mac Gonnal.

The arrangements at Ardverekie, are unexceptionable. Everything than can contribute to the convenience, comfort, amusement, and recreation of the Sovereign, the Prince, and Royal Family, has been provided. The interior of the Lodge has been refitted, according to the taste of the Marchioness of Abercorn, by Messrs. Dowbiggin, of Mount-street; and Messrs. Lapworth, of Old Bond-street

The splendid rowing boat, expressly built by the Marquis, in the Thames, for her Majesty's excursion on Loch Laggan, and sent there by steamboat and railway, had arrived before the Royal Party, and was expected to be put into requisition at the first favourable opportunity

The Royal Squadron is at anchor at Fort William, and will remain there until the 18th of September, on which day it is believed her Majesty will re-embark on her voyage home.

A few characteristic receptions of the Royal Visitors are entitled to special mention. Thus, as the fleet swept past the narrow passage of Corran, the people of Ardgour, assembled with the venerable Colonel M'Leod, welcomed her Majesty with hearty cheers, and did further honour to the occasion by dancing on the green sward and drinking in bumpers of the mountain dew the health of the Queen and the Royal Family, and go'd sport to the Prince at Loch Laggan.

On Friday afternoon, when Prince Albert visited Glencoe, he also inspected the extensive slate quarries of Mr. Stewart, of Ballachulish; in this return 200 of the quarriers met him at the boundaries of Mr. Stewart's estate, and taking the horses out of his carriage drew it themselves, amidst every demonstration of enthusiastic loyalty, to the limits of embarkation. His Royal Highness was greatly delighted at this reception, and on departing gave a sum of money to the men. During Friday night, large bonfires were lighted in honour of her Majesty on all the surrounding hills; and one is said to have blazed on the very summit of Ben Nevis. There were great rejoicings too in the town of Fort William, and a ball was given at the Freemasons'-hall, which was attended by many officers from the Sesostris, and at which her Majesty's piper, by her express command, was present to play.

When the Queen landed on Saturday morning, she was obliged to walk to her carriage with an umbrella in her hand, but was agreeably pleased with everything she saw, and received most affably and graciously the homage of her Lochabar subjects. As she proceeded to her carriage, accompanied by Prince Albert and her Royal Children, she was loudly and enthusiastically cheered, and when, during a moment's pause, a tall gentleman with a red face proposed three cheers more "For their Royal Highnesses!" the seemed gratified, and laughed heartily.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

The first of our Engravings shows the animated scene at the Bromielaw, Glasgow, where many thousands awaited the Queen's arrival

The pair of Illustrations—Passing Dunally Castle, and the Salute from Tober more—are two interesting receptions. The first is in Oban Bay, where the crew of a Government steamer, stationed there, had hoisted a complete set of flags on the rules of the old Castle of Dunally on the right, a residence once of the M'Dongalls of Lorne, who were in the habit of considering themselves to be Monarchs, and dealing with the Kings of England in that sort of way. The English sailors never dreamed that they were taking liberties with the fortress of a race who claimed to be Kings over the west, alike independent of the Scotch or the English Monarchs. The Salute at Tobermory has been already detailed, as have, also, the Leaving Dumbarton, the Passage of the Crinan Canal, and the Royal Visit to Staffa.

THE QUEEN OF THE CLANS,

A Tribute suggested by her Majesty's Visit to the Highlands of Scotland.

August, 1847.

The salve-shot thunders from deck, fort, and castle,
The banners of Britain stream out in their pride;
Exults hoary Ocean, fair Albion's sole vassal,
And joy-fires are blazing from Tweed to the Clyde.
The Highlands' leal welcome is gloriously given
To virtues, which rival Elizabeth and Anne;
The shouts of brave myriads are borne on to Heaven
In joyous acclaim for the Queen of the Clans.

She comes with her heart-buds to breathe the wild heather,
Which cradled the Wallace and nurtured his fame;
Around Her the Chiefs of the noble Land gather,
Around her the clamorous of loyalty flame.
From loch, isle, and mountain the pibrochs are ringing,
No longer the slogan that scared Preston Pans;
But the rest, and standpeep, while tartans are flinging
Their hues to the skies round the Queen of the Clans.

Thank God! that the dark days are gone, and for ever,
When met in dire conflict the Saxon and Gael;
When the war whoop of party or faction could sever
The sons of the mountain from those of the vale.
All, all are now brothers in low-land and high-land,
They sail 'neath the bold flag which Liberty fans,
And their bonnets are up for the Empire and Island
Where Clemency reigns with the Queen of the Clans.

Look round on the thrones for the Nations erected,
And say what a contrast is there!
Dome ti. destruction, their subjects neglected,
Or plunder'd till Honour revolts in despair
By the blood of the people those thrones were cemented;
And the RULER of dynasts their destiny spans,
A dark cloud hangs over the false and demented,
A halo of joy round the Queen of the Clans.

Hence, come to pay homage the men of Glengarry,
Clan Chattan, the Campbells and gallant Lochiel;
The sunshine is bright on thy hills, Inverary,
But brighter the joy of each chieftain and chief.
And joyous assemble the Land's noble daughters,
Whose beauty may rival the swan's,
They welcome the Sovereign who rules the great waters,
The pride of our Islands and Chief of the Clans.

Warm welcome to him, who so worthily merits
Respect from the people, and love from the Crown
And we come to each Royal child that inherits
The virtues which call heaven's benizon down.
Long flourish our flag which is bravely unfurl'd
From the Alps of fair Scotia to sway Hindustan's;
The guardian of freedom and peace to the world. . . .
Hurrah! for Victoria! the Queen of the Clans! —L.

THE QUEEN'S VISIT TO THE HIGHLANDS.

(From our Own Reporter.)

FORT WILLIAM.

I left the Royal Squadron last week in the Clyde, and I resume my notices of their progress in the same interesting part of Scotland.

Dumbarton Castle, through strading strongly as a point in a fine green landscape, is hardly picturesque. The rock looks lumpy, and at a distance, you see nothing but the rock. It has its old historic associations, however. The fortress stands in Wallace's country, and is intimately connected with Wallace's career. It was more than once the scene of a surprise by the Scotch, and in its armoury is still preserved an immense two-handed sword, rightly or wrongly, said to have been the favourite weapon of the William Tell of Scotland.

The return of the Fairy, after the visit of her Majesty to the ancient rock—surrounded as the Royal Steamer was by a brilliant fleet of the quick-going boats of the Clyde—was very picturesque. The elegant little steamer glided along through a double line of crowded steamers, the passengers of each, of course, cheering most vociferously; while, all along the shore, flags flew from point to point; and, ever and anon, twining wreaths of white smoke marked the position of some extemporised battery, actively engaged in thundering out a Royal salute.

I mentioned in my last despatch the change in the officially notified course of the Royal steamer, and her trip up Loch Long. Only two or three of the Squadron which kept way, or tried to do so, with the Fairy, in the Clyde, accompanied her up the wild glen, between the desolate sides of which lie the waters of this fine lake. A subsidiary arm of the sea branches off from Loch Long, about half-way up, upon the left hand; this is Loch Goil—celebrated by Campbell, in the poem of "Lord Ullin's Daughter." The Bard of Hope, however, in order, probably, to prevent any mistake about the rhyme, has changed the name of the inlet from Goil to Gyle.

On her return from the Clyde, the Queen passed the night in the Bay of Rothesay—a sheltered basin of water, around which lies extended in a semi-circle the town of Rothesay, from which the Prince of Wales derives his second title, and which is the capital of the island, and county of Bute. Bonfires and illuminations duly testified the loyalty of the Rothesayians.

On Wednesday morning, the Squadron stood away on their northward and westward course, threading the tortuous channel called the Kyles of Bute, which forms the water-way from the Bay of Rothesay to Loch Fyne. The scenery here is peculiarly beautiful. A narrow ribbon of transparent water winds through a succession of irregular, cliffy ridges, and jutting rocks, green and tufted to the very brink of the sea. In one of the numerous salt water lakes which branch off here on every side, is an islet called Inch Marnock, of great local celebrity as a penitentiary for drunken wives. Here ladies addicted to the weakness in question are landed and left; not a drop of whisky is to be had for love or money; and the result has generally been found to be that, after a month's cooling and salubrious residence, the fair dramdrinkers return to their hearths and homes fair penitents

Loch Fyne is not much renowned for scenery, but it is greatly celebrated for herrings. Near the head of the lake stands the Castle of Inverary. In itself, the erection in question is no great snakes; but there is sweet scenery around—steep wooded hills—and lichen-covered rocks —and brawling foaming watertalls, tumbling into the green bright waters of the Loch. A tolerable muster of tartan-clad men—the tenants and retainers of the Duke of Argyle—animated by the discordance of a mob of pipers, were prepared to receive her Majesty.

From Loch Fyne the Crinan Canal conducted the Royal Party to the Sound of Jura. We last week gave an Engraving of the handsomely fitted up Barge in which the journey was performed. The Crinan Canal, although only about nine miles long, is rich in scenic beauties. You pass along now between luxuriantly wooded banks, fair heathery knolls; again, the water winds at the foot of vast mountain slopes, dotted over with sheep, and under precipitous ledges of towering rock. Of course, the reasonably close and continuing interest manifested on the banks of the canal—the women in their gayest ribbons, and tartan shawls, the men in their Sunday plaids and bonnets.

The Royal Squadron passed the night at Crinan—the western extremity of the Canal—a wild naked spot, whence the eye wanders over the waste of ocean, and the wilder and more labyrinth of the sound, creek and island and isthmus which give its distinguishing features to this curiously indented part of the Scottish coast.

The next day, Thursday, broke bright and tranquil, and the sea lay without a ruffle, gleaming in its clear depths the rocky promontories which everywhere rise from these parts. The Royal Squadron and Albert was early under way; and, leaving on the left hand the shores of Jura —threading in the passage a gay flotilla of fishing boats—and sighting the mountains of Colonsay and Islay, rising cloud like from the sea, approached by breakfast time the mouth of the labyrinth of Sound.

The Royal yacht steamed slowly round the bay, under a salute from a battery stationed upon the heathy slopes which back the town of Oban. The whole scene was very beautiful. The flotilla of slowly-moving steamers, the crowded shores, the crescent-shaped town, the crowning heights, and the ancient Castle of Dunolly, all together made up the materials of a very beautiful picture.

Leaving Oban, the Squadron stood down the Sound of Mull, a long deep arm of the sea, fringed with wild and desolate mountains. Here lies the ledge of rocks on which Maclean of Duart left his wife to be drowned by the rising tide, when she was rescued by her brother's galley, which happened to be passing just at the critical moment. The relative of the injured lady took quick revenge, for he stabbed Maclean at the Court of Holyrood. Further on, upon the left hand side, we pass the hidden little town of Tobermory, nestled in a snug bay, and defended from Atlantic surges by a rocky island, which forms a capital natural breakwater. A frigate and a man-of-war steamer lay in the bay; and, as the Victoria and Albert passed, the thunder of their guns reverberated from the heights around, and the volumes of white smoke which rose above the hills, permitted the Royal party to catch but an indistinct glimpse of the little town which lines the beach and straggles upwards upon the cliffs behind. In this bay one of the last surviving ships of the Invincible Armada was accidentally blown up. Some time ago, a party, in search of wreck, discovered small brass guns, have been recovered by diving. A few miles more steaming and we begin to feel the never-ceasing undulations of the open ocean; for, after passing, on one hand, the savage rocks of Ardnamurchan, the most western cape of the mainland of Scotland; and, on the other, the low heathy tongue of land called the Point of Caillach—an old haunt, by the way, of the poet Campbell—we find ourselves in the open Atlantic. Steering in the direction of Staffa, the high hills of Skye appear far astern; Rum and Eig thing their brown masses above the sea; while, here and there, an unnamed islet—a mere bead of brown rock—appears strung upon the Line of the horizon.

The Freshnish Islands form a group worthy of a moment's remark, from the terraced and regularly ledged appearance of the rock, of which they are composed. One of them is called the Dutchman's Cap. The name will give an idea of the form, particularly if it be universally known and universally true that all Dutchmen's caps are made with a very broad brim and a very high conical crown.

And now Staffa appears, at first sight, a flat uninteresting island, in no way distinguished from any of its less celebrated compeers. It is as you round the eastern extremity that its famed peculiarities burst into view. The visit of the Queen to the Cave was really a very pleasing sight; a long undulating swell rolled in unbroken ridges from seawards, tumbling, in glistening foam, over the slimy and pointed rocks, and causing the fleet of steamers to rise and fall with that peculiarly graceful motion which the swell of the ocean alone imparts to shipping. The Queen, in her barge, rowed right into the cave—a solemn and an echoing place. I saw the entrance of the Royal party from a little distance, and will not readily forget the features—the over-hanging, iron-coloured, rusty-looking rock; the upright ledges and pillars which support the crowning masses of cliff; the dark tunnel-like opening of the cavern, with its streaked and irregular roof of hanging stalactites, and pointed wedges, and jutting peaks of stone; and its side ledges and shelves of broken pillars; and the open sea floor of the cave, heaving and moving, in broken ridges, into the dim interior of the cave, and sweeping, with the dark shadow, the swinging barge which conveyed the Queen.

Around lay the Scourge, the Victoria and Albert, and the Fairy, with the Dolphin, the Edinburgh Castle, and the Queen of Beauty – passenger boats which accompanied the Royal Squadron.

Iona was the next point visited. The Queen did not land here, but Prince Albert did; and walked, attended by the islanders in a body—the chief men among them carrying willow wands (was there not something beautifully primitive in this?)—to see the ruins of the religious building, the cloisters and the towers which St. Columba founded, and beneath which manns and vespers were sung long ere the Cross became the symbol of Britain's faith.

From Iona, the Squadron returned to Mull, and dropped anchor for the night in the bay of Tobermory.

The next day saw the termination of the northward voyage. Despite a blustery and rainy morning, the fleet steamed up Loch Linnie to Fort William. But little could be seen of the coast. The rain came down heavily; the hirth was marked by bars of foam, and the mountain slopes stretched upwards until they were lost in the driving mist. The day, however, cleared up towards the afternoon, and all was prepared for the landing. The good folks of Fort William—a straggling, poverty stricken-looking village—had mustered in force around the pier. There were triumphal arches, and a tartan-covered pathway up to the main street, but the Queen did not go ashore. The Victoria and Albert blew her steam off, and the Fairy conveyed the Prince down to the mouth of that valley of savage aspect and tearful recollections—Glencoe.

The next day was worse than its predecessor. The rain fell in bucketfulls; the mist came far down the mountain sides; and, altogether, it was true Lochabar weather. By breakfast time, however, the Royal Party were ashore, having landed amid the cheering of the Highlanders and the yelling of their abominable bagpipes.

The road to Ardverikie lies amid naked, sterile wastes of moor and mountain, and the day was well advanced ere the Queen had traversed the thirty miles which lie between Fort William and the lonely shooting-box, where Cluny Macpherson, the chieftain of the district, was waiting, with a goodly muster of drenched clansmen, to give Royalty a Highland Welcome.

"G. A. H."—You are quite right. Enigma No. 192, by "J. N.," can be solved in three moves. The author has omitted two or three Pawns, which enabled him to prolong the Mate to five.

"C. R. L."—*The idea of your last Problem is certainly ingenious; but the Mate can be effected in fewer moves, if we are not much mistaken. One method is as follows:—*1. *R to Q B 5th (ch); 2. CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

THE SELF-ACCUSED MURDERER.—Last Saturday, John Ramsay, a respectably dressed man, aged twenty-nine, described in the calendar as a chessemonger, was charged, upon his own confession, with the wilful murder of Henry Williams, on the third of November, 1844 Mr. Bodkin stated the cases to the Jury. The learned counsel said, it was in consequence of a statement made some short time since by the prisoner himself, that the present inquiry became necessary. He made a voluntary confession that he was the murderer of a gentleman named Wi liams, as far back as the month of November, 1844. It would appear, shortly after the death of the deceased, an inquiry took place before the Coroner, which the prisoner attended. After a lengthened investigation, the Jury returned a verdict of accidental death, and stated that there was no evidence whatever against the prisoner. In the beginning of the last month, however, the young man at the bar, about twelve o'clock at night, went into a public-house in the City in a state of intoxication, and said that he was the person who murdered Mr. Williams nearly three years since. In consequence of this statement the prisoner was taken into custody, and inquiries of considerable length entered into at the police court, the result of which was, that he was committed for trial on a charge of murder After evidence had been called, Mr. Justice Erle made an intimation that, in his opinion, the death was caused accidentally while the deceased was ment of favourite performers from the higher class houses has proved very advantageous to the treasury. Of Mr. Buckstone's reception here we have already spoken; and now the Keeleys are, for another week, drawing capital houses. From Mr. Dance's clever piece, "The Dustman's Bells," wh ch we noticed at length when produced at the Lyceum, and wh.ch is the first drama in the Surrey bills, we take an illustration, representing Ned (Mr. Keeley) and Sally (Mrs. Keeley), when speaking the following dialogue:

Ned. That's nothing; if you had come a little sooner, you might have heard me give the health of one that I like a good deal better than Susan Rattler.

Sally. (angry) You're too bad for anything.—Who was it pray?

Ned. One Sally Bromley.

Sally Who? me? me, Ned? me?

Ned. Yes, you, you jealous little hussey.

Sally. Well come, you're a good old fellow, after all.

The Lyceum burlesque of "Valentine and Orson" has been revived at the Surrey, somewhat altered and adapted to the present time. Amongst the new lines, those which gained the loudest applause were the following, when Valentine is exhibiting his spoils from the wars:—

King. What is that beam?
Val. The Yankees, sire, to chouse,
We carried off the whole of Shakspeare's house.
I know not how your Government will brook it,
But as they wouldn't buy it, why, I took it;
Also his head, (gives bust) the prize of our campaign.
You ne'er will look upon its like again!

And to plump little Miss Terray, as the singing soubrette, Valentine observes,

And who are you, my fat and pretty crony?
Agatha I am a singer, sir, my name's Albini.
Val. That name! I wonder how you ever took it.
All bony you may be; but you don't look it.

This also brought down a shout of laughter. All the old music is preserved, with some new, Mrs. Keeley singing a parody on "The Standard Bearer" with great effect.

On Monday next, Mr. T. P. Cooke, and Mr. and Mrs. Honner, commence an engagement, when "My Poll and my Partner Joe," and "Blanche Heriot," will be revived.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR SEPTEMBER.

FOR morning dress, or evening promenade, preference is given to taffetas à mille raies, green and white, amaranth and white, chamois and white, rose and white, and blue and white. The redingotes are trimmed with ruches (bee-hives), puked; the materials most in repute being printed tartanas, grenadines, or barèges. We have remarked a beautiful toilette—a lilac robe, with three volants trimmed with ruches in ribbon to match; the corsage open in front, so as to show an embroidered muslin chemisette, trimmed with lace; chapeau of paille de riz, with two tufts of heartsease, placed very low, near the head-dress.

The coiffures for soirées and balls are caps, and crape, lace, paille de riz, with flowers, pearls, and feathers.

The toilettes we have engraved are—chapeau of white crape, with two feathers; robe of taffeta maure, trimmed with passementerie; corsage, half high; cachemere scarf.

Chapeau of paille de riz; robe of taffeta, with large stripes, rose and white; mantelet, grey.

FASHIONS FOR SEPTEMBER.

(From "Berger's Ladies' Gazette of Fashion.")

IT is to the sea-side and the watering place that we must this month direct our attention. The style of early morning dress is nearly the same for both, a pelisse robe of Nankin, with a manicle of the same; trimmed with fancy silk buttons down the front of the dress, and a row of fringe round the mantelet. If the morning is warm, the robe is of jaconet or cambric muslin; it is trimmed down the front with a narrow flounce, festooned at the edge. The corsage and sleeves of the Nankin dress are always tight; those of muslin or cambric, are made with the corsage full, and the sleeves demi large. the pardessus, worn with the latter, either a light scarf or a black silk mantelet. The head-dress is of a capote, of white or drab gros de Naples, or taffeta, a close shape, and the garniture of ribbon to correspond, sometimes with a small tuft of field flowers.

CHAPEAUX.—We may cite, as the latest novelties, chapeaux of white horse-hair lined with taffeta, and trimmed with a row of broad lace, retained at each side of the crown by a bouquet of half-blown roses, encircled with buds and foliage. horse-hair chapeaux are greatly in favour, and so are those of tissu de paille, mixed with horse-hair. Chapeaux of crape, trimmed with tulle, are also in vogue. Paille de riz continues in favour; feathers and flowers are in equal request for decorating it. Some of the most novel chapeaux are composed of alternate bands of rice straw and blonde. Silk chapeaux are not yet general; those most in request are decorated with lace jonchons, thrown over the crown; the ends float on the brim; or form a knot, in which a flower is placed.

PARDESUES of lace and muslin are still predominant. Silk ones are, however, by no means laid aside. Barage Shawls, too, are extensively seen. China crape ones are more in vogue, and will remain in favour during the early autumn; they are of a large size, and edged with long rich fringe. Pelisse Mantles, composed of green taffeta, and lined with white, will be much worn; they are of three-quarter length, and cut so as to sit easily round the upper part of the bust, and flow in easy folds from thence: a pelerine lappel encircles the neck, and descends to the centre of the breast where it ends in points, and is terminated by a fancy silk ornament, from which three tassels descend; a tight effilé, of green and white, edges the lappel, and is surmounted by a narrow border of passementerie. The same style of trimming is continued down the fronts and bottom of the mantle, gradually increasing in breadth, till it nearly reaches the bottom, where it becomes very deep. Hanging sleeves of a large size, looped with tassels, complete the garniture.

ROBES: there is a great variety in the materials, but those of a half transparent kind still predominate. Silks, taffetas, and foulards are equally fashionable, though not so extensively seen. Barèges, muslins of new patterns, mousseline de soie, and white muslin, are also in vogue for the promenade. There is little alteration in form of dresses. The pelisse robe form is still the favourite. Passementerie is still used for trimmings. Dinner dresses have the corsages in general half high. The most elegant evening dresses are of Organdy, a double skirt over white taffeta; the second skirt, considerably shorter than the first, embroidered at each side, and round the border, in a wreath of small vine-leaves in various shades of green; the sides open nearly from the waist, but partially closed by ribbon, arranged in open lozenges, and terminated by a cluster of fringed ends, the first skirt terminated by a deep flounce, festooned with green; the low corsage forming a V in the centre, and trimmed with a Machin lace-pointed berthe. Short sleeves, edged with lace, and looped high over the silk ones by knots, with clusters of short ends of green ribbon.

CAPS have lost nothing of their vogue: those for morning dress are of muslin, or a new kind of net called tulle d'Alençon. The style of trimming is of a very light description. We may cite, also, some Caps composed of blonde d'été, formed of a single piece, attached on each side by pinks panaches, intermingled with Alpine moss. Another coiffure, which we can hardly style a Cap, is formed of a bandeau of gauze ribbon bruche, which serves to fix the six points of a foundation of blonde renaissance.

HEAD DRESSES of hair are always decorated with flowers, but of so many different kinds that we can scarcely say what are the most fashionable; perhaps we may give the palm to white hyacinths, camelias, narcissuses, pinks panaches, some rare exotics, and roses.

COLOURS same as last month.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

WOOTTON CHAPEL, GLOUCESTER.

THIS curious specimen of Norman architecture is situated at the north entrance to the City of Gloucester; it is attached to St. Mary Magdalene, or King James's

WOOTTON CHAPEL, GLOUCESTER.

Hospital, which owed its foundation to the Priory of Lanthony, some remains of which are still standing to the south of Gloucester. The Hospital was originally intended for persons afflicted with leprosy. After the Dissolution, the government of the charity was vested in the corporation of Gloucester, on condition that the Hospital should be re-built. King James ordered it to be called after his own name, and directed that the sum of £19 annually paid by the Crown, should thenceforward be applied to the support of nineteen poor persons, and a Minister. The present establishment consists of nine women, and ten men, each of whom are allowed 1s. 6d. per week. The interior of the chapel is now under repair; and, since the removal of some of the coating of whitewash, some paintings in distemper have been discovered in the chancel. The chancel arch is also in very good preservation—it is in the Norman style, as is also another entrance, which is at present hidden by a modern porch.

IRELAND.

RE-APPEARANCE OF THE POTATOE DISEASE.

We are sorry to find from the Irish papers that the disease has reappeared, and simultaneously, in various counties, and in districts far distant from each other. But the blight, as yet, is less general than in the two preceding years, and has exhibited itself in a form much less virulent. Up to this time the potatoes at market have been very fine in quality; but a considerable portion of those consumed in Dublin have been imported from England. The price ranges from ten-pence to fifteen-pence per stone of fourteen pounds; but at this rate they are beyond the reach of the working classes, who find an excellent substitute in Indian meal and oatmeal, both in abundant supply at very moderate prices.

Accounts have been received from Sligo, Mayo, and Wicklow, to the effect that the blight has unequivocally shown itself in those places. In Grange, County Wicklow, the estate of Mr. Mahony, the potatoes have become tainted, and suddenly, too. The same calamity has occurred, much about the same time, in a distant part of that county; and the authority of Mr. Cooper, of Macree Castle, has been quoted as a testimony of the failure in a part of his county, Sligo.

No inconsiderable portion of the very limited potatoe crop, in Ireland, has already been consumed, so that even if the blight should become general, no very disastrous consequences could ensue. There would, to be sure, be a serious loss of food; but potatoes have altogether ceased to be the food of the labouring classes and the poor, who constitute four or five millions of the population.

A private letter from a respectable firm at Westport, contains the following paragraph:—"The potatoe disease has suddenly reappeared here this week, and they are rotting fast. We hear similar reports from other parts."

With regard to the grain crop, nothing can be more satisfactory than the account from all quarters as to the quantity and the yield. The green crops, too, are getting on well, with the exception of very partial injury to turnips but the breadth sown is enormous.

FAILURE IN DUBLIN.—A respectable house, of old standing in Dublin, recently connected with the corn trade, has suspended payment. The liabilities are estimated at £40,000. A recent failure in the same trade in Sligo was the main cause of this stoppage. A firm in the distillery trade in the nothern province has also stopped payment. The liabilities are not ascertained, but it is understood that they are not serious.

FIRE IN BELFAST.—On Saturday morning a fire broke out on the premises of Messrs M'Adam and Co., wholesale druggists and oil-merchants, in Donegal-street, Belfast, which spread with great rapidity. In the rear of the premises are the stores of Messrs. John Cuppage and Co., linen-yarn merchants; and at the east side, next to Commercial-court, those of Messrs John Dewhirst and Co., flax-spinners. Both these extensive buildings soon caught fire, and a vast amount of property was destroyed. The premises of Messrs. M'Adam, excepting the office and shop, which are not connected with the other buildings, are entirely consumed, as are also the stores of Messrs. Cuppage and Messrs. Dewhurst, and several other parties, which suffered less or more injury. The amount of property destroyed is said to be little less than £30,000.

THE WESTMINSTER HALL EXHIBITION.

"THE PARABLE OF FORGIVENESS."—(PREMIUM £200.)—PAINTED BY JAMES ECKFORD LAUDER.

We have engraved, this week, Mr. James Eckford Lauder's "Parable of Forgiveness;" for which a prize of £200 has been adjudged to the painter. It is No. 93 in the catalogue, and has the following quotation :—

"The kingdom of heaven is likened unto a certain king, which would take account of his servants

"And when he had begun to reckon, one was brought unto him, which owed him ten thousand talents.

"But forasmuch as he had not to pay, his lord commanded him to be sold, and his wife, and children, and all that he had, and payment to be made.

"The servant, therefore, fell down and worshipped him, saying, Lord, have patience with me, and I will pay thee all.

"Then the lord of that servant was moved with compassion, and loosed him, and forgave him the debt." Matthew, chapter xviii. 23rd and following verses.

"The public interest with regard to the Westminster Hall Exhibition," says the Art Union, "continues unabated. The Hall will, consequently, remain open during the whole of September. On former occasions similar exhibitions were closed at the end of August; but, not to mention the superior interest of the present collection, and, perhaps, the increased public taste for works of the kind, it is to be remembered that the architects will soon have occasion to remove the wood fittings in the Hall, and to open the south end as the principal approach to St. Stephen's Porch. The present Exhibition has, therefore, the additional interest of being the last that can take place in Westminster Hall. The public, who have shown themselves so worthy of a rational enjoyment of this kind, may, however, now look forward to a permanent national exhibition of works of Art on the walls of the new Houses of Parliament, and, it is indeed hoped, in other public places."

PRINCE ALBERT'S BIRTHDAY—AUGUST 26, 1847.

On the hoar-wing of Time another year
Comes, to increase the many joys that beam
Around thee and the tender ties so dear
To England's heart. . . Oh! well may it beseem
The loftiest harp, far less the humblest skill,
To laud a Prince most worthy all esteem,
As Consort—Father—one who can excel
In all the kind amenities which lend
Lustre to rank—one loved by Learning well,
Patron of Arts and Freedom's faithful Friend.
Happy may every year the Future brings,
Shine round thee, Prince! while thou in blessing bless'd,
Shalt prove the Father of a line of Kings,
Who to Old England shall be "Pros and Fest."—L.

The Vernon Gallery.—Mr. Vernon has placed at the disposal of the Trustees of the National Gallery the whole of his extensive and valuable collection of the works of British artists—leaving to the Trustees the power of rejecting any they may not conceive worthy of admission. The process of selection is going on at the present moment; but, when it has been made, the pictures selected will not be removed from Mr. Vernon's house in Pall-mall; his present intention being to retain possession of them during his life; chiefly because the Trustees are not now in a position to receive them; part of Mr. Vernon's stipulation being that the pictures shall be exhibited as public property in a room, or rooms, by themselves, under the name of "The Vernon Gallery." This room, or these rooms, have yet to be built. It is understood that Mr. Vernon took this step in order to justify, on the part of the Trustees, such arrangements as may be necessary for their reception. The collection is a most magnificent one, consisting of, perhaps, three hundred choice works by the most eminent masters of the British school—Reynolds, Wilson, Gainsborough, Lawrence, Wilkie, Hilton, Mulready, Maclise, Turner, Landseer, Collins, Etty, Eastlake, Hart, Shee, Leslie, Pickersgill, Lee, Roberts, Stanfield, Smirke, Uwins, Webster, Ward, Creswick, Redgrave, S. Cooper, Lance, Frith, E. M. Ward, Goodall, Herring, and a host of others of scarcely minor note. The works have been in every instance, except those of the masters of the past century, obtained directly from the artists' easels; in their best time; and in almost every case the painting is the chef-d'œuvre of the painter.—From the Art-Union Journal, for September.

The Convict Barber.—The friends of Barber, who was convicted at the Old Bailey in the wills forgery case, and who is now undergoing his sentence of transportation for life, at Norfolk Island, intend convening a public meeting with a view of laying before the public the various statements and documents that they have succeeded in obtaining possession of, and which they confidently state are of such a nature as tends to prove the entire innocence of Barber in any guilty knowledge of the forgeries. Several preliminary meetings have already been held, which have been numerously attended by his personal friends, and gentlemen of high standing in the legal profession, who have formed themselves into a committee for the purpose of endeavouring to obtain a free pardon; a subcommittee has also been appointed for the purpose of preparing a memorial to Sir George Grey, the Secretary of State for the Home Department, embodying the whole of the evidence and facts that the committee are in possession of. This memorial is to be submitted to a general meeting for their approval, and, in the meantime, an application will be made to Sir George Grey to receive a deputation to present the memorial, and be heard in support of the prayer. The most sanguine hopes are said to be entertained by the committee of not only succeeding in obtaining an unconditional pardon for Barber, but in satisfactorily establishing his entire innocence

Death of his Serene Highness Prince William of Lowenstein Wortheim.—Prince William Ernest Louis Charles died a few days ago, at a bathing-place near Ostend. He was born on the 27th of April, 1783, and married 26th July, 1812, the Baroness de Kahlden, by whom his Serene Highness leaves two sons, Prince William, the Secretary to the Prussian Legation in London, and Prince Leopold Damages for Personal Injury.—At the Small Debts Court, North Shields, last week, Mr. Black appeared to answer the information of J. Robson, of the same place, boatman. It appeared that some time ago the complainant was lying in his boat with his hand over the side, when the defendant, in a small boat, ran against the complainant's hand, and injured his finger so severely as to cause amputation to be necessary. The complainant now sought to recover damages, and the Court awarded him £20.

General Steam Navigation Company.—The usual half-yearly meeting of this company was held on Tuesday, Mr. Wilkin in the chair. The Directors' Report, and a statement of the accounts for the half-year end ng the 30th June last, were read to the meeting. The report stated the undiminished prosperity of the company, and in the course of its reading was received with marks of the greatest satisfaction by the proprietary. The customary dividend being declared, the cordial thanks of the meeting were voted to the Chairman and Directors for their unremitting labours in promoting the interests of the Company.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE.

Early on Monday morning, a fire broke out on the extensive premises in the occupation of Mr. Walker, organ-builder, Francis-street, Tottenham-court-road, communicating to Mr. Ripley's, the tailor, and Bernasconi's, the modeller, 27 and 28, and also injuring a number of small habitations on the north of the timber-yard, called New Inn-yard, as well as Dunbar's iron factory. The fire-engines were promptly on the spot, and by the aid of a plentiful supply of water, the men succeeded in subduing the flames, but not before three o'clock, by which time Mr. Walker's premises were completely gutted, those of Mr. Ripley and Mr. Bernasconi greatly injured, also a number of the houses in New Inn-yard; considerable damage being also sustained by the carriage factory belonging to Mr. Morrall, in Huntley-street. The manufactory and timber stores occupied an area of more than an acre, and there was an extensive stock of organs on the premises. In one compartment there was a single organ, just completed, valued at £1100. Of this instrument not a fragment remains. In the open space were piles of mahogany and other valuable woods. In the several workshops were upwards of fifty organs of various sizes, some of them had been in hand nearly twelve months, which are also destroyed. The stock in trade alone destroyed was worth from £10,000 to £12,000, and, with the buildings that have been levelled with the ground, and the value of the men's working tools the damage could not be less than £20,000. The insurances upon the property will not cover the loss. It is to be regretted that upwards of fifty workmen have been thrown out of employment by this unfortunate event, and, to add to their misfortune, they have all lost their tools.

Three escapes belonging to the Royal Society for the Protection of Life from Fire were very speedily at the scene; but no one sleeping on the premises, their services were fortunately not required, and the conductors exerted themselves in saving as much property as they could from the flames.

THE LATE FIRE IN FRANCIS-STREET, TOTTENHAM-COURT-ROAD.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The present was a quiet week, both ashore and afloat, albeit on the turf and on the water—salt and fresh—there were many pleasant trysts—but not of account. Merry meet'ngs, my masters; but not matters for the chronicler. For this reason, we had intended being very serious to-day; in fact, sat down with that purpose—and some pretty strong examples to give force to our precepts. We intended a lecture upon leg-l'm, as a fitting preparation for the l'ger. We were beginning it when the post brought a letter from our "fast man"—all the journals have their "fast men" now. We, therefore, postpone Lady A — and her speculative dilemma; Mr. R——— and his illustration of the doctrine of "Coming events castine their shadows before," and proceed to tell the reader the opinion of our fast correspondent, on an event of recent occurrence

That gentleman is an Irishman of course—and will insert £10,000 a-year on the death of the present proprietor of the property, should he turn out to be the right heir to the deceased. Our "fast man" was one of the "Old Leander Eight," from which the reader will see that he is in every way qualified to treat the subject he has chosen for his present communication. The time, too, though the facts have been already dealt with, is full of interest for the London particular artist in aquatics; for which reason, and the other Christian ob'ect in view, the paragraph of our paper, we proceed to permit his speaking in propria personæ. The issue he has in hand is the late great match between the Thames and the Tyne.

"You might live a thousand years and not see such men get into their boats as the Coombes and the Claspers" (his style, you will observe, is highly characteristic). "If I lost my tin on the latter, as I have a right to speak" (we hope his losses had no reference, however, to the remittance of the £10,000 per annum) "However, I who know how a man should peel, thought the Coombes had overdone the training—their muscles were too clearly cut. 'Twas a mistake not to have the ample rowel by 'an eight;' for the men were off and on us before we could say Jack Robinson"—(we, per force, epitomise the original very considerably). "I rowed in a fairish 'eight;' and, though we started a quarter of a mile ahead, Coombes' four came stealing on in a very ugly way"—(it was a rum 'un—Roman—we suppose); "and in ten strokes they were up and past us. They won in a canter—after the first twelve strokes they had nothing to do. I, who have often—like all good men—rowed a score wager, never that no man could have pulled more pluckily than the Claspers. They never once turned a head so watch their opponents; and they put on a splendid spirit at Barnes—which, if it had been earlier, as I had begun to say, might have given the Coombses some rowing. They were beat, however, by their oars, and by their slow, leggy stroke, and by their checkiness. Only think of their cruc'mpudence—they never once rowed over the course, and were content for the match. The consequence was, their steering was detestable at starting. They are splendid fellows—pinck'd uns to the back-bone, and were appreciated as they ought to be—not a groan or a hiss met their ears though we Thames fellows had a right to be obstreperous.

"There were some small affairs at Richmond and Mortlake, which, of course, I did not bother myself about. I heard, however, that my old friend Wallace, the Lion, as we used to lovingly designate him in the Old Leander Eight, supported his reputation, and went in and won. I must give the dear old fellow a turn myself in a week or so. Yours, PADDY-FROM-CORK."

The above puts in a true light, and language to match, that great passage at oars so recently the cynosure of all rowing circles. We offer it as a sample of the style of the "fast man," as that character of composition has not heretofore appeared. Its success will decide us as to a second appearance.

EGHAM RACES.—THURSDAY.

The programme for the first day contained the most sporting two years-old stake ever witnessed on Runnymede, and, in the aggregate, was highly creditable to the zeal and liberality of the management. The weather, which in the early part of the morning was gloomy and threatening, turned out extremely favourable, and the attendance both in respect of numbers and rank, greatly exceeded our expectation. The stands were well fill-d, and the proprietors of the refreshment booths—foremost among was the Purveyor-General, Caroline—who or late years have found Egham anything but a profitable locality, must have had ample reason to congratulate themselves on the success of their ventures. To repeat, it was a most satisfactory commencement; and we have no doubt that when the neighbourhood shall have obtained the advantages of a direct communication with the metropolis, the inhabitants will find no difficulty in raising from a permanency a handsome annual grant for the day; this, however, they must not flag either in their exertions or their contributions; and they must take great pains to give it greater publicity than they did this year. The racing on Thursday commenced amidst a pelting shower, and there having been enough of them, the sports, notwithstanding time was well observed, were not brought to a close until nearly half past six o'clock

A Plate of 40 sovs, given by the members of the Western Division of the County of Surrey, added to a sweepstake of 5 sovs each. TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—The St. Leger betting rather limited in amount, and confined to a few horses, was of importance, if only for the lift it gave Cossack and Planet, both of whom, it will be seen, are in advance of last week's quotations. Eryx gave way, and Philosopher, one of Scott's lot, came with a "rush." We cannot believe in him. Closing averages:—

LITERATURE.

THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND DURING THE THIRTY YEARS' PEACE. 1815—1845 By CHARLES KNIGHT. Parts II. and III. C. Knight.

Some eighteen months since, we noticed this important work (then at its commencement), as "a work of extreme difficulty." This has been proved, in some respects, by its slow progress; but, in the faith of this leading to a better digestion of the abundant materials, and, as a consequence, to a better work, that delay is not to be regretted. The author of life, it is true, runs fastly on, but its records, if destined for posterity, must not be written volante calamo; especially if the historian follow the advice of the sage, and read not to take for granted, but to weigh and consider. Thus, as we said before, to write contemporary history with accuracy, is a manifold difficulty: for example, must readers of two score years, will be able to test the circumstantial accuracy of the work before us by his own recollection of the events themselves, or versions of them written almost at the instant of their occurrence

The portion of the History before us comprises a continuation with a chapter on Lord Exmouth's expedition to Algiers, in 1816, a very interesting "episode in the History of the Peace;" the enduring triumph of which was the release, in three days of the battle, of a thousand and eight-three Christian slaves! What a contrast does this single act present to the devastation with fire and sword which other victors have spread through the same country: their records must ever be dyed with heinous crimes of human victims!

The next Chapter reviews the progress of Social Improvement. Thus, we have Romilly's Reform of the Criminal Laws; the state of the Metropolitan Police; the introduction of Gas-lighting; the spread of general enlightenment; the administration of the Poor Laws; together w th Agricultural Education, and the institution of Savings Banks (another moral safe-guard)—all treated of in this chapter. With this authority to refresh our memories, we strongly urge it is to be feared that although the flagrant abuses of the Police System were known in 1816, they were not reformed until 1829; that, in 1816, gas-lighting was opposed by Lord Lauderdale, because it would injure the whale fisheries and the British oak! Such were the mistakes of thirty years since. But a greater error still was Wordsham's false estimate of Education, and Cobbett's coarse abuse of Savings Banks! This is an important chapter, and extremely interesting by its familiar illustration of great questions of domestic policy.

The succeeding Chapter—on Spanish America—has been contributed to the Editor by a friend: it is a most valuable addition to the work, and will be found having a complete view of the complicated events upon which the ultimate independence of South America was established. the principles, and the policy, and the powerless assumption of the Holy Alliance, and the interventions of foreign nations, are vividly sketched, and their results comprehensively estimated.

The "History" now returns to home matters, with the Opening of Parliament in 1817, upon the occasion of the Princess Charlotte's death. The opening Parliament, furnished the alarm of "the pop-gun plot." The temper of the Regent, and the artifice of his Ministers, are thus emphasized by the historian: "was it that the Regent and his Ministers had heard the upbraidings, the groans of the multitude, and had sustained a rude insult from some reckless hand, had urged his Ministers to he career which they were now entering upon, of exaggerating discontents and dangers that had scarcely existed but in the imagination of the poor in the minds of the rich, and confounding the reformer and the anarchist in one general hatred?" The Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act followed; next, the famous march of the Blanketeers, and the insurrection in Nottingham, Leicester, and Derby,—their atrocious conspiracies and absurd struggles, illustrated by the autobiography of one of the actors, Samford, the Radical; and another, in a higher grade of State himself, who, it should be explained, was kept constantly in a fever by the fears of the great and rich about plots, and "sedition and treason." The end was one of tragical retribution, especially now that time has revealed the culminations of the odious spy system by which the alarm was excited, which it took something beyond justice to quiet. However, it is easy to predict à posteriori. The recently published Life of Lord Sidmouth, by the Dean of Norwich, is a fortunate contribution to the history of these unhappy days, of which Mr. Knight has judiciously availed himself.

The next Chapter is occupied with the details of the memorable Prosecutions for Libel, in 1817; in which the three trials of William Hone, "amongst the most remarkable in our Constitutional history," are narrated with graphic vigour

The conclusion of the Spa fields riots pretty well told: "The triumph of the weak over the powerful was complete. 'The frame of adamant,' as the biographer of Lord Sidmouth terms the Chief Justice (Ellenborough), quailed before the indomitable courage of a man who was roused into energies which would seem only to belong to the master-spirits that have swayed the world. Yet this was the man who, in the ordinary business of life, was incapable of enterprise and persevering energy, who lived in his books and corners of his antiquarianism; who was one that even his old political opponents came to regard as a gentle and innocuous banter after 'all such rending as was never read;' who, in a few years, gave up his political connexion, and, devoting himself to his old poetry and his old divinity, passed a quarter of a century after this conflict in peace with all mankind, and died the sub-editor of a religious journal." How many of the political grand-parents of our times has passed the similar quietude.

The last Chapter, a brief one, recites the Death of the Princess Charlotte, the great historical event of 1817. This is very nicely written, as in the following just reflection: "It is a remarkable example of the vanity of human fears, that the people who wept, as a people without hope, for the bereavement of Charlotte Augusta, should have thought her premature death, especially as such a female relic, of virtues, of generous sympathies with popu ar rights, of bold and liberal encouragement of sound improvement, as they had associated with her character—perhaps more than any other event, as a calamity, devoted to the old poetry and his old divinity, passed a quarter of a century after this conflict in peace with all mankind, and died the sub-editor of a religious j urnal." How many of the political grand-parents of our times has passed the similar quietude.

We have been thus m nute in our notice of this "History," from a persuasion that, when completed, it will be a highly acceptable work to the reading classes; that it is, as far as yet produced, a careful compilation; and that it takes a much higher range, in presenting us with common-sense views of great public events, which are weighed and considered in a generous and dispassionate tone of humanity and benevolence.

SELVAN'S PICTORIAL HANDBOOK TO THE CLYDE, AND ITS WATERING PLACES. Johnstone, Paternoster row.

This is a well-timed work, for her Majesty's Scotch Tour will, no doubt, induce many persons, who are undecided as to where they shall spend their vacation, to visit the Clyde, the Fal s, and the Lochs, of which Sylvan gives so attractive a description. He takes the stranger by the hand at Glasgow, and leads him from thence through a district unrivalled in beauty of scenery and historical associations. The book is exceedingly well got up, is illustrated with numerous engravings, and two maps of the route showing all the roads, railways, &c. A copy of this little Guide was presented to her Majesty on the eve of her departure for the North.

MARIE. From the French. Edited by Count D'ORSAY. Chapman and Hall.

A perfect prose pastoral is contained in this little volume. The story is simplicity itself, and its interest springs wholly from the manner in which it is treated It is intended as a picture of the "Simple Life," and unwholesome style of writing that has so long prevailed in French literature, in which even crime is darkened and exaggerated. There is a freshness about this rural tale refreshing as the hill-side breezes. The author, Lamartine, the name of his wife, has been given, for he is no ordinary writer. In the translation, some French idioms are to be traced, and terms retained, for which perfect English equivalents exist. But there is a quiet grace in the narrative itself, and the author has evidently an eye for nature and knowledge of the heart.

THE HANDBOOK OF JOKING. Grant and Griffith.

This little book essays to touch in what line "a jest's prosperity." It is a mere bagatelle—a joke, as the author himself call s it, to teach every man to be funny. It discourses of the art of Joking, and of Jokes, practical, very small, literary, poetical, punning, extempore, mock, conundrums, mal-apropos, dry, sledge-hammer, Yankee; national, advertising, useful, &c. It attempts to be smart in every page, with various success, but never with ill-nature and satire.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—A great gloom was thrown over the market to-day, by the accumulation of the failures of another firm in the corn trade. The Baltic ships are little, if anything, short £150,000. Although the arrivals of English wheat, since Monday, have been but moderate, and the show of samples small, the demand for that article was excessively dull, and all descriptions might have been purchase at a reduction in the quotations of 2s per quarter At the conclusion of business scarcely a moiety of the supply had been disposed of. A very large grain ity of foreign wheat was pressed for sale All kinds were a more than equally dull, and 2s per quarter cheaper than on Monday The imports have exceeded 27 000 quarters In barley next to nothing was doing, and the currencies had a downward tendency. Malt trade was excessively dull, at 1s to 2s per quarter less money. Oats were in large supply and heavy request, at a fall in value of from 1s to 2s per quarter All other articles have been purchased on easier terms

ARRIVALS.—English Wheat, 3239 ; barley, 110 ; malt, 877 ; oats, 840. Irish: Wheat barley, —; malt, —; oats 910. Foreign: Wheat, 17 900. Barley, 3360; malt, ——, oats, 2, 8.0. Flour, 1300 sacks, 1300 barrels

Tongland and Cork, black, 19s to 21s; ditto white, 20s to 22s, ditto boxes, 21s to 23s; Sligo, 44s to 46s; ditto 47s to 49s per quarter less money. Oats were in large supply and heavy request, at a fall in value of from 1s to 2s per quarter All other articles have been purchased on easier terms

Seed Market.—Canary seed has been in improved request, at very full prices. In all other kinds of seeds, no trade is doing that the quotations are almost nominal. A few parcels of new mustard seed have sold at from 7s to 11s per bushel. Cakes are quite as dear.

Linseed, English, sowing, 52s to 56s per quarter; ditto, crushing, 50s to 52s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 46s to 48s. Hempseed, 32s to 36s per quarter. Coriander, 18s to 21s per cwt. Brown Mustard seed, 9s to 10s; white ditto, 8s to 10s. Tares, 5s 6d to 6s 6d per bushel. English Rapeseed (new) £31 to £33 per last of ten quarters. Linseed cakes, English, £13 to £13 10s, ditto, foreign, £8 10s to £10 per 1000: Rapeseed cakes, £7 10s to £8 0s per ton. Canary, 60s to 64s per quarter English Clover-seed, red, —s to —s; extra, —s to —s; white, —s to —s; extra, up to —s. Foreign, red, —s to —s; extra, —s; white, —s to —s; extra, —s per cwt.

Bread The prices of wheaten bread in the Metropolis are from 8d to 9½d; of household ditto, 6d to 7½d per 4 lbs loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 62s 6d; barley, 38s 11d; oats, 29s 9d; rye, 38s 5d, beans, 50s 2d; peas, 47s 4d.

The Last Weeks' Average.—Wheat, 71s 11d; barley, 43s 7d; oats, 30s 0d; rye, 41s 11d; beans, 53s 4d; peas, 47s 4d.

Tea.—On the whole, a steady business is doing in this article, by private contract, and prices are well supported. Two small public sales have taken place, and a fair quantity has sold at last little alteration in value.

Sugar.—Raw prices having been firmly demanded for all kinds of raw sugar, business has been somewhat checked; yet the rates have an upward tendency. Refined goods are in fair ad 54s 6d for crown, and 55s 6d per cwt. for standard loaves Coffee.—Most descriptions of coffee command a steady, though not to any brisk, inquiry, at late rates.

Provisions.—We have to report a very inactive demand for Irish butter at a decline in the quotations of 1s per cwt. Carlow, landed, is quoted at 86s to 92s; Carrick, 86s to 90s; Clonmel, 88s; 92s; Cork, 88s to 90s, and Waterford and Limerick, 86s to 88s per cwt. English butter is very dull, and is prices lower. Fine Dorset, fine to fine, making 96s to 104s; second 84s to 90s, per cwt. Fresh, 9s to 10s per dozen lbs Foreign butter is in good supply, and very inquiry, at a decline of from 1s to 2s per cwt. Fine Friesland and 96s to 98s: middling 90s to 92s and other kinds 78s to 90s per cwt. The arrivals of bacon are small, yet the trade is heavy, at barely the late improvement in value. In all other kinds of provisions, very little is doing.

Tallow.—This market is in a very dull state, owing to the large importations, and prices are dec ined 2s to 3s per CWT On the spot, is 47s; and for delivery in the last two months, 46s to 46s 3d, per cwt. town tallow, 47s 3d, net cash

Hops.—Fresh parcels for the best Sussex and Kents are plentiful; favourable accounts of the prospects of the hops have come to hand to-day, and it is stated that picking will be shortly commenced in parts of Kent and Sussex. Fine Brown, fine to fine, making 5gs; large ditto, 4gs 10s; inferior ditto, 4gs 2s to 4gs 6d; prime ditto, 4gs 6d to 4gs 10s; vent, 3s 10d to 4s 10d; small pocks, 4s 6d to 5s 10d; mid. 3s 10d to 4s 6d; ordinary ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 6d; sucklings, 4s 10s to 5s 10s; and coarse and stony pockets, 1gs to 1gs 5s each. Bearts, 1gs; cows, 1ls, sheep and lambs, 11,980; calves 869; pigs, 270.

Newspaper and Leadenhall (Friday).—Only a moderate business was transacted here this morning, at full prices.

Per Rail, by the carcass.—Inferior beef, 2s 10d to 3s 6d; middling ditto 3s 8d to 3s 8d; prime large ditto 3s 10d to 4s 4d; prime small ditto 4s 6d; inferior mutton, 3s 6d to 4s 4d; middling ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 6d; prime ditto, 4s 8d to 4s 10d; veal, 3s 10d to 4s 10d; small pork, 4s 8d to 5s 10d; ditto, 4s 4d to 4s 6d per 8lbs.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The books for transfer of the following Stocks will close as follows:—

Bank Stock, Sept. 21	..	Opens Oct. 15
Three per Cent Reduced, Sept. 9	..	Opens Oct. 20
Three-and-a-Quarter per Cent., Sept. 10	..	Opens Oct. 20
Long Annuities, Sept. 21	..	Opens Oct. 20
Annuities for terms of years, Sept. 10	..	Opens Oct. 20

The rate of discount at the Bank of England, for first class paper, continues 3 per cent., and the Joint-Stock Banks are paying 3 per cent. for money, to be re-paid on demand, or 5½ to 6½ for short but fixed periods. The prospect of any improvement in this state of affairs must be still regarded as distant, while the demand on the part of the Railways continues rather to increase than diminish. A glance at the advertisements put forth last week will sufficiently prove the improbability of any great reduction in the value of money, however productive the harvest may prove. The Great Western, London, Brighton, and South Coast, Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton, Caledonian, Midland, Great Western, Manchester and Leeds, Eastern Counties and Norfolk, Railway, with several others, are in the market for mort gage loans at 5 per cent., and the greater number have found it requisite to lengthen the period for which they propose to borrow. From the difficulty of collecting calls, all the lines now in progress of formation, will resort to the same expedient the moment that the terms of their several acts permit. Thus do increased demands on the Money Market must be anticipated, and it is difficult to conjecture what will be the result. The stoppage of many lines, when the amount of calls at present in hand is exhausted, appears more than probable, and in many who now look with nearly easy eyes, will find it prudent to withhold commencement. It is to be earnestly hoped that the Legislature will, early next Session, take steps to relieve the commercial world of these demands upon industry, by extending the period. This will be a safer and more effective measure than tampering with the currency. The latter would only allow the difficulties to increase until beyond control, and panic must fearful than that of 1825 would inevitably and speedily follow, and lead to a state approaching national bankruptcy.

The English Market has been heavy, a d dec ining during the week, in consequence of the approaching accounts for the session of property, from next Thursday, when it passed off, with but indifferent success to the speculators for the rise. Very heavy differences will have to be settled, Consols having quoted at the opening in July, 88¾ to 89, while at the close of the August account 86¾ was the money price, giving a difference of 2½ per cent. against the bull party. From July till the present period the tendency has been gradually downwards, with but few exceptions to the rule, and the only recognised bargains were at the following rates: Mexican, 5 per Cent., 1846, 18¾; Portuguese 4 per cent, 25; Spanish, 3 per Cent., 29¼; Dutch, 2½ per Cent. Account, 56; Ditto, 4 per Cent. Certificates, 88¾.

The Share Market has not materially varied during the week, although some important meetings have taken place. The Ambergate, Nottingham, and Boston shareholders have succeeded in remo eling the direction, and have, by an amicable arrangement, postponed all contracts for constructing the line between Bulwell and Lincoln, involving the purchase of the canal. An immediate saving of £800,000 will be effected by this step, and the portion of the line intended for construction will be finished, it is said, by May, without any further call. The Norfolk Railway Shares have improved considerably during the week, having receded to 105, but have since m oved to 110. An issue or shares to the extent of £105,000, bearing 5½ per cent. guaranteed interest, and anticipated reduction in the working expenses, is announced for subscription. The markets heavy at closing prices, being for—Birmingham, Wolverhampton, and Dudley, 15½; Boston, Stamford, and Birmingham, 8½; Caledonian, 31½; Ditto, Half Shares, 14; Ditto, Anglo, 2½; Ditto, Shares of Arms, 18 ex; Ditto York Extension, 5½; Eastern Union, 5½; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 64½; Ditto Half Shares, 21; Great Northern, 24½; Ditto, London and York, 13½; Great North of England, Original Shares, 140; Ditto, Quarter Shares, 35; Hull and Selby, 102; Hull and Manchester, 19½; Leeds and Bradford, 92½; London and Blackwall, 6; London, Brighton, and South Coast, 48½; Ditto Pref. Con., Five per Cent., 49; London and North Western, 164; Ditto, Half Shares, 82½; Ditto ditto New, 10½; Ditto Fifths, 14½; London and South Western, 67½; Ditto New Consolidated Eighths, 4⅝; Ditto, ditto, £40, 3½; Mid and, 115½; Ditto, £40 Shares, 44½; Ditto, Norfolk, 105; Newcastle and Berwick, 26½; Ditto, New, 8½; Norfolk, 110; Ditto, New, £20, 6½; Ditto, Extension, 12½; North British, 29½; Ditto, Half Shares, 13½; Ditto, Quarters, 6½; Ditto Thirds, 4½; North Staffordshire, 9½; North Staffordshire, 8½; Scottish Central, 37½; Shrewsbury and Birmingham 14 x1 : Ditto, ditto, Class B., 14½; Shropshire Union, 13½; South Eastern and Dover, 34½; Ditto, No 4, 5½; South Wales, 9½; South Haven Dock and Railway, 2½; Ditto, Newcast.e, 24½ 3 4; Ditto, Extension, 14½; Ditto, Preference, 11; York and North Midland Extension, 37½ p; Ditto, Preference, 13½; Ditto, East and West Riding Extension, 24½, Northern of France, 10½; Paris and Lyons, 9½; Paris and Strasbourg, 9½; Sambre and Meuse, 8½.

SATURDAY MORNING.—The failure of another firm connected with the Corn Trade was announced yesterday. It was of long standing and respectability, transacting business principally with Essex and Sussex. Consols were rather more animated yesterday at opening, but closed less firmly. The last prices were 86¾ to 87¼ for Account. There was nothing worthy of record in the Foreign or Share Markets.

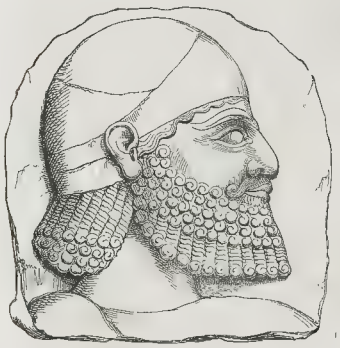
THE NIMROUD MARBLES AT THE BRITISH MUSEUM.—SECOND ARRIVAL.



NO. 1.—TURBANED HEAD.

SHORTLY after the publication of our former article upon the interesting Sculptures from Nimroud, which had then been deposited in the British Museum, several cases filled with additional Sculptures arrived in the London Docks, consigned to the care of Mr. Stirling, of Sheffield, with a view to their final transfer to the National Collection. The importance of the Sculptures to the Scriptural inquirer, induced us to examine them minutely, and to fully detail that portion which first reached this country. In continuation of the subject, we propose on the present occasion to furnish some account of the last importation, and trust that our readers may not be unwilling to receive it, although some time may yet elapse before we shall be able to complete the History by describing the second part of the first collection now on its way to England. It would appear that Mr. Hector, an enterprising English merchant of Bagdad, who had resided during many years in the country, had long turned his attention to archæological science, and been led to make some excavations at Khorsabad, in the vicinity of that mine of antiquities first found, and now exhausted, by M. Botta, the French Consul at Mossul. Mr. Hector was so fortunate as to succeed in rescuing several fragments of great value to us, as links in the chain of research, without which the collection of these remains would have been imperfect; and he lost no time in forwarding the result of his labours to the charge of his intelligent friend, Mr. Stirling, of Sheffield. Mr. Stirling was well aware that the public attention had been considerably attracted to the excavations going on amongst the ruins of Nineveh; and he, therefore, immediately took active measures towards securing these fresh records for the nation. He put himself into communication with the authorities of the British Museum, and eventually effected the transfer of the curious property to the Trustees for £400, an amount which we hope will not deter our enterprising countryman from embarking in a second speculation, as we presume that this ancient soil is rich in similar records of the past. We will now proceed with our description, by continuing the arrangement adopted in our first Paper, so that the series of articles, when concluded, will form a complete catalogue of the entire collection of Assyrian antiquities in the British Museum; subject, of course, to such alteration of numbers as the ultimate classification by the authorities may render necessary.

No. 1 of this fresh arrival is a head with a turban laid in folds close round; a row of curls appears from underneath the turban at the back; the beard is short and formally curled, and no ear-rings are visible.—(See the Engraving.)

No. 2 is a head uncovered; the hair arranged in six formal rows of curls at the back; the face is very full, and quite beardless; a three-lobed ear-ring is shown.—(See the Engraving.)

No. 3.—Head similar to the last, with the turbans alike. The shoulder indicates that the left arm is raised. In all these heads, the remains of colouring matter can be seen in the eyes.

No. 4.—Head similar to No. 2; but the ear-ring is a long pendant, instead of three-lobed; the neck of the robe is embroidered, and colour is still visible in the eyes and hair.

No. 5.—Head like No. 2 in all respects; embroidery represented on the part of the garment which is visible on the shoulder.

No. 6.—Head like the last, but without indication or colour. An ornament, resembling a chain of metal plates, appears over the shoulder.

No. 7.—Turbaned head, like No. 1, but with considerable colour in the eye. The thumb and palm of the hand are visible upon the right shoulder.

No. 8.—Fragment, containing two human feet, and the fetlock of a horse. The foot of the horse, with a portion of the tail, are in front; and immediately behind is a human foot, with a part of the fringed and embroidered garment above it. The second foot, which has a similar fringed garment above, belongs to a distinct figure. Three rows of cuneiform characters, in a very perfect state, form the base of this fragment.

No. 9. Entire figure of the King: dimensions, 8 feet 11 inches and 3 feet. His cap is the usual truncated cone, richly decorated, with the small cone at the top, and the two long embroidered and fringed fillets depending from the back. He wears long pendant earrings, and his beard is very long, and, like the hair, formally curled. The under dress reaches to the feet; it is embroidered with rosettes in square compartments, and bordered with a tasselled fringe. The mantle is adorned with rosettes, disposed over its surface, and has, besides, a fringe, with an embroidered heading. The sandals on his feet are painted. His left hand rests upon the hilt of his sword, the two-lioned scabbard of which appears at the back. His right hand is raised, and holds a long staff. Upon the wrists are bracelets, with richly-carved rosettes; and on his arm is a decorated metal armlet, lapping over.—(See the Engraving.)

NO. 9.—FIGURE OF KING.

No. 10.—Entire figure, the same as the preceding. This figure is beardless, the head uncovered, and the hair elaborately curled in the same fashion as all the other beardless figures. The carving is a highly-ornamented pendant; he wears an armlet wrapped twice round the arm and elaborately finished at each end, and on the wrists are bracelets of four rings, connected by a rosette-shaped clasp. He has sandals on his feet. The robe, which reaches to his feet, has a deep knotted fringe with an embroidered heading, and over the robe is worn a peculiar article of dress suspended from the neck to below the waist. It consists of a broad band of embroidery like that on the robe, from the entire length of which falls a double row of fringe or fur extending to the knee, and covering in the whole of the back of the figure from the shoulder—it, likewise, forms a covering to the arm, to a little above the elbow. The sword hilt appears in this ornamented band, and the point protrudes at the back of the figure. The right hand is clasped in the left in the conventional attitude of respect mentioned formerly, and would suggest that this figure is an attendant upon some important personage. In front of the figure is a part of a sword, and a portion of a fringed garment, indicating that this is but one of a group.

No. 11.—Figure, size three feet three and one foot four. This apparently represents a priest. The hair and long beard are elaborately curled, and round the head is a chaplet of twisted cords and rosettes, tied behind, the tassel being visible; as is, also, the large tassel under the hair. He wears long pendant ear-rings, over-lapping armlets on the arm, and rosette clasped bracelets on the wrists. The right hand is raised holding what seems to resemble a pine cone; and in the left hand, which is slightly extended, is an implement like a whip with three thongs, with large beads at the end of each; or, as is more probable, a branch of some plant, either a mystic emblem or an offering. The figure is attired in a short under-dress with embroidery and knotted fringe; a long mantle with a simple fringe; two cords and tassels depending from the waist. Passing under the right arm, and over the left shoulder, is a deep fringe or fur, headed by embroidery, apparently a similar article of costume to that described in the last figure

No. 12.—Fragments of two colossal horses' heads, richly caparisoned in the highly decorated head-trappings, the parts of which resemble those at present in use in the East. A hand is seen holding the horses, but no other part of the figure remains.—(See the Engraving.)

Nos. 13 and 14.—Fragments of smaller horses' heads, similarly decorated.

No. 15.—Figure of Priest, like No. 11—with a similar chaplet on the head. The right hand is upraised, and the left holds the same implement or branch as before described. The feet are without sandals, and the dress is the same excepting that the short tunic is without fringe, whilst the upper robe is embroidered above the fringe. The foregoing contains the details of the fragments at present before the public. There are, however, some few others now undergoing repair, and, as they will be arranged within a few days, we will conclude by enumerating them. The first and most important, is a figure of the same dimensions as Nos. 9 and 10. The head is uncovered, the hair and long beard are elaborately curled; two long embroidered and fringed fillets hang from the back of his head. The remaining details of the dress are the same, in all respects as No. 10, excepting that the robe is richly ornamented. The armlets resemble those worn by the King in No. 9—and the bracelets have ten strings connected by large rosettes. The right hand of this figure is upraised, and the left rests upon the handle of the sword, which appears under and behind the surcoat.—(See the Engraving.) The end of a staff is seen in front of this figure, and we should much like to examine whether the corresponding part at No. 9 does not fit, as we are disposed to think that these two figures represent an interview between the great King and possibly the governor of some province of the empire.

The next is a Figure of the same size as Nos. 11 and 15. He holds a bow in his left hand, and two arrows in his right. His quiver is slung behind him, and his fringed tunic, wrapping over in front, reaches but midway down the thigh. His beard is short and curled, and his head is uncovered.

The fourth fragment is a Figure of the same size as the last. He is habited in a long robe, with scalloped fringe embroidered above; and the upper dress is open in the front. The figure, like the former, is bareheaded, and has a short curled beard. The left hand is raised, and holds a bag, or water-skin, which the right hand supports at the back.

The remaining fragments consist of a part of a Head, with a short beard; two hands and arms, with rosette-clasped bracelets, one being of colossal size; and the point of a scabbard decorated with the two lions.

It will be seen by the foregoing description that this second collection of Sculptures is deficient in that poetical and historical interest which so eminently distinguished the previous arrival, almost every fragment of which told its peculiar tale, and instructed us in the manners and customs of the period. It is true that a first view would lead us to suppose that these Sculptures consist only of isolated figures; a more mature inspection, however, would soon satisfy the observer that such is not the case; and that they form parts of large, and even colossal ranges of Sculptures, similar in character to the smaller friezes of Nimroud. But even if it were so, if they did consist only of a series of isolated figures, we must not, therefore, infer that they are the less worthy of notice: for, apart from their great superiority as regards mechanical execution, the mere fact that they are the only specimens we can obtain from the place of their exhumation (all the other Sculptures from Khorsabad being the property of the French Government) would alone render them of great moment to us. It is for these reasons that we have devoted so much space to the subject, and we hope that our readers will not esteem our researches amongst such furtive matter as an undue encroachment upon their patience.

In conclusion, it may not be altogether irrelevant to add a few words regarding the mode of transporting such immense masses of stone across the country from the sites of excavation to the sea-coast; not by any means the least interesting or wonderful work, in the absence of machinery and the usual mechanical appliances. The slabs are conveyed to the banks of the river by men, aided, in some instances, by rude rollers, where suitable portions of trees happen to be near at hand. Arrived at the banks of the Tigris, the precious relics are placed upon rafts, constructed of wood and reeds, sustained by skins inflated with air, such as the inhabitants ordinarily use in transporting their merchandise from Diarbekir to Bagdad, at which city the merchant lands his cargo. He then breaks up the raft, sells the materials at a profit, expels the air from the skins, packs them upon a mule, and returns by land to his home to prepare new rafts for fresh speculations. At Bagdad, the Sculptures are transferred to boats with single sails which convey them to the Persian Gulf, where they are again transferred to the ships appointed to bring them to England.

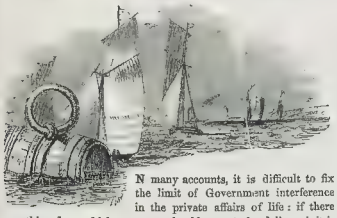
THE RIVER AND THE STEAMERS.



In many accounts, it is difficult to fix the limit of Government interference in the private affairs of life: if there is anything from which a country should pray to be delivered, it is a Government that arrogates to itself the title and duties of a "paternal" one, for under it a people soon becomes apathetic, dependent, and almost incapable of exertion. But total neglect of what may be called the internal police of a nation, is quite as mischievous; and this is the side on which we err. For the protection of property, we have more extensive and better arrangements than any people of Europe; we are well watched and well lighted, at all hours and in all places: the depredator of a handkerchief scarcely has hold of your property, ere the law, through its officer, has tight hold of him. The silk bandana, the net purse, and the watch, are not left exclusively to your own custody—a free and constitutional Government has its eye on them, and its strong hand on all who may be tempted to effect an unauthorised transfer of the possession.

Your life, on the other hand, is but partially cared for; no individual, certainly, may kill or slay you, with weapons or otherwise; but Corporations and Companies, enrolled "according to Act of Parliament," may make away with and destroy you almost with impunity. With a good dividend in view, the great conveyancers of the age may cut down expenses to the lowest possible point, may load trains and crowd steamers to the utmost limit of what they will hold; and when an accident happens, the public is thrown into a "state of great excitement," General Pasley investigates, a Coroner enquires, a few widows and orphans are thrown on the public funds for support; if the case is very bad, some underling is discharged, or perhaps imprisoned: but more frequently it turns out that nobody is to blame, that, on the contrary, everybody has been "most exemplary and attentive in the discharge of their duties," and in a few days the whole affair is forgotten, and things go on just as before.

The destruction of the Cricket steamer, loaded with people in the midst of what may now be called one of the most public thoroughfares of London, though attended with a loss of life almost miraculously small compared to what it might have been under any other circumstances, or had it occurred a few minutes sooner or later, has excited rather more than the usual degree of attention.

As some thousands have during the past year run a daily risk of being scalded to death, blown to atoms, or drowned by a cheap company, for "the small sum of a halfpenny," there is at the present moment a lively sense of peril escaped, and some doubts whether cheapness may not in some cases be dearly purchased. We will avail ourselves of the opportunity to make a few observations on the whole condition of the London river, and the conveyance upon it, which we have no hesitation in pronouncing disgraceful to the age.

The Cricket and its engines were a product of the spirit of competition carried to the point where it becomes dangerous to the public, instead of serviceable. The problem whether it was possible to convey a mass of some two hundred human beings through a certain space, by steam, at a halfpenny each, with a profit, was decided in the affirmative by certain speculators; only one element was left out of the calculation—the safety of those conveyed; that was a matter of perfect indifference. The ignorance of the mass of the public on all such matters is total and complete; and as in a city with nearly two millions of inhabitants there is always an immense number to whom cheapness is an object, any scheme, with that for the bait, will answer in a money sense. If a company were to knock together a hulk of rotten wood in the shape of a steamer, and fit it with engines warranted to burst at the lowest pressure—yet if they offered to carry the confiding and careless public at a farthing a head, twice the distance it is possible to do for a penny, the wretched tub would be loaded till there was no standing room. Now the question is, whether individual avarice should be allowed to speculate unchecked on public ignorance, with the certainty of causing an indefinite destruction of human life? We think not. While a case of manslaughter, or murder, or homicide by misadventure, sets in motion a whole machinery for detection and punishment, the prevention of wholesale slaughter, perpetrated for the gain of a certain per centage on so much capital, ought to be made rather more difficult than it is at present. To those who mingled with the terror-stricken crowds who gathered at the river side after the explosion of the Cricket, it was evident that a sense of a want of some protection against the "competition" of the many speculators in locomotion, exists in the public mind. Vague expressions that "the Government ought to do something," were frequent; it is useless to say the public need not use these modes of conveyance if they do not like; the bulk of the public neither reason, nor enquire, nor have the means of enquiring, whether a steamer or a railway is safe or not. They see a certain price, and a certain distance they are to be carried for it; they rush in thousands to the "cheap" boat, or the "cheap" excursion train—the very immensity of the number giving an idea of security; and it is only some hideous accident that startles them into a knowledge of the truth, and of the rottenness of the material agents their lives are trusted to.

It may be said, too, that by law there is some power of inspection and control given to somebody over these matters; Acts of Parliament certainly exist, but they are dead letters; practically, they are never enforced. Who inspected or warranted safe, the engines of the Cricket, about which the most that is known is, that they were meant to effect an un-heard-of saving in fuel. No one knows whether either captain or engineer were at their post; it is said to be a common practice in the river steamers to leave the engines to themselves for uncertain intervals of time, short or long, as the case may be; there is no periodical examination of the boats or machinery; it is left to the conscience of the proprietors to work both as long as they will hold together; if a case of palpable neglect is seen by the passengers, there are no means of punishing it; and even after such a dreadful accident as the last, on the first day of the inquest, no one attended on the part of the Government, either to speak to the state or nature of the engines, or to watch the enquiry on the part of the public, nor was it was stated that any official measures had been taken in the matter. The proprietors of the boat and the makers of the engines were represented by skilled legal gentlemen, ready to twist every statement of public ignorance or public fear to the advantage of their clients; in fact, to entangle and confuse the main question as much as possible, that the blame, if there be any, may, as usual, rest on—nobody. What chance has the public under such circumstances?

The more closely the system of conveyance on the river is examined, the more plainly it will be seen that the wholesome regulations enforced on land have not been applied to it—though they are much more required. We will run over a few points of contrast.

Every omnibus, every driver, and every conductor is numbered, and, in case of insolence, overcharge, or misconduct, summary process is very possible: it is the same with every cab; and the knowledge of the hold their fare has on them, insures a very fair degree of civility and good conduct: considering their numbers, summonses are rare; and, it has been remarked, by one of the London Magistrates, that, in any dispute as to distance, in the majority of cases the cabman is right. Compare this control and its result with the state of things on the river: the ticket-sellers and ticket-takers on the piers, and their hangers-on, are, perhaps, the most unprincipled and ill-conducted men of their class in the metropolis. If they think they have the slightest chance of success, they will deny the receipt of a check, and exact the fare again; and the amount of plunder realised in this way is immense: where they cannot effect this they are insolent to excess; and, as there is generally a knot of four or five supporting each other, a single passenger has no chance: threats of violence, gross abuse, sometimes actual assaults, are common; and very few of these cases ever come before a Magistrate, for, to punish a steamboat official, you must hunt up a whole series of officers: if you find somebody called a secretary he refers you to somebody else called a solicitor, and you are politely informed you "may bring an action!"

A policeman is, of course, never to be found, and any enquiry as to the name of any of these vagabonds, is quite useless. As to the safety of the public, it is left to chance; the only check on the number of passengers is the vessel's power of floating. As long as she can swim the captains pack them together, till it is just possible to stand upright, under tight compression; the swaying of the boats is sometimes awful, and we have seen old sailors, who had often crossed the Atlantic, turn pale at the evident danger of which the cockney freight was blissfully, but not severely ignorant. One crack in the machinery, and its consequent alarm and rush, would send the whole mass to the bottom; and some day it will happen. This scene is hourly repeated; yet while licensing omnibuses and hackney carriages for a certain number of passengers only, we suffer a steamer to pile up human beings on its deck till even avarice begins to fear, and puts off just clear of the sinking point. What is punished in the Serpentine is permitted in the river, though on the river the practice is a hundred times more perilous. Again, all omnibuses are timed, and are compelled to observe a comparative regularity; steamers stop where they please, and lately have, in some instances, refused to go their full journey after the fares had been paid for it! There was, as usual, no redress. Omnibus proprietors are not allowed to obstruct the public streets by boardings and erections for their own purposes. On the river banks steamboat companies appear to do just what they like, throwing out long lines of rickety piers, made of dirty barges, planked over at any spot that suits them; two rival companies may place their piers side by side, where one would suffice, on the principle of the two holes in the barn-door, the big one for the cat, and the small one for the kitten! As these double places of embarkation the public is continually deluded into taking wrong tickets for the boat that never comes, to the stirring up of vexation and bile. All along the river banks these piers are an eyesore, a public nuisance, and an obstruction. Only in one place has the evil been remedied—at Blackfriars, where, after the drowning of a due number of her Majesty's subjects, the Corporation built something like a convenient landing place, the use of which was forced on the steamers by something like a civil or rather civic war. Everywhere else the finest highway through the greatest capital of Europe, is obstructed by a series of floating abominations that would disgrace a nation of Esquimaux. Let any one look at the two banks of the Thames, from where it enters the metropolis to where it quits it, and ask himself if they resemble the boundaries of a wealthy capital, of the centre and heart of the nation that can construct Docks and Railways? Heaps of rubbish, in some places becoming overgrown with rushes and marshy vegetation, though close to the traffic of the Strand; filthy sewers, open to the eye, and still more perceivable by the nose; dirt, dilapidation, disorder, and every sordid and noxious thing, disgrace the banks of the River ludicrously misnamed the "Silver Thames." Yet the Corporation of London is supposed to be the "conservators" of this important artery, and possesses wealth in that capacity: what it does, or what is its duty, no one can define; but one fact is evident—that, under the conservation of the City, the Thames is fast degenerating into a filthy ditch—a sewer of considerable size, with a tide in it. The fact is, the River, and all upon it, is shamefully neglected: the regulations that are enforced on the traffic of the streets have no parallel on the water, though the "silent highway" is becoming more used than the paved one. If a complaint is made, the Lord Mayor has no power, and the delinquents escape. The new state of things has outgrown the old regulations, and no new ones adequate to the purpose are made. The old watermen were as much checked by the law as the cabmen; Steam has exterminated them; the same controlling power ought now to be placed over the steamers that supply their place. Why should they be allowed to run with defective engines any more than a cab can be driven with horses unequal to their load? The Government must take the City authorities in hand, and stir them into something like life; if they cannot remove the useless piers that obstruct the River way, and supply something more worthy of us, the work must be done by others who can. All that is subjected to the Corporation seems to grow torpid and dead; but the River is its triumph of carelessness and apathy. There, steamers, piers, and all about them, require a sharp revision and superintendence. How many more explosions and drownings will be required to effect it?

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, August 31.

The Court of Peers met yesterday at two o'clock, and the sitting opened with a long report of the Chancellor, which was followed by the requisitory of the Procureur General, after which the Court decided that the public action against the Duke of Praslin was extinct, and that Henriette Delzay Desportes was to be sent before the Tribunal de Premiere Instance, for the continuation of the proceedings commenced against her. As it was expected, the Chancellor has deemed it necessary to have printed and circulated among the Peers a collection of the letters of the Duchess de Praslin, together with all the details of the proceedings, interrogatories, &c., the whole of which amounts to more than 200 quarto pages.

Although no official documents have been published as yet respecting the contemplated changes in the Algerine administration, the Parisian press agrees in stating that the Government has come to a final decision on that important question. The Duke of Aumale is to be Governor-General, and have for his military mentor General Changarnier, who shall be promoted to the rank of Major-General. A sole direction for civil affairs will be substituted for the present three directors of Finances, the Interior, and Public Works.

Lastly, the affairs of Algeria, instead of being as formerly, under the exclusive control of the Minister of War, will be divided between the different departments of Government; but there is to be in the office of the Minister for Foreign Affairs, a central direction, in which will be concentrated the whole of the correspondence between the colony and the mother country.

A Council of Ministers was held on Sunday last at St. Cloud, at which the King presided. It is reported that some important decisions were come to, and that attaches of the Foreign Office were sent off in the evening for Madrid, Rome, Naples, and London. The Union Monarchique pretends that the English Cabinet has just sent an order to the Ionian islands to prepare an expedition for Italy; and, according to the same paper, the decisions of the Council are relative to this bold proceeding of Lord Palmerston's.

The Parisian papers have not relented in their denunciations against the general corruption of the Administration, and some of their accusations were lately corroborated by a rather striking incident in the Denier's jun. trial before the Assizes Court of the Seine. M. Turien, the Chief Judge, sitting on his bench, did formally declare that all the debates made it evident to him that in the administration of the War Department, all was disorder and falsity.

M. Delangle, the Procureur-General, has ordered an investigation into the abuses and depredations of the Algerine functionaries recently exposed by M. Warnery, delegate of the city of Bona.

If a Lyons paper is well informed, M. Granier de Carragnal has been honoured with a mission in Algeria.

The columns of our contemporaries continue to be replete with such reports as would force us into a belief that man, like the minor brutes, is sometimes visited with strange fits of madness. On Saturday last, the Count Alfred de Montesquiou, an officer of the Legion d'Honneur, committed suicide by stabbing himself in the heart, gambling losses are said to have prompted him to his desperate resolution. The day before, his valet de chambre found his cabin box all filled with gunpowder and all sorts of projectiles, had exploded on the Boulevard des Italiens, but fortunately without causing any injury. A young workman, who was accused of having thrown a stone at the Duke de Nemours, and of their accounts

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

COUNT ALFRED DE MONTESQUIOU.

The family of Montesquiou is one of very ancient and highly honourable descent in France. Count Alfred de Montesquiou, whose melancholy death we here record, was a much-respected member of this house. He was the brother of Count Anatole de Montesquiou, Chevalier d'Honneur to the Queen of the French, and uncle to M. de Montesquiou, Deputy for the Department of the Sarthe. Count Alfred had married the daughter of General Peyron, and was the father of eight children. He was in the enjoyment of all the advantages of rank and fortune; nevertheless, on the morning of Friday, the 27th ultimo, he stabbed himself to death in his sleeping apartment, at his residence, on the Faubourg St. Germaine. No satisfactory reason can yet be given for this terrible suicide, which forms a kind of minor tragedy to that of the wicked Duke de Praslin, and his unfortunate wife.

THE HONOURABLE MRS. JOCELYN.

Two years have only intervened between the marriage of this young lady, and her death. The latter melancholy event occurred at Tollymore Park, on the 26th ult. Mrs. Jocelyn, who had just completed her 25th year, was daughter of Major-General Sir Neil Douglas, K.C.B., Commander of the Forces in Scotland—a gallant and highly distinguished officer, who, following the footsteps of his illustrious ancestors—commanded the celebrated Highland Regiment, the 79th, at Waterloo. The branch of the noble House of Angus, from which he descends, was known as that of "Cruxton and Stobbs." Cecilia, Sir Neil's second daughter, the lady whose early death we record, married, 19th February, 1845, the Hon. Augustus George Frederick Jocelyn, Captain in the 6th Dragoon Guards, youngest son of Robert, late Earl of Roden, by his second wife; and half-brother, consequently, of the present Earl.

> And Douglases were pecres every age—

SIR RICHARD DOBSON, KT.

This gentleman, descended from a branch of an ancient Westmoreland family, was born in 1744, entered the navy as a surgeon in 1797, and, after a service of seven and twenty years, was appointed Chief of the Medical Staff of Greenwich Hospital, with a salary of £500 a year. In 1814 he was nominated a Knight of St. Wladimir, in 1815 received the insignia of the Order of the Dannebrog, and in 1831 was knighted by his own Sovereign. Sir Richard married, first, in 1811, Miss Alsten, second daughter of the late William Alsten, Esq., of Rochester; and secondly, in 1824, Mary Ann, third daughter of Sir Alexander Purves, Bart., of Purves Hall. He died at his residence, in Gloucester-place, Portman-square, on Wednesday, the 1st inst.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE LONDON, BRIGHTON, AND SOUTH COAST RAILWAY.—On Tuesday an inquiry was gone into before C. J. Carttar, Esq., at the Castle Inn, Brockley, near Lewisham, touching the death of Morris Bailey, a farm labourer, who was found dead on the line of railway between New Cross and Sydenham, his head being cut off, and the head crushed. The deceased was discovered about seven o'clock on Sunday morning, extended parallel with the outer rail, and must have been dead several hours. It was supposed that he was lying by the line asleep when the occurrence took place. Verdict,—"Found dead but that there was no evidence to prove by what means death had ensued."

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY. An inquest was held on Tuesday on John Hansman, Esq., a gentleman of considerable property, residing in Queen Ann-street, London, who met his death on the North-Western Railway, at Sudbury, on Monday night last. The inquest was held in one of the rooms of the Sudbury station, T. Wakley, Esq., presiding. The facts of the case appeared to be as follows:—On Monday night the unfortunate gentleman having been dining with some friends in the neighbourhood, proceeded to the station at Sudbury, for the purpose of returning to town by the train which leaves Aylesbury at a quarter before seven in the evening. It appeared however, that the deceased gentleman crossed from the up to the down line, and, hearing a train approaching on the up line, he proceeded hastily across to reach the platform, believing it to be the train for which he had been waiting, and which stopped for passengers at this station. Such was not, however, the fact; it was the express train from Liverpool, which performs the distance at a very accelerated speed. At the time of passing the Sudbury station, the train was moving at the rate of at least forty miles per hour, the engine being driven by a very skilful man, named William Sewell, and the steward, Henry Foote. The engine being propelled at such a velocity, came in contact with the unfortunate gentleman, the buffers of which struck him and carried him a distance of at least sixty yards, and the greater part of the wheels of the carriages passed over his body. As soon as the engine-driver was aware of the accident the engine was reversed, and the breaks applied to stop the train. Having proceeded to the spot, they observed the remains of the body, which was mutilated in a dreadful manner, on the premises of Mr. L. Hall, fancy box-maker, 36½, Beech-street. The evidence was of such a nature as to implicate Mr. Hall in the charge of arson, and the jury gave a verdict, "That the house was wilfully set on fire by the tenant, Leopold Hall."—The Coroner at once made out his warrant for the committal of the accused.

FRIGHTFUL ACCIDENT FROM LIGHTNING NEAR LINCOLN.—An event of appalling character happened near Lincoln on Sunday. Soon after two o'clock a dense mass of black clouds to the southward of the city indicated a storm, and at three o'clock the peals of thunder were deafening. It occasioned no material injury in Lincoln, but the electric fluid struck the parish church at Welton during divine service, and killed or severely injured several of the congregation. One person lost his life, and eight others, five of whom were women, were shockingly hurt. The church, which has sustained considerable damage, is adjacent to the village of Welton, to the eastward of the north road between Carleton and Scampton, and about five miles distant from Lincoln. Five women were injured. Their names are Mary Baldwin, Eliza Baldwin (sister), Mary Abraham, Sarah Taylor, and Ann Ripplingale. Their faces were blackened and burnt. A boy, of the name of Oglesby, living in the neighbouring village of Scotterno, was discovered in another part of the building with his clothes on fire, and nearly consumed. Several others suffered similar injury. A respected old parishioner, Mr. J Brownlow, a wheelwright, aged 68, was discovered lying at the bottom of his pew, immediately beneath one of the chandeliers, quite dead. There were no marks of wounds or abrasion about the body. The buttons of his waistcoat were melted; the right leg of his trousers was torn down, and his coat literally burnt off. His wife was in the same pew with him, but escaped injury. The lightning first struck the south-eastern pinnacle of the tower, and threw down a portion of the battlement. In the course of Monday afternoon, a Coroner's inquest was held on the remains of the deceased, and a verdict in accordance with the nature of his death was returned. The other parties who were injured are said to be progressing favourably.

FATAL EXPLOSION ON BOARD THE "CRICKET" STEAMER.

In great part of our impression last week we gave an account of a frightful accident which took place about half-past nine o'clock on the morning of yesterday week on board the Cricket steamer, one of the boats for some time past running between the City and the West-end at the fare of one halfpenny.

We now recapitulate the chief incidents mentioned in our account, and add such additional circumstances as have since transpired, together with a report of the commencement of the inquest.

The Cricket has already made two passages between the Adelphi Pier and London Bridge, and was lying off the former landing place at the moment the accident occurred.

It appears that the vessel was about to leave the pier for London-bridge, having on board somewhere about 150 passengers, all quietly seated, when, without the least previous intimation to those on deck, a sudden report was heard, followed by an instantaneous explosion. Immediately the vessel, which had at that moment became almost filled with persons, was nearly cleared: some of the passengers being actually blown up into the air, falling into the water—others had jumped over the sides, and were struggling in the mud that lined the shore—and but a few, awe-stricken and dumbfounded, remained in the uninjured part of the boat.

The explosion took place in what is usually termed the after part of the vessel, namely, in a direction opposite to the course she was about to steer. The foredeck remains comparatively uninjured; and the passengers, therefore, in that part of the boat, were in comparative safety. THE "CRICKET" STEAM-BOAT.

George Shute, age about thirty, costermonger, of Driver's-buildings, Mile-end. He has left a wife and several children. This man was, we believe, in company with Hollis, who was taken to the hospital severely bruised on the breast, and who afterwards identified the body.

Thomas Shade, age about fourteen, call-boy on board the Cricket, of Rose-street, Covent-garden. He was boiling some coffee, it is stated, at the stove in the after cabin, and as the boiler swept through this part of the vessel, and almost gutted the cabin, it is wonderful how he escaped being killed upon the spot. He was brought to the hospital insensible, and suffering from several fractures of the skin'l. The poor lad, at first, rallied a little, but died about two o'clock on Friday (last week), the extent of his injuries, from the first, forbidding all hopes of his recovery.

John Buckley, aged nineteen, single, engineer, of 9, King-street, Covent-garden

The discovery and immediate identification of Buckley's remains were as singular as they were affecting. In the crowd at the bottom of Arundel-street, who were looking upon the river, and watching the various boats upon its surface which were dragging for bodies, was a woman, whose quick eye caught the shape of something which was being lifted from the water by a man who was creeping among the mud on the opposite shore. With a mother's presentiment she exclaimed, "That is my son!" and, as fast as her agitation would permit, she hurried round to the other side of the bridge. The body was carried to the vaults of St. John's Church, in the Waterloo-road, where the poor woman arrived, overpowered by her emotions, and immediately recognised the features of her son, who had left his home, No. 9, King-street, Covent Garden, only a few minutes before the explosion took place. His employment was that of engineer to a steam-printing machine.

The following is a list of the sufferers who were conveyed to the Charing-cross Hospital:—

Virgo Birks.—This poor man had sustained a communicated fracture of the right knee joint, by which the main artery was cut, and in the course of the afternoon it was deemed necessary by the medical men to resort to amputation.

Benjamin Reepe, of 78, Dudley-street, fish-salesman—compound fracture of the jaw. This unfortunate man has sustained injuries of a more severe nature than any of his fellow-sufferers with the exception of Virgo Birks.

George Willetts, 7, Mssrd's-street, Soho, carver—severely bruised on various parts of the body

John Hollis, Love-lane, Mile-end, costermonger—much bruised about the breast, but not seriously injured.

Mr. Solomon Cahn, merchant, of Fenchurch street—right ancle severely bruised.

Henry Rowland, Warwick-street, Earl-street, Kensington, fishmonger—very severely bruised about the face and body.

James Simpan, chief messenger to the London Assurance Company—very severe cuts on the right temple and under the left eye; slight wound on the lower part of the left lip, and frightfully bruised about the arms, legs, and thighs, but has sustained no dangerous injury

William Ayre, 60, Poland-street, Oxford-street, tailor—back injured.

William Kay, who described himself as a "profiliet" numerous very serious bruises about the head and face.

William Redgrave, a lad about 13 years of age, the son of a tailor, living in Tottenham-court-road—upper lip much cut, and severe bruises on the leg. The father and mother of this boy were on board the steam-boat with him at the time of the accident, but fortunately escaped with some very slight bruises.

William Batt, of 118, Long Acre, lately in business as a cheesemonger in Jersey—back much bruised, and severe injury of the left ancle

The Rev. Mr. Smith, the chaplain of the St. Martin's workhouse, with his lady, were among the persons who had paid their fare to go to London-bridge. Mrs. Smith had got on board, and Mr. Smith was on the pier about to step on board when the explosion took place. Mrs. Smith was scalded by the steam, and was blown into the water, but was fortunately rescued. Mr. Smith escaped unhurt, the explosion having taking place as he was in the act of stepping on the lighter in order to get on board the boat.

The engineer's statement is to the fol owing effect:—He says he was in the engine-room at the time, and that he did not recover his consciousness until he found himself lying on the pier! There must, to all appearance, have been considerable neglect. We are informed that the sister of the unfortunate boy, at the time the disaster happened, was waiting on the pier with his breakfast.

It is not a little singular that the Cricket was condemned, together with the Ant and Bee, more than six months since, by Mr. Portwine, in his work on the "Steam Engine," &c., in the following plain language:—"There are three vessels on the Thames, called the Ant, Bee, and Cricket—boats which profess to work with low-pressure condensing engines. The public is not aware that they are working at 36lb. on the square inch. The engines are by Joyce, two of 15-horse power. The fuel consumed is one bushel per hour, about 2 cwt. 1 quarter per hour. These are the penny boats (now halfpenny) plying from Hungerford to London-bridge, and working at high pressure; they may when out of order blow up their decks and the myriads of passengers they are purchased with." P. 58. This extract was published by an engineer six months since, and time has too fatally proved Mr. Portwine's prediction.

Messrs. Joyce have written to say that the boilers of the Cricket were not their manufacture. The machinery was by Messrs. Joyce, but the boilers were made by Mr. Trotman of the Borough.

THE INQUEST.

The inquest on view of the bodies of the unfortunate persons killed by the explosion was commenced on Monday morning, at the board-room of the St. Martin's-in-the-Fields Workhouse, before Mr. Bedford, coroner for the City of Westminster.

A jury of seventeen gentlemen was sworn, and proceeded to view the bodies of the deceased persons, three of whom were lying at the workhouse, and the other two at the Charing-cross Hospital. The names of the deceased were Thomas Shed, John Littleton, John Blunt, George Shute, and John Buckley.

Mr. Montague Chambers, barrister, attended the inquiry on behalf of the steam-boat company.

The evidence as to the identity of the deceased persons was then proceeded with.

Thomas Shade, of 11, Rose-street, Covent-garden, fishmonger, said the deceased Thomas Shade was his child. The deceased was fourteen years old last October, and was call-boy on board the Cricket. He had been about five months in continued service, of which three weeks were passed on board the Cricket, and the previous time on board the Ant. The deceased never made any complaint to witness with regard to his employment, and appeared perfectly satisfied with his birth

John Lynd Blunt, of No. 2, Trellick-terrace, Vauxhall bridge-road, watchmaker, examined: The deceased John Blunt was his son, and was 23 years of age. He was a watchmaker.

Catherine Littleton, of No. 6, Bloomsbury-street, identified the body of John Littleton, as that of her husband. He was thirty-three years of age, and was a hawker

George Shute, of James-street, Mile-end, painter and glazier, examined: The deceased George Shute was his only son. He was 24½ years old, and has left a wife and two children.

Henry Noble, of 104, Golden-lane, St. Luke's, stated that he was an engineer, and that the deceased John Buckley was his nephew. He was 18 years of age, and was in watchmaker employment.

Mr. James Hocken, of 23, Maddox-street, Hanover-square, tailor, examined: He said he went on board about twenty-five minutes past nine o'clock. He sat in the after part of the boat, about one-third back from the paddle-box. He was there about five minutes, and was rather surprised that the boat was longer than usual without leaving the pier. There were about 200 persons on board. The boat was perfectly quiet, when he felt a sudden shudder or quiver, and presently after the explosion took place. The whole flew apparently into a thousand pieces, taking the direction of the hinder part of the boat. The seat on which he sat was blown from under him. A parcel which he had in his hand, and his hat, were blown away, and he was wounded on the hip and shoulder. The steam struck him on the face like a slap from a hand. When the steam had cleared away, he found that all the persons he had noticed on the seats had been carried away—some were hanging by the sides; and he assisted a lady who had called loudly to him for assistance. The Eclipse, Richmond boat, came from the middle of the river, and took some of the passengers off. A gentleman with a white head cried out that his leg had been broken. He looked down into the cabin, and heard a noise like the howling of a dog. Assisted to get a man from amongst the timbers whose mouth and forehead were bleeding. He was doubled up like a drunken man. There was no one on board connected with the company to render assistance. Saw neither the captain nor the engineer on board. Examined the place from which the boiler had been carried, but found no one there. He apprehended that the boat was waiting for the captain, as it was ready to start, and had its full complement of passengers

Mr. George Martin Young examined: Is house-surgeon at Charing-cross Hospital. The deceased Thomas Shade was admitted to the hospital about half-past nine in the morning of Friday. He was in a state of collapse. There was a flesh wound on his left cheek, and a small cut on the top of the head; and, from the symptoms, they judged that there was a fracture of the skull. He never rallied, and died between two and three o'clock. There was pressure on the brain; but, whether that was caused by blood or by a fracture, they could not tell from external examination. Had no doubt but that death was caused by the violence received on the head. The deceased George Shute was also brought to the hospital about the same hour. He had a wound on the right side of the head, which was not sufficient to cause death, and witness supposed that he died from drowning, but could not say positively without an examination.

William Chappell, residing at No 24, Caroline-street, waterman, stated that between nine and ten o'clock on Friday morning, while he was standing on Somerset House causeway, he saw the explosion of the Cricket steamer. He, with his mate, immediately manned the boat and proceeded to the scene of the explosion. During their passage they picked up nine hats, and shortly after picked up the body of Littleton, with whom they rowed nearly ashore, and Maddox (the last witness but one) then took the body from the head of the boat up to the pay-office on the pier. Witness immediately jumped out of the boat on to the pier, where he saw a surgeon, who stated that the man was dead. He then returned to the boat, and just at "flood" he, with his mate, by the use of grappling irons, found the body of a person quite dead, since identified as the body of Mr. Blunt. Witness took charge of the property of deceased, which amounted to thirty shillings in gold, ten shillings in silver, a silver watch, gold chain, and pencils.

The money and articles were produced by the witness and handed to the father of the deceased.

Mr. John Nathan Batchbridge examined: Is surgeon to the workhouse. Saw the bodies of Littleton and Blunt soon after they were brought to the workhouse on Friday morning. He examined the bodies externally, and he could find no mark of violence on Blunt, except a slight abrasion of the skin on the nose, and he believed therefore that his death was caused by drowning. The appearances were those usually attending death by drowning. Littleton had a considerable wound on the right temple. He had also some bruises on the arms, but not sufficient to cause death. Certain injuries on the head were also not sufficient to cause death, without making an examination. He also examined the body of Buckley. The right thigh was broken, and the fracture must have taken place before death, as the limb was drawn up by the contraction of the muscles. There was also some effusion of blood under the scalp, and some appearance of a scald upon the forehead.

Mr. Chambers said he wished, on the part of the company, to state, that the captain of the Cricket, the engineer, the stoker, and the superintendent of the vessel, were in the room, and ready to give all the information in their power, relating to the accident.

The Coroner said he was of opinion that the evidence of some scientific gentleman should be obtained, previous to hearing the evidence of parties employed in the vessel. He should make a communication to the Secretary of State on the subject; and he, therefore, thought at present the inquiry should be adjourned to a future day.

Mr. Richardson, solicitor, said Mr. Joyce, the engineer, was present, and most anxious to give all the information in his power.

After a conversation between the Coroner and Jury, it was arranged that the boat should remain under the care of the Thames police until the inquiry was resumed; the Jury, and all other persons whose testimony might be considered necessary, to have leave to inspect the boat.

Another desultory conversation ensued, and the inquest was adjourned shortly after three o'clock until eleven o'clock on Monday next.

The wreck has been the object of the greatest curiosity. The appearance it presented at low water showed at once the terrible character of the explosion and the destructive power of the agent which caused it.

It is not, perhaps, remarkable, after the immunity from accidents which the river steamers have for so long enjoyed, and the consequent security of this mode of conveyance, that public confidence should have appeared so little disturbed and affected by the accident to the Cricket. But it is somewhat singular, just after the liability to accident of the high-pressure engines employed in the three halfpenny boats—the Cricket, the Ant, the Bee—had been so publicly maintained, that the two survivors of these boats, the Ant and the Bee, have been plying as usual, and that they have been crowded with passengers.

On Tuesday morning, the Jury, according to appointment, proceeded to view the shattered vessel and machinery of the Cricket steam-boat. The first sight which presents itself to the spectator is that of a fearful rent in the vessel from the engine-room to the stern. The whole of the flooring of the deck has been blown up, and the lining of the right side of the after cabin completely removed, leaving exposed the bare iron shell of the vessel. On the left side of the same cabin, some portion of the lining yet remains; but in the bilge of the vessel, and near to the paddles, the whole of the lining is gone, and the shell of the vessel broken and torn in almost every direction. The flooring of the cabin is also in pieces, and the whole of the immense mass of machinery shows the great strength which the boiler itself was blown, the boiler in its progress appearing to have swept the floors, the lining, the rudder, and everything before it. The whole of the case of the boiler is blown off, leaving all the tubes exposed to sight, but there does not appear to be any fracture in any of them. The funnel, the smoke-box, and the case of the boiler, lie beside the wreck of the vessel. The safety-valve and the steam-gauges seem to have been entirely blown away. Neither of the paddle-wheels seems to have sustained any injury; the outer side of the left paddle-box seems to have sustained a somewhat severe shock. A portion of the massive iron framework to which the engine is attached is twisted in a most extraordinary manner The thickness of the metal in that part cannot be less than four inches, but it appears to have been capable of affording no more resistance to the terrible power than did some of the common deal timbers with which it was surrounded. The massive cranks, with the pistons and cylinders, seem to be the only portions of the machinery which were sufficiently strong to endure the shock, but the left crank is slightly bent. There is no doubt that this more solid part of the machinery tended, in some degree, to ensure the fore part of the vessel from that total destruction with eh has befallen the remaining portions. The boiler which exploded was the left boiler as the vessel now lies, but the course it appeared to have taken was an oblique one, as the right side of the cabin, through which it passed, is considerably more injured than the opposite. The opening made at the stern of the vessel appears to be also on the right side of the rudder. The whole floor of the engine-room is literally covered with fragments of the broken parts and the smaller and more delicate parts of the machinery. The jury remained on the spot for about half an hour, during which time every facility was afforded by the servants of the company to enable them to view the various portions of the wreck.

An examination of the wreck has been made by Mr. Elijah Galloway, civil engineer, of Buckingham-street, whose report is as follows:—

"There are two boilers abreast of each other, one of which (the starboard boiler) exploded. The boilers are tubular, the fire being placed in a large tube, say of three or four feet in diameter within the boiler, and therefore surrounded by water. The flame or heated air is returned to the front of the boiler by about 60 or 70 tubes of about two inches diameter, and it is the use of these small tubes that gives the boilers the name of 'tubular.' The chief advantage of these boilers is, that a larger heating surface is obtained in a smaller space than when the old fashioned flues were exclusively used. Tubular boilers have recently obtained very general use both in the Government and the mercantile marine, though not in many instances to generate what is termed high-pressure steam for steam-vessels. It is by no means to be concluded, however, that there is any peculiar danger in the use of high-pressure steam in steam-vessels any more than in locomotives, the latter of which can necessarily be worked only by high-pressure steam; and, although it is believed the ordinary pressure generally much exceeds that which it is alleged these boilers worked, the explosion of a locomotive boiler is very rarely heard of, and is, indeed, a casualty now considered all but impossible.

"The explosion seems to have commenced by the separation of the front plate (into which the fire-tube and the smaller pipes are fixed) from what is termed the shell of the boiler. The dome, which is a sort of reservoir placed over the shell, is also separated, and has not yet been found, although means have been taken to recover it; because, without it, it is difficult, and perhaps impossible, to ascertain whether the dome was blown off by the force of the steam or separated by the flight of the boiler towards the stern. It appears evident that, upon the separation of the front plate, the shell of the boiler flew away from the front plate and tubes in one piece, like the shell of a rocket, the front plate and tubes being propelled in an opposite direction against the framing of the engine, as is demonstrated by considerable indentations on the front plate, and corresponding with similar marks on the framing of the machinery. But for the interruption thus given to the progress of the front and tubes, the fore-cabin and the passengers on the fore-deck must have shared a similar fate to those on the after-deck. The progress of the shell of the boiler is clearly shown to have been in a direction nearly aft, or rather taking a course slightly inclined from the starboard to the larboard side, cutting through the iron bulkhead, through the timbers, and finally opening a passage through the run of the vessel, cutting most, if not all, the angle irons which form what would be the timbers of a wooden vessel, dividing the rudder-post in three pieces, and laying the two sides of the vessel, which were nearly vertical, almost flat.

"The funnel and the outer casing around the boiler, being made of weak iron, appeared to have been blown upwards from the pressure of escaped steam from the boiler, the forces of which they were totally inadequate to resist. The funnel, and the casing carried away the bridge between the paddle-boxes, or gangway on which the captain stands, and fell alongside into the water.

"The small tubes of the boiler are comparatively uninjured, only two of them being slightly bent, and this most likely arose from the forcible detachment of the front plate. The tubes of the upper range are found to be covered with the usual incrustation or deposit from the water. Their condition indicates that the accident did not arise from any lack of the proper supply of water in the boiler."

We believe that a saving of not less than one ton of coals per day is gained by the description of engines used on board the Cricket, Ant, and Bee steam-boats. The boilers of the Cricket were three-eighths of an inch thick in every part except the steam-chest or dome, which was five-sixths of an inch thick. The tube-plates were three quarters of an inch thick. The boiler case was 6 feet inches long, the fire-tube 2 feet 6 inches, and the smaller tubes one-eighth of an inch thick.

It is satisfactory to state that, on Thursday morning, in answer to a question from the Magistrate at the Thames Police-office, Inspector Falkner, of the Thames Police, stated that, although the utmost vigilance had been exercised, and the police had carefully and unremittingly dragged the river in the immediate vicinity of the accident, and in other places where bodies were likely to have been carried by the current, yet that no fresh corpse had been found; and it is therefore to be hoped that the extent of the fatal consequences of the explosion has now been ascertained.

The answer to inquiries at Charing-cross Hospital on Thursday morning, with respect to the unfortunate individuals who were injured by the explosion, was, that they were all going on very favourably, and that most of them would be able to leave the hospital in a short time.

WRECK OF THE "CRICKET," AT LOW WATER.

THE SHEFFIELD ATHENÆUM AND MECHANICS' INSTITUTION.

The Sheffield Athenæum and Mechanics' Institution was established in 1832, when a building fund was commenced, in order to enable the Institution to erect a building suitable to its wants. In the year 1839, a sufficient sum was raised by an exhibition of works of art and nature to purchase a site; and, in the year 1845, an additional sum was raised by a bazaar. This has been increased by private subscriptions and donations, so as to be sufficient, at the beginning of this year, to warrant the Committee taking steps for erecting a new building. In April, they resolved on carrying into effect the plans prepared by Mr. G. Alexander, of Bedford-square, London; and the works have since been let to builders, within the estimated amount of £4500

The first stone of the new building was laid on Wednesday; all the parties immediately interested met at twelve o'clock, at the Council Hall, and proceeded to the site in the following order:—

Beadles.
Contractors, (with the tools).
Committee of the Institution.

Mr. Taylor, Managing Director, with Trowel. — Mr. Alexander, Architect, with Plans. — Mr. Fowler, Secretary, with Vase of printed and other Documents.

President of the Institution, Dr. Thompson. — The Earl of ARUNDEL. — The Mayor.

Master Cutler and Vice-Presidents.
Corporation.
Gentry.
Beadles, &c.

The Earl of Arundel having laid the stone in due form, addressed the assembly, explaining the advantages of good education, as tending to increase the knowledge and practice of the duties due to God and man. The President of the Institution also made a few appropriate remarks. In the evening there was a soirée, which was attended by a great number of the most respectable persons of the town and neighbourhood, at which Lord Arundel also presided. Many good speeches were delivered, and the evening was enlivened by occasional songs. The whole gave the greatest satisfaction, and reflected much credit on Mr. Taylor, the Managing Director, and the rest of the Committee who assisted him.

The following details of the edifice are from the Sheffield and Rotherham Independent:—

"The windows of the basement story will light a series of apartments ten feet high. At the corner of Surrey-street and Tudor-street, on the basement story, will be a Gymnasium, 42 feet 4 inches by 23 feet 3 inches. The rest of this floor will be occupied by rooms for the persons in charge of the building.

"The Principal Entrance in Surrey-street opens to a lofty passage, going through the centre of the building, and ending at the foot of the staircase. The first room on the left hand, over the gymnasium, at the angle of the two streets, will be the News Room, lighted on two sides, and measuring 42 feet 8 inches, by 23 feet 3 inches. Behind this, with a window to Tudor-street, will be a Board Room, 23 feet 3 inches by 13½ feet. These two rooms will occupy that side of the building on the ground floor: it is proposed that they shall be separated by folding doors, so that they may be thrown into one when required for the purposes of a conversazione, or other purposes requiring a large handsome room. On the right of the principal entrance is the Coffee Room, 28 feet 11 inches by 24 feet 3 inches, the windows fronting to Surrey-street. Behind this, and lighted by one large window looking into a small area at the eastern corner of the building, will be the Library, 24 feet 3 inches by 22 feet 2 inches. Between the library and the coffee room will be a narrow staircase descending to the kitchen on the basement story, and ascending to the lecture room on the first floor. The one will be a great advantage to the attendants on the coffee room, and the other will give the lecturer private access to the rostrum in the lecture room. The rooms on the ground floor will be 15 feet high

"We ascend now by a convenient staircase from the junction of the main passage with the side entrance to the Lecture Room. This is the prime room of the whole building. It will occupy the whole area of the first floor, excepting the deduction necessary for the staircase from the side entrance to the story above. Its height will be 29½ feet, and its measurement 60 feet by 56 feet 6 inches. The lecturer's place will be in the centre of the blank wall towards the Music Hall, with his face towards Tudor-street. The greater part of the floor will be flat, in order that the room may be conveniently used for soirées, balls, &c. But the part most distant from the lecturer will be raised. The seats upon the floor will accommodate about 800 persons. There will be provision for some 200 more in a light and elegant gallery on the Tudor-street side.

"The top story will contain seven Class Rooms, each 12 feet high, and each measuring in length 24½ feet."

THE SHEFFIELD ATHENÆUM AND MECHANICS' INSTITUTE.

VAUXHALL GARDENS.

If London is a desert just at present, Vauxhall Gardens certainly form the oasis; for we do not yet discover any perceptible falling off in the company, in spite of all the attractions that grouse, partridges, sea-bathing, Baden, and Boulogne, are now offering. Perhaps there may be many who think that a view of Venice may be obtained just as well from the fire-work gallery as from the Grand Canal, with the advantage of going to your own bed afterwards, and getting up the next morning in London, with a great saving of time and money; and certainly the Ducal Palace is never enveloped in the showers of golden fire that pour down upon it so brilliantly at Vauxhall.

One or two new performers have made their début since we last noticed Vauxhall. Mdlle. Valentine is a pretty young lady who manages a very beautiful horse in the style of Mdlles. Carolina and Pauline Cuzent, amongst other things making it describe a circle with one fore leg for the centre. Little Ameson twists in an out the rounds of a ladder, like an eel, whilst it is balanced upon his father's chin; and M. Rochez, the clown, does more wonderful feats with two chairs than we had imagined such ordinary articles of furniture could have suggested.

Mr. Gale made a very successful ascent one evening last week; having apparently succeeded Mr. Gypson, as night-aeronaut to the Gardens. The display of fireworks from the car, of which we have given an Illustration, was very magnificent, and was hailed with loud acclamations by the spectators. Mr. Gale was accompanied by Mr. Coxwell, who was in the "Albert" balloon the night of the accident.

The benefit of Mr. Robert Wardell, the proprietor, is fixed for Monday next. This gentleman has shown such spirit and indefatigability in procuring constant novelty for the Vauxhall visitors, that his claims upon them are rather more than those of an ordinary beneficiaire. For several years the company at Vauxhall has not been so select as during the present season, and this is to be attributed to his excellent arrangements.

THE THEATRES.

MARYLEBONE.

The Marylebone Theatre opened on Monday evening, for the season, under the direction of Mrs. Warner, for the purpose of performing the legitimate drama, under a management similar to that of Sadler's Wells; and the play chosen for the inauguration was "The Winter's Tale," of Shakspeare. The choice was judiciously made; for, the object being to direct the taste of the audience into a better channel, it might not have been so well to have commenced with a five-act play of heavier action.

Mrs. Warner has collected an excellent working company, principally from the provinces; for we find, by the names on the bill, she has drafted her troupe from the theatres of Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Exeter, Weymouth, Bath, and Bristol; whilst Mr. Graham is the leading tragedian, and Mr. H. Webb (of whom we had occasion to speak very favourably, at the Surrey, some few weeks ago) is the principal low comedian. Every department of the theatre is evidently under a careful and intelligent direction. The scenery is excellent; there is a very compact orchestra; the costumes are correct and new; and all the stage management deserving of high praise.

Of Mrs. Warner's Hermione, we have before expressed our opinion. It is, in our thinking, her greatest part; and she did well, for this reason also, to commence with it. Her acting, in the trial scene was marked by the most finished delicacy and grace; and the consummate art shown in her pose as the Statue, both in the clarity of the attitude, and the exquisite manner in which the drapery had been arranged, drew down loud and continued applause from all parts of the house. The effect, when she quickly turned her head towards the King, was startling. Mr. Graham's Leontes was judiciously played; but the excellence of his acting was somewhat marred by his frequent imitation of Mr. Macready, both in tone and gesture. It would be well for him to trust entirely to his own original powers, for he has evidently a refined intelligence. Next to these leading characters, we were pleased with Mr. Webb's Autolycus, which was full of quaint humour; and the Shepherd could not have been better played than by Mr. G. Cooke. The scenes in which they acted were excellent. Mr. G. Vining (Florizel), is a son of Mr. James Vining. He is, we should expect, very young, but he bids fair to make a good performer in the line known as "juvenile tragedy." Mr. Harvey (Antigonus), Mr. James Johnstone (Polixenes), and Mr. Tindell (Camillo), each contributed, and in no small degree, to form a perfect ensemble; and Mr J. Saunders was as simple a Clown as could be desired. Indeed, where the characters had only a few lines to say, they were given with care and propriety.

Come we now to the ladies, and first of Miss Angell (Perdita), of whom we expect much. She is young and graceful, with most expressive eyes and a pleasing delivery. It was stated to her first appearance; but we cannot help thinking that we have seen her before in London, at some theatre. However, this is of little moment; she made a charming Perdita, and had every reason to be satisfied with her reception. Mrs. Terrell (Paulina) has an excellent voice, and spoke every word set down for her distinctly and with good emphasis. And Miss Saunders (Hope) is a smart little actress, who will be very useful in the farces. The house was crowded, and the applause, both throughout the play and at its conclusion, very hearty and spontaneous.

Previous to the play, Mrs. Warner spoke an address, written by Mr. Serle, amidst loud cheering. In conclusion, the speculation of playing the legitimate drama at the Marylebone Theatre promises to be a most successful one.

AN AMATEUR PERFORMANCE is to take place at LIVERPOOL, on Thursday evening, in aid of the funds for the purchase of Shakespeare's House, when "Twelfth Night" and "The Taming of the Shrew" will both be played by gentlemen, several of whom are connected with the Liverpool press.

An adaptation of Mr. Planché's "Fair One with the Golden Locks," has been brought out at the Porte St. Martin Theatre, in Paris, under the title of "La Belle aux Cheveux Dorées." The mise-en-scène is said to be most gorgeous, surpassing in splendour that of "Le Bijou en Rose," whose unlucky career as "The Princess" who was done something or another very wonderful to, came to so rapid a termination at Drury-Lane.

The patrons of the SURREY have hailed with great glee, the return of their old favourites, Mr. T. P. Cooke and Mr. and Mrs. Robert Honnor. The after-season here appears to have been more successful than the actual one. We believe that Mrs. Davidge does not retire altogether from the management, but is joined by Mr. Bunn in the speculation, and that operas will be principally produced. Mr. Grieve will "start" the new management in the scenic department.

CALENDAR FOR THE WEEK.

SUNDAY, September 5.—Fourteenth Sunday after Trinity.

MONDAY, 6.—The Sun rises near E. by N. at 5h. 21m.; he is due E. at 6h. 30m.: and he sets near W. by N. at 6h. 39m.

TUESDAY, 7.—St. Ruinurchus.—Jupiter rises near the N.E. by N. at 11h. 50m., p.m.

WEDNESDAY, 8. Nativity of the Virgin Mary.—Mars rises near the E.N.E. at 8h. 18m., p.m.; he souths at 3h. 38m after midnight

THURSDAY, 9. New Moon at 3h. 47m., p.m.—Saturn rises midway between the E. by S. and the E.S.E. before sunset; he souths at 11h. 32m., p.m., at an altitude of 28°.

FRIDAY, 10.—The length of the day is 12h. 58m.; the day has decreased 3h. 38m. since the Longest Day.

SATURDAY, 11.—Jewish year 5608 begins.—The Moon and Venus are near together.

The planets favourably situated for observations are, Saturn, in the S.E., during the evenings; Mars, in the East, and situated about 15° W. of the Pleiades; he may, however, be readily distinguished by his increasing brightness and the redness of his colour. Jupiter is also visible, and situated near to Castor and Pollux. The telescopic objects favourably situated are Neptune, which souths at about 11, p.m., at an altitude of 26°; and Mr. Hind's new planet (Iris), which souths between 8h. and 9h., p.m.

The following are the elements of the new planet Iris, as calculated by Mr. Hind:

Mean longitude of Iris, at September 0d. 0h., was	..	..	355 9 13.3
Longitude of Perihelion	..	..	26 9 8.5
Ascending Node	..	..	259 41 14.5
Inclination of the orbit	..	..	5 37 22.1
Angle of eccentricity	..	..	25 35 22.1
or e	..	..	0.431920
Log. semi-axis Major	..	..	0.4598916
Period, in sidereal years	..	..	4.896

From these elements it would seem that the new planet is one of the most remarkable of the small planets, on account of the great eccentricity of the orbit, and its period of revolution is longer than those of any other of these small bodies.

TIMES OF HIGH WATER AT LONDON BRIDGE,
FOR THE WEEK ENDING SEPTEMBER 11

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"Q. Z."—Lincoln's Inn-fields.—Warwick Castle is shown daily to visitors, except during the residence of the noble family there, when the public are admitted during one hour on Saturdays only. A trifling gratuity is expected

"Ignoramus" should apply respecting the investment, to a respectable Broker.

"E. W." How.—The condition depends on the distance, which our Correspondent does not state.

"Cork." The Lines will not suit.

"Punster" should apply in Bell yard, Fleet-street, one of the older localities for Dealers in Fishing Tackle

"Southport."—The Royal Thames Regatta took place on the 7th of June. (See our Journal of the 12th of June.)

"R. L. J. F."—Johnson and Walker spell the word thus: Stationary.

"A Greek," Finsbury-circus.—Drury Lane Theatre will be re-opened by M. Jullien, on Oct. 1, with Promenade Concerts; and after Dec. 1, the performances will be Opera, Ballet, and Pantomime.

"A Subscriber," Stratford-on-Avon.—The Waithman Obelisk stands midway in the road between the corners of Ludgate-hill and Farringdon-street, opposite the Obelisk set up in the Mayoralty of Wilkes "Dynamics"—Read Muller's Lectures on Physics, in the Pharmaceutical Times.

"Frank" should consult the India Register.

"T. R. B. L."—Is it the intention of Government to extend the Post-Office regulation limiting to seven days after publication, the free delivery of Newspapers sent abroad, to those re-posted to places within the kingdom?—We have heard of no such intention.

"J. B. U." is thanked; though we had, in some measure, in the present Number, anticipated his suggestions. We do not, however, agree with our Correspondent's opinion as to the "illiberality" of certain Illustrations.

"Tunbridge."—A concise History of the South Sea Bubble was reprinted in 1825-26. The sum recovered from the Estates of the Directors amounted to £2,014,000.

"A Subscriber." A will made in 1838, required to be attested by three disinterested persons, as regarded real estate, or two if it bequeathed personal property only. A will must be executed, except under extraordinary circumstances, within six months from the death of the testator. The last will is valid.

"F. W. H." Richmond.—Consult the accounts of the Royalists supplied by Clarendon, Warwick, Ludlow, Lodlow, Hutchinson, Hyde, and Ivbert.

"P. Q. R." will, perhaps, favour us with a view of the new church in question.

"F. W. K." Minehead.—William and Mary Howitt are husband and wife. Step-mother and mother-in-law are synonymous. If our Correspondent delight in synnologies, he may enjoy a treat in consulting, on the derivation of stepmother, the Dictionaries of Johnson, Lemon, Ash, Booth, and (specially) Richardson. Step is a corruption of the Danish stod, bereft, lost, in the place of, instead of. For a reply to the third question, see our Chess Department, next week.

"An Old Subscriber" may consult the will of Guy, the benevolent bookseller, at Doctors' Commons. Guy died in 1724.

"Artifex."—For some hints on Drawing on Wood, see the "History of Wood Engraving," in the Supplement published with No. 114 of our Journal.

"Y. B." can only compel by an action at law.

"P. Q. R." Greenwich, is thanked for the Sketch; but we have not room to engrave it.

"D. N. O." The "Statutes of Crime" must be sought in the Official Tables compiled by Mr. Redgrave, from the "Registers of Commitments for Trial," kept at the Home Office. For Abstract, see "Companion to the Almanac," 1841, and following years.

A Country Subscriber" may obtain the Engraving of "The Death of the Children of Lir," from Wilson's picture, in No. 113 of our Journal

"J. D. D." All claims to the Pensionership Model, and documents respecting it, should be sent to the Commander-in-Chief's Office, Horse Guards.

"Z Fine."—The lines from "Pope's Ode on St. Cecilia's Day" are an evident imitation of the verse from Dryden's "Alexander's Feast." "Timotheus has the magic of celebrated lyric poet and musician of antiquity; he flourished at the courts of Philip and Alex ander of Macedon. The last is the "Mortal," whom his poesy and music figuratively "raised to the skies." The line, "She drew an angel down," refers to the old legend of St. Cecilia, whose skill in music is said to have drawn angels around her to listen.

"L. W. R."—We should think the claim to the vote a good one.

"Amicus." Lords-Lieutenant and their Deputies are, we consider, entitled, as military officers, to place the cockade in their servants' hats.

"C. E. D."—The regulations concerning Cockades are very uncertain: the origin of the usage, and the rules by which that usage should be controlled, are alike involved in doubt. By the law, as land down, that "the badge is restricted to the servants of naval and military officers," we do not see how a person filling a consular office could properly use it.

"M. M."—Mary, Queen of England, daughter of Henry VIII., died at St. James's, 17th November, 1558. The late Duke of Sussex was born in the same Palace, 27th January, 1773.

"Caradoc."—The only means of obtaining a commission in the French service is either by passing through the public schools—the Polytechnic or St. Cyr—or by entering the ranks and working one's way up. An Englishman, if naturalized, might hold a commission. The pay is sufficient for the mode of life of a French officer, but would be found quite inadequate to the extravagance of an English regiment.

"E." Crewkerne.—We are not in possession of the required information.

"Georgina."—Address Her Majesty's Theatre.

"P. C." Butterworth, is thanked; but his suggestion is too complimentary for adoption.

"A Subscriber." We cannot owe the desired recommendation.

"An Old and Constant Admirer" is thanked for the Sketch; though we have not room to insert it.

"What."—We do not interfere in disputes at cards.

"M. J. P." Bishopsgate-street.—We do not remember any more practical information on Organ Building than that contained in the Penny Cyclopædia.

"A. B." Barnstaple.—The applicant for the situation will not succeed unless he has received a nautical education.

"W. J. L." Stepney.—Gun Cotton is sold by Hall and Co., Faversham; Marine Glue by Jeffery and Co., Commercial-road, Limehouse.

"A. E." Willon-square, Stoke Newington.

"W. H. M."—For admission to the Reading-room apply, with reference to two householders, or persons of station, to Sir Henry Ellis, British Museum.

"M." Glasgow.—We have not room for the lines.

"A Young Draftsman" is thanked for the offer of the Irish Sketch, though we have not room to engrave it.

 Owing to the pressure of important and interesting intelligence, our Magazine Column for September is unavoidably omitted; together with "A Travelling Contributor's Flying Sheets."

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 4, 1847.

THERE have been more failures of houses in the Corn Trade; and there is less concern about it in the public mind than would be exhibited if they occurred among merchants of any other kind. Except for its effect on the Money Market, and on those who must always be involved in the dealings of great firms, it would not be too much to say there is neither regret nor sympathy shown on the matter. It has become a popular belief that dealers in corn must be periodically ruined as a matter of course; and any emotion on the point is stopped by the coolly-announced fact—they are only speculators! Many even go farther, and think bankruptcy and ruin only the proper retribution for the crime of buying grain to sell again at a profit; and see failure after failure announced with somewhat of a feeling that "it serves them right." It is a sentiment, where it exists, that springs from ignorance of the workings of commerce, and is a tradition of the middle ages, whose policy was influenced by it. But this dislike of speculators in corn is not worthy of a trading nation at the present day. All merchants are "speculators;" and unless they made profits, commerce would be impossible, life would lose half its comforts, the world all its civilization, and nations go to ruin and decay. The operations of the corn merchant are exactly those that are required in a thickly-peopled country at all times, and more especially needed in a time of dearth. They make quantities, needs, time, and consumption their study, and "speculate" on meeting them; like all other men, they commit errors and miscalculate, in many have in the present instance. But what is the broad result? That there is probably at this moment in the United Kingdom more grain in proportion to the population, than in any other country in the world! Is that to be considered a misfortune for the community? Individually, it has caused ruin to many—generally, the commonwealth will benefit. Is the calling that produces this result to be proscribed? We owe our present progress and prosperity to the abundance of the fertility of our own harvest; but, supposing that harvest had not been so good, what would the nation do if compelled to import food wherever it could be found, and at every disadvantage? It would do just as it did under the wisdom of our ancestors, when speculators in corn were persecuted almost as much as the Jews, that is it would suffer immensely. It was the old policy to repress all trading in corn, except local traffic, although want of roads was a sufficient obstacle to very extended intercourse. And the existence of a class of men who made the necessaries of the people a study was considered a crime; nothing was allowed to stand between the producer and the consumer. The consequence was, there might be comparative plenty in one county, and absolute dearth in another; the distributors and equalisers of the supply were met by Acts of Parliament that fined and imprisoned them for exercising that prudence and forethought which the mind of a nation never did and never can exercise for themselves. And, with a consistency quite equal to their wisdom, the Government of those days never performed the functions which this class of men would have discharged, though the necessity of their exertions was too often proved. The fact that speculators grew up and flourished, even under Acts of Parliament, showed that society instinctively felt the want of them, and the social machine did not work well till one important part of the many divisions of labour was supplied. Had Statesmen read aright the history of Joseph in Egypt, and applied the lesson it teaches, to the society around them, many a short-sighted Act of Parliament would have been prevented. What power could load fleets with grain and navigate them across oceans to our shores, except the collective energy created by private enterprise? Would any one in their senses trust the supply of food to the foresight and activity of a Government? Why, its supervising faculties do not extend to preventing us being blown to pieces in the heart of the metropolis, by a power which it has taken on itself to control, but does not. It is only a general control of what exists or is being done that can be entrusted to a Government, and not always that; but for the people to depend on the rulers, is a reversal of the natural order of things, replete with danger. And, without speculators in corn, can any one say how foreign supplies could be obtained? There is no machinery so powerful as the activity of natural commerce.

As the Excise Laws will occupy a prominent place in the discussions of the new Parliament, it is desirable to know what have been the results of the abolition of the system in the only branch of manufacture in which it has been boldly and completely done. Amid monetary pressure, railway embarrassments, and corn trade failures, it is gratifying to see that, when released from fiscal fetters, the skill and enterprise of England can distance all competitors. From some statistics of the manufacture of plate glass just published, it appears that, since the abolition of the duty, the number of hands employed in the process has doubled; the consumption has nearly trebled; the quality of the article has been immensely improved, and the demand is so great, that even the vast increase of hands employed cannot adequately supply it.

Lord George Bentinck once attempted to prove that the relaxation had been a failure, because our exports since the abolition showed a decrease. The fact is, the home demand has grown up in a manner so extraordinary, that it has taken nearly all the efforts of the manufacturers to supply that alone. The trade is growing, importations from abroad are diminishing, and again, we learn that with freedom to act, the competition of "the foreigner" is not in the least to be dreaded. The extent to which our Excise Laws interfere with processes of manufacture can hardly be credited; improvement is scarcely possible under them; they compel the observance of routine, and old methods, for offi.ial convenience, cannot be disturbed; a new discovery would disturb the forms and arrangements of the Excise-office. Revenue must be raised, that is certain; but the Excise, in collecting it, prevents the creation of wealth, locks up energy and industry. The whole system will have to be revised; would it not be better to let manufactures free to produce in the mode best calculated to effect the object, and tax the proceeds of the operation? Raise the Revenue on what is created, not during the process of creation.

THE publication, by the Chamber of Peers, of the papers and documents found in the possession of the Duchess de Praslin and her husband, has revealed how much of intense wretchedness may exist under a surface brilliant with all that wealth and rank can bestow. The "impressions" of the hapless lady, which she relieved her "o'erfraught heart" by recording, though they were never meant for the profanation of other eyes, in their terrible reality, put to shame the laboured fictions of the romance writers by profession. Her involuntary analysis of the character of the Duke, is painfully keen and searching, and furnishes a powerfully-written psychological study. An inferior intellect, and a narrow heart, without a moral sense, cursed with wealth and deprived of object and occupation, becomes degraded after the first effervescence of youth, to the cold, discontented, and at once blasé and sensual. It is a nature but too capable of crime, and a vague indefinite fear of the future seems to pervade the communings of the poor victim with herself. "You have a rare and precious talent at poisoning everything;" there is a sad significance in the words.

The French papers hint at rumours of other crimes in the same exalted sphere of life. The Marquis de Montesquiou has committed suicide; the cause stated is—the perpetration of a forgery. It is reported, too, that a son of one of the most celebrated of Napoleon's Marshals has murdered his mistress, and taken flight! And other "shocking scandals are whispered about affecting high individuals."

THE WEATHER.

The weather during the past week has been generally fine, the sky has been a good deal clouded; the direction of the wind has been variable, but for the most part from the S.W.; the temperature of the first three days was a little above, and of the last four days it was below, the average of the season.

The following are some particulars of each day:—

Friday, the sky was about two-thirds covered with thin cirrostratus, cumuli, and haze, till the evening; after 9h P.M., it was nearly cloudless; the wind was light, and its direction was W.S.W. The average temperature of the day was 61°2. Saturday, the sky was partially covered with cloud till 7h A.M.; it was free from cloud between that time and 9h A.M.; at 10h A.M., the sky was covered with cirrostratus cloud, and a Solar halo was visible, whose radius was 10°; after this time, the sky was cloudless till the evening, and overcast during the evening, the wind was light and from the S.W.; the average temperature of the day was 64°2. Sunday, the sky was, for the most part, cloudless till the evening; a shower of rain fell during the morning; the direction of the wind was N.; the average temperature of the day was 64°5. Monday, the sky was most part cloudy, except at about noon, when a small quantity of cloud only prevailed, the evening was overcast; the direction of the wind was W.S.W.; and the average temperature of the day was 57°5. Tuesday, the sky was overcast, till the evening; broken clouds prevailed during the evening; and after 9h. P.M., the sky was cloudless; the direction of the wind was S.W.; the day was cold; the average temperature was 56°1, and the thermometer's reading was as low as 45° at 11h. P.M.; the night was very cold. Wednesday, the sky was nearly free from cloud till noon, and it was nearly wholly covered by cloud after noon; at times, the clouds were very black, and of a stormy appearance; a slight shower of rain fell in the afternoon; the direction of the wind was variable, being at times N.W., then W., then S., and back again; there were cross currents in the atmosphere, for, whilst the wind on the earth's surface was S., the clouds were moving from the N.W.; the day was cold; its average temperature was 54°, being about 5° below that of the season. Thursday, the sky was for the most part clouded, the weather was rough and squally; the direction of the wind was S.W., and it blew strongly. The day was cold; the average temperature was 52° 0°1. The average temperature for the week was 58°5.

The extreme thermometrical readings of each day were:—

Friday,	Aug. 27	the highest during the day was 70°	and the lowest was 47 deg
Saturday,	28	..... 76½	 53
Sunday,	29	..... 77½	 53
Monday,	30	 66	 49
Tuesday,	31	..... 66½	 46
Wednesday, Sept.	1	..... 65½	 44
Thursday,	2	 65	 45

The average temperature of the month of August was 62°; the average temperature of the dew past was 57°; the average quantity of water in the air balanced a column of mercury of 0.467 inch in height; the weight of the average quantity of water in a cubic foot of air was 5 grains, and the average humidity of the atmosphere was 823, that of complete saturation being represented by 1000.

The amount of rain fallen in the month of August was 2 inches; from January 1 to the present time, there has been 16 inches only of rain; the average yearly amount is about 25 inches, so that a good deal of rain may be expected to fall during the remainder of the year.

Blackheath, Friday, Sept. 3, 1847. J. G.

REPORTED LOSS OF HER MAJESTY'S SCHOONER "MASTIFF."—Letters have been received from the Orkney Islands, announcing the probable loss of the Government steamer Mastiff, Commander Lieutenant A. B. Beecher, off the Island of Sandor, twelve miles from Kirkwall Bay. She has, for some time past, been engaged in the survey of the coasts in the vicinity of the Orkneys. On the morning of Tuesday last, while lying at anchor off the island of Sandor, a gale came on, and she was driven from her anchor and carried ashore, a violent sea beating over her for many hours afterwards. The whole of the crew and officers were saved. Very little chance remained of preserving the steamer.

DEATH BY FIRE-ARMS.—On Monday last, a person named Abraham Edmondson, of 13, Sackville-street, Soho, was cleaning the barrel of a gun, not knowing it was charged with powder. Whilst so engaged he placed the barrel to his mouth, when by some accident the gun went off, the contents shattering his face in a frightful manner. The sufferer was removed to Westminster Hospital, where he shortly afterwards expired.

COAL-PIT EXPLOSION.—Early yesterday week another coal-pit explosion took place at the Ardsley Main Colliery, near Barnsley, the same at which upwards of seventy persons lost their lives on the 5th of March last. On this occasion only three men were severely burnt; but two of them (named Daniel Brewer, married, with four children, and John Cawthorne) are not expected to recover.

ANOTHER BOILER EXPLOSION.—The boiler of the Firebrand, one of the steamtugs employed on the river Tyne, burst one day last week, as the vessel was running into Shields harbour. One of the lads gave way, and the steam rushed forward underneath the deck, and destroyed the fore-cabin, shattering the bulkhead and the entire wooden partitions to pieces. Fortunately, no one was below at the time, but the steam rushed up one of the hatchways and scalded a boy, named Foreman, in the face. Deficiency of water is said to have been the immediate cause of the accident.

POSTSCRIPT.

THE QUEEN IN SCOTLAND.

ABERYEERIE, Tuesday, Aug. 31.

Yesterday, her Majesty went out in her barge on Lake Laggan with the Prince of Wales, attended by the Viscountess Jocelyn, the Marquis of Abercorn, and the Earl of Aberdeen.

The Prince went out into the forest deer-stalking, and returned to the Lodge with a fine stag.

The Earl of Aberdeen took his departure.

There was no addition to the Royal dinner party.

ORKNEY AND ZETLAND ISLES ELECTION.—The close of the poll :—Orkney Dundas, 145; Anderson, 140. Zetland Dundas 18, Anderson, 69. Total Anderson, 209. Dundas, 163. Majority for Anderson 2.

TRIAL FOR MURDER IN SCOTLAND.—A young man, named Thomas Leith was tried at Edinburgh, on Wednesday, for murder. Lord Justice Clerk presided, assisted by Lords Ward and Crichton. [The evidence given was of a kind which left no doubt that the prisoner had poisoned his wife, and the probable cause appeared to be a passion for respecting another woman. The Jury found him guilty, but recommended him to mercy, simply, it appeared, from an aversion to capital punishment. The prisoner was sentenced to death, and the execution fixed for the 22nd instant.

ADDRESS TO SIR R. PEEL.—The Town Council of Sunderland, on Tuesday, voted an address to Sir Robert Peel, complimentary of his public services, especially in reference to commercial reform. The occasion which has given rise to this manifestion of respect is the visit of the hon. Baronet to the Marquis of Londonderry, at Wynyard Park, to participate in the festivities consequent on the nuptials of Lady Alexandrina Vane, with the Earl of Portarlington. The marriage took place on Wednesday last.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

ITALY.

Accounts have been received by extraordinary express from Leghorn, of the 27th ult., announcing the discovery of a conspiracy in that city, got up by the Jesuit-Austrian party. An attack was projected on the house of the Austrian Consul, to give rise to a disturbance, and procure a pretext to the Austrian Government for interfering. Like the conspiracy at Rome, it was discovered by the people. The Grand Duke has formed a Council of State, or consulta, consisting of the most distinguished men of the country.

IRELAND.

THE REPEAL ASSOCIATION. The weekly meeting of the Repeal Association, held on Monday, was numerously attended. Several Members of Parliament were present. J. F. Somers, M.P. for Sligo, presided. Mr. John O'Connell, M.P., commenced the business of the day by handing a remittance of £50 from the "Boston Association of the Friends of Ireland," with a series of resolutions, and a letter from Judge Jarnes, a portion of which, as it had reference to the foreign policy of Ireland, was not submitted to the meeting. One of the resolutions having recognised Mr. John O'Connell as the leader of the Repeal movement, the honourable gentleman stated that he would aware were attached to that distinguished position. Mr. John O'Connell subsequently addressed the meeting at considerable length. At the termination of the proceedings, the rent for the week was announced to be £100.

THE IRISH CONFEDERATION.—A meeting of the Irish Confederation took place in Dublin last week, which was remarkable for two new and singular conversions to Confederate principles. These are, Lord Wallscourt, a Baron in the Irish Peerage, and Mr. Chisholm Anstey, an English barrister, of some eminence in his profession, and M.P. for Youghal.

MURDER IN THE COUNTY TIPPERARY.—A frightful murder was committed in the neighbourhood of Emly, on Sunday last. As James Casham, a respectable farmer, was going to mass about the hour of eleven o'clock in the forenoon, he was waylaid while crossing part of Mr. Bolton Massey's demesne, at Ballywire, and his brains beaten out with stones. Some dealing in land which he had last March with some of his own family, is supposed to have caused this outrage. The Coroner's inquest have returned a verdict of "Wilful murder against persons unknown."

MELANCHOLY OCCURRENCE AT CASHEL.—A very distressing affair took place on Tuesday (last week), at Cashel. Mr. Francis O'Ryan, of Cashel, having had an altercation with his son, Francis Ryan, jun. (an interesting young man, who is to arrive at his majority in a few months), the father discharged a loaded pistol at him, the contents of which entered the right eye, but, taking an oblique direction, did not penetrate the brain. The medical attendants on the wounded gentleman entertain hopes of his recovery, although the ball has not yet been extracted. Mr. F. O'Ryan, sen., is in custody for the offence. The Tipperary Vindicator gives a very different account of this unhappy affair. It intimates that Mr. Ryan, sen., had latterly shown symptoms of mental weakness, and that his quarrel with his son arose from the refusal of the latter to sign certain renewals of leases, to which his signature was necessary.

EXECUTIONS IN IRELAND.—The extreme sentence of the law was carried into execution, at the gallows in front of the county gaol, Kilkenny, on Wednesday (last week), on the culprits Larkin and Daniel, for the murder of Mr. Pelin. —On Thursday (last week) John Helahan, who was convicted at the late assizes of the brut al murder of John Kelly, of Kilsdmond, county Cariow, underwent the extreme penalty of the law in front of the county gaol.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

STORM ON THE COAST OF SCOTLAND.—REPORTED LOSS OF AN EMIGRANT SHIP AND THREE HUNDRED PASSENGERS.

There has been a very violent storm on the coasts of Sutherland and Caithness. A large emigrant ship is said to have been driven upon the rocks of "Far-ont-head," near Durness, and three hundred unhappy individuals perished, the whole that the vessel contained. The accounts yet received of this disaster are rather vague. A letter from Tongue, dated August 31st, says: "I have seen the Durness postman, on his return from that place, who brings the disastrous tidings of the total wreck of a three-masted emigrant ship, with upwards of three hundred passengers, on the rocks at the "Far-out-head," in Durness—not a soul is saved, all have perished, and the ship is a total wreck; only seventeen bodies have as yet come on shore. The headland where the vessel struck is a bold unapproachable place. It is reported that the vessel is from Hull, but you may soon have more authentic accounts from other quarters. The magistrates are on the spot. The vessel is the Canton, of Hull; but as no proper accounts have yet been got of the number of passengers on board, all is taken from surmise, by there being a great deal of clothing and chests coming ashore. The seventeen bodies are said to be those of seamen."

The storm which rent the canvass awnings of the Queen's household at Laggan has done fearful damage in other parts of the north of Scotland. At Thurso, a vessel called the Britannia, of Ardrossan, was wrecked, and two of her crew drowned. Another—the Freak, of Dundee—was lost; crew saved. From Shetland, intelligence has arrived of the loss of the packet-boat from Dunrossness, when six persons perished. At Fraserburgh one herring-boat went down with all hands, and many more, it is dreaded, have met with a similar fate. An Inverness sloop is also on shore there, but the crew escaped.

ACCIDENT TO THE "GLAMORGAN" STEAM PACKET.—The Glamorgan steam-packet left Bristol on Monday morning, with 600 persons on board, for a cheap excursion to Minehead. An accident happened when she had left the harming ferry-house, namely, however, without foundation. It appears that, when off Minehead, a sudden escape of steam caused an alarm to be raised that the boiler had burst. Great consternation ensued, and symptoms of disorder being made, a number of the passengers left the steamer in the Ferry sloop, and two boats from the shore. On examination it was found that a boiler-plate had given way, and after anchoring for the night, the injury was sufficiently repaired next morning to enable the steamer to put into Minehead, and finally return to Bristol with the rest of the passengers. The vessel is very old, and is considered unfit for service.

CHARGE OF MANSLAUGHTER.—On Tuesday Mr. W. Carter held an inquest at the Bedford Arms, East-lane, Walworth, on the body of Mrs. Mary O.ds. She died on Thursday (last week), and her husband is at present in custody. It appeared that the deceased had managed to board upwards of £200 per year. Her husband on Saturday week insisted on having some of it; and, on her refusing, made a violent assault upon her. He caught her by the throat, and while on the ground knelt on her chest. Her son, a lad of sixteen years of age, ran to the station-house, stating that his father was murdering his mother. The police interfered, but on the following Thursday the deceased died from the effects of the injury she received. The Jury returned a verdict of "Manslaughter" against the husband.

A HUSBAND COMMITTED FOR POISONING HIS WIFE. An inquiry took place, last Saturday before C. J. Carttar, Esq., at the Garrick's Head, Lower-road, Deptford, respecting the death of Mary Hutchings, aged forty-eight, the wife of John Hutchings, a cooper, recently employed at her Majesty's victualling yard, Deptford, whose demise took place on Sunday night week. Several witnesses were examined, who deposed to the husband's general ill-treatment of his wife. Deceased was taken seriously ill on Sunday afternoon, vomiting very much, and in great pain. She said she had taken jalap. A surgeon was called in in the evening, who prescribed what he thought was necessary, treating the case as one of cholera. Suspicion, however, having been excited, a post-mortem examination of the stomach took place, and a considerable quantity of arsenic was found in it. Hutchings was called in and examined, but he merely said he was an innocent man, and gave no explanation. The Jury found a verdict of "Wilful murder" against him, and he has been committed to Newcate for trial.

SUICIDE OF A SERVANT GIRL.—On Tuesday Mr. Payne held an inquest, at the Ship, Little Tower-street, on the body of Emma Allsop, aged twenty-three, a servant in the employment of Mr. Farley, a grocer and ten-dealer, of 5, in the same street. The evidence proved that the deceased had been confined to her bed with illness on Friday and Saturday (last week), during which time she complained of violent pains in her head. About four o'clock in the afternoon of the latter day, on one of her friends entering her bed-room, she was astonished at finding a pool of blood on the floor and a frightful wound in the deceased's neck. Upon the bed was found a razor, belonging to a gentleman living in the house, with which she had committed the dreadful deed. It appeared that the deceased, in order to get possession of the razor, had got up and gone from her own bedroom to that belonging to the lodger without being perceived. Verdict—"Temporary insanity."

THE PRASLIN TRAGEDY.

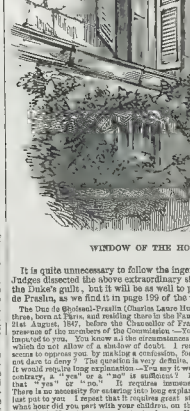
A QUARTO volume, of two hundred and twenty-six pages, has just been printed, by order of the Court of Peers, for distribution amongst its members, relative to the investigation of the facts connected with the Assassination of the Duchess de Praslin, and with the subsequent Suicide of her assassin, the Duc de Praslin. The evidence contained in the volume is illustrated and elucidated by plans of the Hôtel Praslin, No. 86, Faubourg Saint Honoré, and its dependencies; of the interior of the mansion, with the route through which the murderer must have passed to accomplish his deadly purpose; and of the bedchamber of the unfortunate Duchess, with the places where each article of furniture was placed, and the pieces thrown down in the awful struggle. Having received a proof copy of the above volume and drawings, we placed the latter immediately in the hands of our Artists and Engravers, who have presented faithful copies in our columns this day; and we now proceed to the analysis of the testimony of the various witnesses, and of the examination of the two persons arrested for the crime the Duc de Praslin, now no more; and the Governess, Mdlle. Henriette Deluzy-Desportes. The volume is divided into two series: the first, containing the investigations by the local magistrature; and the second, the Royal Ordonnance convoking the Court of Peers, with the result of their inquiries; ending with the death of the Duc de Praslin. The greater portion of the facts, in the first series, has been already reported at length in our columns; but in the second series there are many novel points, not yet made known to the public.

The first witness is one of the Commissary of Police of the Quartier des Champs Elysées was drawn up, at a quarter to six in the morning of the 18th of August, not two hours having elapsed from the discovery of the crime before the Inferior magistrates had commenced their examination. MM. Bruzelin and Truy, in their very first record, proves that their suspicions fell on the Duke, spots of blood having been found on his person, with pieces of torn shirt stained.

It will be recollected that the journals were not aware that the Duke was thus suspected from the beginning—a proof of the prudence with which the inquiry was conducted. The minute examination of the two medical men, MM. Casmel and Heymond, proves that the Duchess received thirteen wounds in the head, two on the neck, one on the lower jaw, with the jugular vein divided, besides wounds on the arms, wrists, and hands, from a double-edged weapon. M. Broussais, the Juge d'Instruction, took up the inquiry at eight o'clock, with the Procureur du Roi. They traced the blood up to the room of the Duke, which he accounted for by his contact with the body, when Auguste, his valet, and the other servants, were in the room. The Duke appears to have parried the searching questions with no little ingenuity; but after the Judge had seized all his clothes, handkerchiefs, slippers, &c., marked with blood, and the sabre of burned papers, linen, &c., he was called upon for a circumstantial declaration. This statement was cool and collected. We give this in extenso, as it has been hitherto erroneously printed in the papers:

"Madame de Praslin and I arrived yesterday in Paris, at a quarter past eight in the evening, by the Corbeil Railroad. Madame de Praslin got into a hackney coach, with my sons and their tutor, and I got into another, with my daughters and youngest son; and we arrived at our mansion at a quarter-past ten o'clock, after having both made calls in Paris. Madame de Praslin had several to make. I, with my daughters, went to see their former governess, Mdlle. De Luzy, living at Rue de Harlay, No. 9, au Marais. I did not see the Duchess on my arrival, as she had already gone to her room. I, on my part, immediately went to my bedroom, after having contented my daughters in their room, situated on the second floor.

I went to bed, and fell asleep immediately, without wanting the assistance of a valet-de-chambre, whose services I do no not make use of. This morning, at an hour I cannot indicate, but as daylight it was marked by confused cries; but, as such were frequently heard in the Champs Elysées, I was not alarmed, and I did not even get up immediately. A moment afterwards I heard steps to and fro in the garden, and I got out of bed, put on my dressing-gown, and went towards Madame de Praslin's room. On arriving at the third door of my room, which is at the foot of the steps of the small corridor preceding it, I heard continued cries; I think it was "A l'assassin!" that was called out, and, without going further, I turned back to my room; I entered my study, and I took from the secretary a loaded horse-pistol, with which I armed myself. I then descended to the room of Madame de Praslin, in which I entered, passing through her dressing-room. Darkness and profound silence reigned therein. I called Madame by her name of Fanny, and she did not answer me. I then went out into the dressing-room, and I lighted a wax candle with matches which were always there, under the clock in that room. I then returned alone into the Duchess' chamber, and I found her seated on the floor, her head supported on a sofa placed between the chimney and the window. I went to her; her face was covered with blood, which flowed abundantly from wounds on her head and neck. It did not strike me to call my servants; there would, in fact, have been no time, for I had scarcely essayed to raise Madame's head, and to give her some help, when I heard a knocking at the door of Madame, communicating with the saloon. I went to draw the bolt, which closed it on the interior, and I found there the person whom I named to you just now (the servants). It was in the attempt to aid Madame in Duchesse that I stained myself with blood. After these persons had entered, I talked with them for about twenty minutes or half an hour. I touched several times the body of Madame de Praslin; and finally, as I was distracted, I returned to my room, where I first cleaned my hands, and it was only as a later period that I tried to get rid of the spots of blood with water that I had on my breast, on the left side of my dressing-gown. va order not to frighten my children, to whom I was about to go to inform them of the misfortune which had just taken from them their mother. My courage failed me to tell it them. Very soon afterwards, General Sebastiani, uncle of the Duchess, arrived, and he was still with me when M. Bruzelin, the Commissary of Police, arrived. My first anxiety had been to order the Commissary of Police and a doctor to be sent for."



WINDOW OF THE HOTEL SEBASTIANI.

It is quite unnecessary to follow the ingenious cross-examination by which the Judges dissected the above extraordinary statement, and came to the certainty of the Duke's guilt, but it will be as well to place here the examination of the Duc de Praslin, as we find it in page 199 of the volume in the second series:

The Duc de Choiseul-Praslin (Charles Laure Hugues Théobald), Peer of France, aged forty-three, born at Paris, and residing there at 86, Faubourg St. Honoré. He is examined on the 21st August, 1847, before the Chancellor of France, the President of the Court of Peers, in presence of the members of the Commission.—You are aware of the frightful crime that is imputed to you. You know all the circumstances which have come under your own eyes, and which do not allow of a shadow of doubt. I recommend you to summon the fatigue which has come to oppress you by making a confession, for it is impossible for you to deny; you can not dare to deny? The question is very definite, but I have not sufficient strength to answer it (it would require long explanation.—I've say it would require long explanations; but, on the contrary, a "yes" or a "no" is sufficient? It requires great strength of mind to reply that "yes" or "no." It requires immense strength, which I do not possess.—There is no necessity for entering into long explanations to reply to the question which I have just put to you. I repeat that it requires great strength of mind, which I do not possess. At what hour did you part with your children, on the evening the crime was committed? [It might be half-past ten, or a quarter to eleven.—What did you do when you came down to my chamber, and went to bed immediately.—Did you [illegible] what hour? I don't recollect.—Was your resolution formed when you went to bed?—I know if it can be called a resolution.—What was your first thought upon awaking at 5 o'clock?—I was awoke by cries in the house; I immediately ascended to the chamber of Madame de Praslin. (The accused here added, sighing, I beg of you to spare my life, and to stop this interrogation.) When you entered the chamber of Madame de Praslin, you could not be ignorant of that. You have frequently, in the course of this morning, gone into the chamber of Madame de Praslin. was she in bed the first time you entered? No, she was, unfortunately, stretched upon the floor.—Was she not stretched upon the spot where you had struck her for the last time? Why do you put such a question to me? Because you have not answered to all. Whence came those scratches which I see upon your hands? They happened yesterday evening, when about to leave Praslin, when making use some par cels with Madame de Praslin.—And that bite upon your thumb how did that happen? [illegible] a bite.—The doctors who have visited you, declare that it is. Spare me, I am exhausted.—I cannot experience a more distressing moment, when you now, [illegible] that you were covered with the blood which you had just shed, and which [illegible] to wash off? These marks of blood have been altogether misinterpreted [illegible] some my children with the blood of their mother upon me.—You are very unwilling to have committed this crime? (The accused makes no answer.) Has quarrels arrived?—Have you not received bad advice, which impelled you to this crime? I have received no advice. People don't give advice on such a subject.—Are you not devoured with remorse, and would it not be a sort of solace to you to have told the truth? Strength completely fails me to-day.—You are constantly talking of your weakness. I have just now asked you to answer me simply "yes" or "no." If any body would feel my pulse, he might judge of my weakness.—Yes you have had just now sufficient strength to answer a great many questions in detail. You have not wanted strength for that. (The accused makes no reply.)—Your silence answers for you that you are guilty.—You have come here with a conviction that I am guilty, and I cannot change it.—Yet can change it if you will give us any reason to believe the contrary: if you will give any explanation of appearances that are inexplicable upon any other supposition than that of your guilt. I do not believe I can change that conviction on your mind.—Why do you believe that you cannot change that conviction? (The accused, after a short silence, said that he had not strength to continue.) Do you you consentand the frightful crime, did you think of your children? As to the crime, I have not committed it: as to my children, they are the subject of my constant thoughts. I repeat that you have not committed this crime? The accused, putting his head between his hands, remained silent for some moments, and then said "I cannot answer such a question."—The Chancellor then intimated to the prisoner that he must consider himself under arrest, and the examination terminated.

GATE OF THE HOTEL SEBASTIANI.

We need not follow the series of examinations mentioned in the procès verbaux, lasting until one o'clock in the morning, when the examining Judges found it requisite to take some repose after their arduous labours. Proof upon proof was collected during the search, and the architect, who was called in to prepare plans of the exterior and interior of the hôtel. The book, with the title "Mrs. the place of the exterior and interior of the hôtel. The book, with the title "Mrs. Armytage," an English work, which was seen in the hands of the Duchess at eleven o'clock at night, by her lame de-chambre, was found, stained with blood.

Another elaborate examination of the body of the Duchess was made by Baron Pasquier, the King's surgeon, MM. Boys de Loury, M. Tardieu, &c.; the conclusions come to—that there were thirty large and deep wounds—some made with a blunt instrument, and others with a sharp one. That death arose from loss of blood, and that there must have been a violent struggle—the state of the carpet leaving no doubt on this subject. The state of the stomach proved that the victim must have cried out several times, and that she must have lived long enough to swallow a quantity of saliva mixed with blood. That the left hands on the last attack must have been inflicted last, as her means of resistance must have become weaker; and that the hand and nails of the murderer must have been strongly applied to the mouth, to stifle her cries.

The next class of witnesses examined were those who heard the cries at daybreak, on the morning of the fatal 18th of August, proceeding from the Hôtel Praslin. Then follow the depositions of the servants of the Duke and Duchess, beginning with Auguste Chevrotier, the valet-de-chambre and maître d'hôtel. He testified as to the bad understanding between the Duke and Duchess, stating, as he heard, from the Duke's attachment to Mdlle. Deluzy, the latter would not be there. Deluzy denied this in Paris; but I must add that dence of Mdlle. Deluzy, Rue du Harlay, No. 9, au Marais; but I must add that he never went the Duke. During a short period when Mdlle Deluzy was to have quitted the house, he had charged me to go and take the dimensions of rooms, retained beforehand, at the house of Madame Lambert, Avenue Sainte-Marie, which she was to occupy, in order to place furniture therein. This plan was not carried out, but I know not for what reason. Our journeys to Paris took place during the month of August; on the 2nd, leaving our estate on the 6th; on the 8th, leaving on the 9th. On the latter day, Mdlle. Deluzy came to reconduct the Duke to the railroad, and I saw her in tears in the hackney coach which had brought her, as well as the Duke and his two children, Mdlle. Marie and Berthe, and M. Raynal. The Duchess never came to Paris since her departure for the country. The last appearance of the Duke in Paris took place on the 11th of August, and we returned on the 12th, the Duke by the train of seven o'clock, and I by that of half-past twelve. I never entered the rooms of the Duchess during any of these journies, because the Duke had ordered them not to be touched, stating to the woman in charge, Mdme. Grimm, that the Duchess recently recommended to me through Mdme. Schaff, not to evince so much zeal for her (the Duchess') private service, because she had remarked that these attentions on my part might hurt me in the mind of my master. This was all the same to me, as, for two months, I had been seeking another place.

M. Charpentier's evidence then goes on to describe the arrival of the family at the hôtel, the departure of the Duke with his daughters in one carriage, the Duchess in another, and his own in a third with the daughters, and its prolarings of the Duke's room. He heard the Duke arrive at eleven o'clock, and retire to his room; but did not go to him, not being asked for. At five o'clock, he heard the bells of the Duchess' room ring, both for her valet Maxime, and her femme-de-chambre Madame Ledeger. The discovery of the murder, the cries of the victim, the great smoke coming out of the chimney of the Duke's room, the locked doors, the giving of the alarm, &c., are all facts known to our readers. After search that he went to fetch a glass of water for General Sebastiani, who had re ained, on his arrival, out of the Duke's chamber, and that not a drop was to be found (the Duke had used it all in washing away the bloodstains on his hands), he thus concludes his testimony: "I was ordered to keep in my room; and when I found that this measure was adopted, which seemed to incriminate me, I said then, that it would be much better if a search were made in the room of the Duke. From that moment I am ignorant of what passed in the house."

François Jules Lemounier, a medical student, proved that he heard the cries at daybreak, but that they were so frightful, that he attributed them to some enraged madman or mad-woman in the Champs Elysées, and did not get up until two hours after the murder had been discovered.

The femme-de-chambre, Madame Leclerc, fully confirmed the evidence of Charpentier, mentioning a curious fact, that the Duke had dismissed Mademoiselle Josephine, a femme-de-chambre of his daughter on the 16th of August, at Praslin, for having allowed the Duchess to sleep in her room, in order that she

"Madame la Duchesse arrived at the mansion half-an-hour or three-quarters of an hour after me, that is to say, between half-past nine and ten o'clock. On arriving, she was hungry, and ordered, as there was no bouillon, a piece of bread with salt, a knife, and half a bottle of sirop d'argent. There was water in the water-bottle. I placed all these things on a little work-table at the end of the sofa which is near the chimney-piece. Madame was about to eat at a quarter-past ten, after I had arranged her toilette for the night, at the moment when I retired to my room to take some refreshment. Towards eleven o'clock, I entered her chamber for the last time. Madame was in bed, reading; she had a wax candle on her table de nuit, and a second candle was burning on the commode, near the door of the boudoir. Madame said to me, that she had lighted the candle because she thought that I would not return to her room. I said to her, yes, and I extinguished this candle, which would have burnt the whole night, and put in its place a yellow copper night-lamp, which I placed lighted in the interior of the chimney, as I was daily accustomed to do; for Madame never slept without a light. Auguste Charpentier had prepared this lamp, and had placed it on the commode of the little antechamber separating the dressing-room of the Duchess from the room of the Duke; and, I am certain to have seen closed, with the ordinary bar of iron, the door of the staircase leading to the garden: the window of this antechamber, and the persienne (Venetian blinds) of this window, were also closed. Madame herself was in the habit of taking care that this door and window were closed, and it happened sometimes that she herself placed the bar of iron, when it had been neglected to have been done. Madame, when I quitted her, told me to call her the next morning at six o'clock, as she had so many things to do during her single day's stay in Paris. We were to have left the day after, at six o'clock, for sea-bathing at Dieppe. I then remarked that, during my absence, Madame had taken the food, the remainder of the bread, the plate, and the half bottle of sirop remained on the little table I mentioned, but she placed her glass of water on her table de nuit. On leaving the dressing-room of Madame, I met, in the antechamber, the Duke, returning to the house with something under his arm. I did not speak to him. I afterwards closed the second door of this antechamber that which is near the fountain, for the other was never closed, and I hung up the key on the ordinary nail, on the right side of the mantel-piece, where a stranger could not see it. The closing of this door was on this side, the only closing of the sleeping-room of the Duchess; for the door of her dressing-room and the two doors communicating from her cabinet to her room, were never closed. The second door of this room could be locked with the aid of an interior bolt; but the Duchess was not in the habit of drawing it at night; she closed it during the day, when she dressed or wrote. I did not remark that the staple of this lock had been detached from the mantel-piece at the door, and that, consequently, this door could not be locked. I am certain that this staple was in its ordinary place when we left for the country, six weeks since."

Madame Leclerc then deposed to the hearing of the two strong pulls at the bells, which awoke her, coupled with frightful cries from the Duchess; to her attempt to enter the room with Auguste at the door of the antechamber, at the foot of the staircase, and finding it locked, the cries still continuing: of their transit by the grand salon, but finding the doors to the sleeping room also locked: to the cessation of the cries, and then, said the witness, "C'etait un silence de mort." She passed with Auguste into the garden by the steps of the grand salon, Auguste trying the blinds of the sleeping room and boudoir in vain. Arrived at the extremity of the boudoir in the garden, they perceived the door of the house called the wooden staircase, opening on the antechamber, separating the rooms of the Duke and Duchess, open, and by this way entered the dressing-room, the door of which was wide open. Auguste, on reaching the door of the Duchess' sleeping-room, drew back, exclaiming that some misfortune had happened, for he smelt powder. She was frightened to death at his words—they did not dare enter the room, and retired by the garden and saloon to call for help. It was quite dark in the dressing-room, as the windows were all closed, but it was daybreak out of doors. Merville and Charpentier finally entered the Duchess room, and found her assassinated.

Merville, the valet-de-chambre in the service of the Duchess of Orleans, deposed that he was formerly with the Marshal Sebastiani, and that, when the daughter of the latter married the Duc de Praslin, in October, 1834, he entered the service of the latter, and remained until 1839, when he passed into the service of the late Duke of Orleans; but his wife, who was lanndress to the Duchess de Praslin, never left her service. He declared that the Duke and Duchess lived happily until Mdlle. Deluzy came into the house as governess, and that she had been the cause of the alienation of affection from the Duchess of her husband and children. The fact was notorious. He corroborated the evidence of Charpentier and Madame Leclerc as to the alarm, and the scene in the Duchess' room. He observed, like Charpentier, the excessive smoke from the Duke's room, as if a large fire had been lighted. The little work-table, a plate, a salt cellar, &c., were on the ground. The only exclamation of the Duke that he heard was, "Ah! mon Dieu! what is the matter?" And then, putting his hand to his head, he added, "Who has done that?" Who has done that?"

His wife's evidence, as the keeper of the nursery, was quite childlike with the Duchess, was to the effect that, except some occasional scenes with the Duke, they lived happily until Mdlle. Deluzy entered the house, and then the differences became serious, the Duchess constantly weeping. On Monday, the 16th, the Duke wrote to Madame Merville, that fourteen persons would arrive the next day, the Duchess, her children, &c., and that they would leave, on the 17th (Thursday), for Dieppe. She gave the same details as the other servants, adding, however, that she suspected the Duke instantly of the murder.

Brifford, the concierge of the Hôtel Praslin, deposed that the door of the wooden staircase had never been opened during the absence of the family; that it was locked not only with a key but with a bar of iron; and that this was in its place when the Duchess arrived at half past nine on the evening of the 17th. His wife spoke as to the family details as contained in the preceding evidence; she never perceived any positive signs of an acquaintance with the Duke calculated to excite jealousy. "Although I knew it," said this witness, "that she was a bad woman, for whom Lalwyn fell a dislike." Deluzy told her that the Duchess de Praslin had never shed a tear when her eldest daughter left for Italy with her husband. Madame Brifford to this reproach replied, that persons who did not shed tears often suffered more than those who gave full vent to their grief. She saw the body of his wife soon after the murder, he cried out, "Ah! poor woman, poor woman! what monster has assassinated her?" She took the head of the Duchess on her arm; she still breathed; she washed her face with a little spirit of vinegar; but the victim breathed her last sigh in her arms just as the doctor, M. Cannet, entered the room. He asked him to bless Madame; but he replied, "It is too late." A moment after, the Duke again entered, and, with his hand on his wife's shoulder, cried, "Ah! poor woman, poor woman! who is the monster who has done that?" He perceived the bloody cap in the chimney, and said, "Oh! what horror, what horror!" He flung himself on the bed, and then left the door of the saloon. He appeared desperate, and tore his hair in exclaiming, "Poor children! who will tell them this?—they have no longer a mother! Poor Marechal! who will tell him that?" This scene lasted, according to the witness, until the arrival of General Sebastiani. "On witnessing this great crime," she concluded, "my thought was that it had been committed by the horrible woman who had been governess to the children. I had known her to be in the habit of speaking to a cabinet, and that she was about to appear."

The next point of interest in this volume, is the first examination of Mdlle. Deluzy Desportes, aged 38 years, taken before M. Bryossaila, Juge d'Instruction, in presence of the King's Procureur. As we shall give at length her more important testimony before the Commission of the Court of Peers, we shall but briefly refer to the leading facts. She entered the house of the Duc de Praslin on the 1st of March, 1841, at a salary of 2000 francs per year (£80), with board and lodging, having previously lived in the same capacity at Lady Bloop's, near Carlton, Reeli, at a salary of £72. She had to take charge of the education of the nine children, the aid of an under-governess being given. Subsequently a tutor was added for the boys, and these boys were placed under M. Bousset, of the Bourbon College, leaving the three eldest girls and a little boy under her tuition. The three youngest girls were placed in the Convent of the Sacré Cœur. It seemed, from her statement, that the arrangements for which Mdlle. Deluzy remaining only six months, and the other, Mdlle. Jost, a year. For the last three years Mdlle. Deluzy remained sole governess. She declared that when she entered the family, Duke and Duchess lived happily; that for a long while the Duke placed the entire power over the children in the hands of Mdlle. Deluzy, who opposed the attempts of the Duchess to interfere in their education, with the direct sanction of the Duke. She admitted that she was very wrong to have accepted such a position, but she denied that she had ever attempted to wound the feelings of the Duchess. Interrogated as to the causes of disunion between the pair, she replied, "On the part of the Duchess, it was the desire to dominate over her children, and, above all, of her husband; and, on the part of the Duke, a decided opposition, but accompanied with much kindness." Mdlle. Deluzy considered that she had given the Duchess just grounds for slightest reason for jealousy. She remained after the suspicions had got abroad, because the Duke had promised her a pension for life after she had finished the education of the girls. An article appeared in a journal two years ago, stating that she had eloped with the Duc de Praslin to Corsica, and she wanted then to leave, but Marshal Sebastiani persuaded her to stop, as her remaining in the family would most effectually silence the calumny. She remained, however, only when the Abbé Gallard told her that her presence in the family was a cause of discord, and that she could not remain, she was or rebuked. She affirmed that the Duchess blew hot and cold with her, sometimes friendly and next cold and distant. She left the house finally on the 18th of July last, when the family went to the Chateau de Praslin. She admitted that she had seen the Duke three times since in Paris (see her first examination), the last time that was on the 17th of August, with his three daughters, and his little boy, between eight and nine o'clock in the evening. The following important facts we give in her own words:—"Madame Lalande, the Duchess's maid, came to break on the first time, made known to him her intention of giving me a superior situation in her house; but she said to him that to consequence of the rumours which had been spread on my account, it was indispensable that I should quit the house, and that her a letter, ostensibly for the purpose of contradicting them. It was then agreed, that on the following day, I should present myself to the Duchess to solicit from her this letter, and that I was to leave home immediately after in the afternoon. The Duke and his children then quitted me at about ten o'clock.

Our readers will recollect that the interview was to have taken place at two P.M., on the 18th, and that the Duchess was murdered about one o'clock on that day. There can be no doubt, therefore, that the Duke went to the room of the Duchess to obtain this certificate as to the governess' morality, and that the murder followed the Duchess' refusal. From the nature of the injuries it may be supposed that he began with inflicting blows on his wife, and that on her resistance, he resorted at last to the horrible mode of terminating her existence, indicated in the medical report, the most desperate wounds, according to the surgeons, having been the last inflicted.

To go on with Mdlle. Deluzy's examination, she declared that she withdrew to rest at 11 o'clock on the night of the 17th. She was informed of the awful event at eight in the morning, by M. Rémy, Professor of Literature to the young ladies. She went to his house and remained there until eight at night, when she was arrested. She has made up her mind to leave Madame Lalande's house at such a moment. She replied that M. and Madame Rémy, seeing her so shocked, would not leave her to herself. She left word where she was going to with Madame Lalande, who told the police. The remainder of her evidence is too serious matter to be given en extenso

You have to understand that very grave indications accumulate to justify the accusations against the Duc de Praslin of having murdered his wife.—Oh, no, I cannot believe that this is not so. It is impossible. He, he who could not bear to see one of his children suffer for a fault, he, but not that they are serious. Tell me that it is a suspicion which will not exist. No, no; it is impossible. (Falling on his knees, and joining her hands.) Oh! tell me this, Sir, I pray you. My God! you say that to me which I cannot believe. My conscience tells me that it is not the truth. But if it is a fact, prove it to me, that I may no longer believe it, who loved so much his children—I, who adored them! I have been criminal! I have not known how to resign myself to my lot. I have written letters to those persons whom you may see. I said that I could no more live; that I found myself in the presence of misery, for I am a poor abandoned creature, without father, without mother, who is severe, and who has threatened to deprive me of the little which he put by for me. I was frightened at the future let what might befall me. Do—Sir worry yourself about me. I should have said to them that I could have adopted myself to my situation, that I could be happy in my little chamber, and that they should forget me as they have their mother. When I quitted the house, I was driven to such despair that I wished to die. I had a pistol in the—they unfortunately—real ball in it, and it is very sharp. I had been caring it for years in that house, as many in the middle of these children, who loved me, and whom I loved more than life. He was inappreciable to me without these, and I have said it—it is my crime. It is I who am culpable. State it, Sir. Write it. He—has been diminished his unhappy letter—he refused it, and then! Oh, it is I who am guilty! Write it, Sir.

Such a state of excitement could not be assumed by one who could exist between these children and you. It is those children, and to those children only, that I addressed the letters of—some of which you have spoken.—Yes, Sir, the existence may belong to all those sentiments. Do you not understand that? And then I should not like to reply, that, finding M. de Praslin was—blind and gnawed between me, a deep feeling of affection for my father was added to the affection which I felt for the children; but, never, never did I carry into that house a thought or a—I would not have done so on any account. From respect for the old dren. I believe that I should have contaminated my daughters if I had embraced them after I had been criminal. I have been criminal, but my—I have been unhappy? We now give here the second examination of the Governess, before the Commission of the Court of Peers

How long have you been engaged in the education of the children of M. de Praslin—through what introduction and you obtain that—through Madame de Fabaut, to whom I was recommended by Lady Bloop—daughter I had quitted.

When you first entered the house of the Duc de Praslin, how were you received?—Well very well. The children manifested every desire to please me, and the Duchess seemed very well satisfied with me.

At this period did not the best understanding exist between M and Madame de Praslin?—No, Sir. The governess whom I replaced informed me that there were often differences between M. and Madame de Praslin, and sometimes in the utmost circumspection.

Did you, in effect, observe this circumspection?—During a—ing time there was no necessity for it, for I lived with the children apart in the house. I observed nothing.

At what time did any change in the mode of life take place?—When the children began to go—The father had much more intercourse with them, and of course, and necessarily, with me—because I was always with them. Madame de Praslin kept herself aloof, because she went much into society in Paris, and lived with her father; and in the country she kept very much to herself in her own apartment. She even had her meals served apart frequently. I suppose that rose led from some circumstance between herself and M. de Praslin, with which I am unacquainted.

Did you not endeavour, however, as it seemed to be your duty to do, to bring the children and their mother as much as possible together in heart and spirit?—I frequently endeavoured to come to an understanding with Madame de Praslin on this subject, but she would never acquaint me with her intentions respecting her children. She told me she did not conceive of the freedom given by M. de Praslin as to their studies and education; but she has promised to leave to him entirely the direction of the studies; that education was finished. She never put a question to me with respect to the mode in which I conducted—deal—of any of her daughters. She never interfered in the—duties. Instructed in conscience, in good—in short whatever, except it might be upon the details of their toilette. She never tried to alienate her children to her—she never spoke to them of—Whom were alone the conversation between her and myself on—orderly turned upon questions of literature, in which the children from six to—and were of their—ation, necessarily could take no—t. These conversations fatigued the children, and made them exclaim to be—ne with; me, who placed myself under—ding, I say again, could not—a mother like Dame Nash, had she been so disposed.

In your answers to the questions put to you, the whole blame is thrown upon the Duchess de Praslin. It is very distressing to hear such language from your mouth, particularly to those who have been the latest friends in mine, and who are aware of the purpose of a pension made to you as the reward of your services in her family.—You have questioned upon the points presented by the—ation of M. de Praslin. I have endeavoured to make my explanations as clear as possible. As to that which is personal to myself, the conduct of Madame de Praslin has been open as—it. It has been towards those whom she knew, and even whom she loved best, very unequal, and often incomprehensible. I have often had much to endure in my amour propre in the midst of her feelings. At other times I have been touched by her with interest and kindness. Frequently, an hour after she had bitterly reproached me with this influence which I exercised in her family, she would send for me to avail herself of that very influence in obtaining from me details which she desired to be related. Often after some cruel injury, she would make me a rich present, and even in the last days of my—I found myself—ged—ofused to name me at table, I appeared in the—gyes of the whole house to have been rather dismissed than honourably parted with. Madame de Praslin, having received from the—ation of the pardon and the most kindness in the most amicable terms, and even sent me some books to distract my attention.

This is only a small part of her kindness.—Do you not think that in herself only a proof that her displeasure resulted from the irritation of a character of which she was not mistress, rather than from what she believed to be real facts.

This irritation of character was, alas! but too well founded; and did you not, by a—ation to M. de Praslin, after seeing the letter, endeavour to soothe the anger of his three daughters and his youngest son.

When he came to you for the last time, how long were you together? Three-quarters of an hour. He asked me to get into his carriage with him, because he wanted to speak to me

What was the subject of the conversation?—Nothing but the question of his third daughter.

After some further evidence with respect to a contemplated separation between M. and Madame de Praslin, and the circumstances immediately connected with his leaving the house, the examination of Mdlle. Deluzy terminated.

In the above examination is to the second series, the Journal des Débats with her preliminary interrogatory. The Ordonnances of the King, convoking the Court of Peers the decree for the trial the réquisitoire for the arrest the nomination of the counsel for the prosecution—the Procès Verbaux for the collection of the furniture and materials for presence—the analyses of the chemists, of the poisons found in the Duc de Praslin's study, &c., occupy a considerable place. Nothing can be more minute than these documents; not a particle of a stain of blood is visible in contact. The fragment of the Corsican dagger, with its broken handle, the horse pistol, &c., were all tested, and the stains of recent blood proved to have existed. The dagger was found in the pocket of the handkerchief that had inflicted the chief wounds, and the butt-end of the pistol the contused wounds. It was found loaded with ball, on the charge being drawn before the magistrates. There was, also, a ball pair of pistols found in the room of the murder. The report of the search made in the Château de Vaux-le-Praslin describe the correspondence found in the Duke's rooms, and those of the Duchess.

The report of M. Ollivier, the gendarme, on the suicide of a man of about 30 years of age, with a—ache, and taken to the Cémétière du Sud, on the 27th, and interred in a grave.

The examination of Dr. Raymond, to ascertain the cause of death, by MM. Orfila, Pardieu, &c., proved the existence of several wounds, twenty-one scratches being counted on the face. Ten small wounds were found on the two hands, as if they had been inflicted by a child. The wounds on the head and the throat were sound; the heart was voluminous; inflammation existed to a great extent in the intestines; the liver was healthy. The cause of death was the swallowing of some irritating substance in chemical combination, probably with white arsenic. The question as to the moment when he took the poison will remain in obscurity. The medical men declare that, on their first examination of the Duke, at his own house after the murder, he was not under the effects of poison, but that he did not communicate his suspicions to the other doctors until the arsenic had taken strong hold of the Duke's vital functions. MM. Orfila and Pardieu are of opinion that he took the poison between the hours of four and ten o'clock on the 18th; that, although the vomitings ceased in two days, that the action of the poison went on, and that death ensued from arsenic, taken six days before the 24th of August.

Laurence Ramelet, another femme-de-chambre spoke as to the dismissal of Josephine, at the instigation of the Duchess, and as to her suspicions on hearing of the accusation of the Duke. Similar evidence have been fully Deluzy. Dr. Raymond's evidence is at great length. He remained with the Duke nearly all the time he was in the house prior to being taken to prison. The most remarkable point is that Dr. Raymond was present with the Duke during several of the Deluzy sings, at ten P.M., on the 18th, he left him alone, and did not return to his patient until the next morning, at seven o'clock, Dr. Louis arriving at eleven o'clock. He declared that his suspicions were excited on finding the Duke dead at 7 A.M., when he communicated them to the Procureur, which, however, the latter denied, affirming that it was only on the 20th Dr. Raymond first spoke as to the Duke having taken poison. Dr. Raymond, however, was positive in his opinion on this subject, but he urged that his first suspicions were too vague, and that he relied on the superior judgment of Dr. Louis. Chevalier, the chemist, was of opinion that the Duke had taken the poison between the arsenic, and that this caused the slow action of the latter poison.

We append letters, extracts from diaries, "impressions," &c., from the documentary section of the Report:—

(Written on June, 1841.)

LETTER FROM THE DUCHESS TO HER HUSBAND.

"Wherefore, my beloved, do you refuse to let me share your afflictions? You deprive our life of all the charms of affection! Do you then believe, or rather do you wish to persuade yourself, that independence consists in solitude? You say that I am exigeante, because I desire to share your sorrows. You do not like me to remark that you have any. Do you then wish to become quite a stranger to me? Do you no longer require my guidance for me to become entirely indifferent to you? And how could I bear to be indifferent to the person I love best on earth? Do you think it possible? Would not my heart break long before? You speak of your sorrows as if they were not mine. You speak of distancing my sadness; you know how it is in your power to console me, and yet you withhold these consolations. I, on the contrary, I see that you are sad, I feel within my heart a sorrowful and hopeless void, that urgently calls for calm and solitude. You frown, and you discard me! Am I not your wife, the partner of your life, she whose duty it is to share equally your pleasures and your sorrows? If you were ill, is it not my hand that would smooth your pillow? And are not sorrows the cases of the mind—of the spirit? Wherefore, then, reject me? . . . You have a heart to appreciate the joys, the wants, of a loving heart, in which to place full confidence and find relief for your sorrows. It is the virtues and the manners that prevents you from placing that confidence in me. Believe me, Theobald, four months of sorrow and repentance have chastened me: it is to love and console you and your children that I seek. That I may be worthy of your esteem and your regard, you must try to gain the ascendancy over you: I am fully aware of your superior character and mind: I only wish to share your life, to embellish it, and pour out upon your pillow the balm of consolation and sympathy that I wished to gain the ascendancy over you. My friend, I swear unto you, in the name of my love, in the name of yours, by all that I hold most sacred and most dear, I swear unto you that I will regain your esteem. It is the virtues and God, how superstitious does grief make one! So I am ashamed of it. On Sunday, the day of your arrival, on rising I perceived an enormous spider. The frightened me. I have not ceased to deplore your manner to me; every day it becomes more cold and disdainful. In this moment, while writing, I turn my eyes and see a little spider. My tears stop. I feel an emotion of joy, as if a cause of hope came to me. How weak is the spirit of man! Nevertheless, it is in thee, my God, my heart has placed all its hopes. But is it possible that sometimes thou sendest visible signs of thy will. Oh, save him, and, if it be possible, restore him to me. Grant that he may read the few lines that I send him, and that they may touch his heart."

[Written in pencil, no date.]

You have a rare and precious talent at poisoning everything. While your conduct influenced only the happiness of my life it was my duty to be silent, as I always was so. If you imagine, with your rare unuttered words and your threats, to make people understand that I no more approve in public than in private the conduct of a person whom I despise, and who does not merit your confidence nor mine, you are right; for I think it a scandalous shame to allow the presence near young people of a woman who has proclaimed herself as she has done. I know well enough that you have other reasons, and that it is not with her that your life is occupied, but she assumes the attitude. It is this which I have the right to blame. I do not pretend to bind myself with your private conduct and affections, but neither menace nor ill-treatment will prevent my repeating, that I have a right to do, that you deceive yourself in putting your children into the hands of a woman who has no care for her reputation, and has ceased to respect itself. The system of governesses has always been unsuccessful with us: it is time, for the safety of our children and the dignity of our rank, to change it. As long as my daughters are not married, I will reside constantly with them, I will aid in their occupations, and I will accompany them everywhere. All my plans are laid down; and, when you reflect on the matter, you will certainly find as many reasons for confidence in leaving the education of our girls under the care of a mother as that of a governess. My father, I know has made an offer to Mdlle. D. of an honorary annuity. On her going to E gland, with this assistance, her talents and patronage will secure her a suitable portion more easily than in Paris

IMPRESSIONS.

Friday, June 17, 1847.—I must repeat hourly to myself that I have accomplished a sacred duty towards my daughters in consenting to join my efforts to those of my father to send away this woman. It caused me a great deal of pain. I had éclat, but every one told me, as well as my own conscience, that it was my duty. By God! what will be the future? How he is incensed! One would think he was not the guilty one. He says he loves his children, and he distrusts their mother, and makes his mistresses their governesses. What a life he is leading; he is losing all his energy. May God guide my children!

Document found at Paris, in the Duchess' secretaire, in a sealed envelope, also entitled "Impressions."

"It is long since I have written anything, and, nevertheless, nothing has changed in the interval. She will leave, when we go to Eu, that is certain. But in the meantime, the empire she holds is most absolute. Father and children, she retains them all as in a special bond. I understand her game well enough, if she have really swallowed all shame, but for him. I cannot explain his conduct. His complains of calumny; but, he confesses that appearances are bad, and he makes these appearances every day worse, and gives more grounds for all the scandalous interpretations. He proclaims that their relations are misinterpreted, and yet he publicly proclaims the rupture with my father on her account. He breaks with us, and does not leave her. No character can be more enigmatical. Is it excess of corruption? or is it excess of weakness? Were it excess of weakness, could that go to the length of making him so traitor to the interests of his children? What! could he have so much fear of this woman as not to dare, while she is in the house, to leave his children with their mother, or show regard to his wife? What has given her the empire over him? It is not natural. She must have some means by which she makes her threats powerful over him. Poor man, I sincerely grieve for him. What a life he leads! What a future he is preparing for himself! If he allow himself to be thus domineered over and brow-beaten by intrigantes at forty-two, what will he be when he grows old? And yet I love him! He must have been sadly changed by all these bad habits; for, on seeing what he is now, I cannot explain what inspired in me this love so impassioned. He is no longer the same man: how dull is his spirit—how narrowed his heart—how much has he grown suspicious, annuied, and irritable. Notaing animates him, nothing interests him, nothing exalts him. No generous, impassioned, or enthusiastic sentiment seems to vibrate in his heart or mind. He had ruined, before all that could render his existence useful, brilliant, happy, and honourable. All is galvanized: he interests himself in nothing either for his country, or for his children. He keeps company with governesses; he is their confessor; and he becomes their slave. Truly, I believe that he only wishes to keep Mdlle. D (whom he has not loved for this eighteen months or two years), because he fears that if once removed, people would make him too hard for her. Poor God! what an existence! What is curious is that I am sane. He firmly believes that it is on account of jealousy that I wish the departure of Mdlle. D. He will not comprehend that my principle is, and will ever be, the sacrifice of self, for my children. He believes that it is my jealous love for him, and this flatters him. It is singular, but I do not doubt that if he had not believed my love inextinguishable, he would have treated me less unworthily. What an illusion, what excess of self-love! Yet it would, perhaps, have been possible to preserve, at the bottom of one's heart, love for a man who has treated you as he has treated me, if, on the contrary, this man excites our admiration, and elevates himself in our eyes by grand actions and great works. But a grovelling, ordinary man, one loves only if he is just, if he is good, if he is conscientious, if he interests his life happily. It is not necessary that he should do great things, but he must know how to appreciate them, how to admire them, and interest himself in them. I cannot tell how far this contempt and ennui at all times, this total unconcern, this taking a lively interest in anything, has completely cooled my feeling towards him I thought him so different. Oh, he must have been so; I could never have loved him if he had always what he is! Certainly there was in him, at the bottom of his heart, in his understanding; but the want of firm principles of morality and religion, and his idleness of mind, have caused him to succumb to sensual passions. And with all this he wishes to educate his daughters. How completely he has isolated himself! He has not a real, serious friend. He has no connections but those which have sprung from his pleasures, and which have become chains from his acquaintances when he wished to detach himself from them. Now [illegible] it is! He drags after him, like a dog, the exigencies of women with whom he has been connected. And yet how bizarre are men! He has always scrutinized, repressed, and, humiliated, ill-treated, and abandoned me for persons whom he did not love. For my part, I have loved only him, and with a passion inexpressible—an ardour which astonishes me; and now I know not but at the bottom of his heart he prefers me to those women, whom he despises and fears; and I, I am well disenchanted with him. He will be always unkind to me now: he is too well aware of the extent of his wrongs, and cannot comprehend that I can forgive and forget. My merit would not be so great as he thinks. I cannot be jealous except when I love, and then I easily forgive; and, since my sentiments are changed, I have no further feeling towards him but on account of the wrong he does my children. Our position is very strange and very sad. While he has run after pleasure I have been secluded from it. He has had enjoyments and no love—for me his love has been extinguished in tears, and I have only seen of what has been worn out by one has, perhaps, been preserved by the other, and reciprocally ——. How will all this end? I do not believe that th s can ever be by a complete reconciliation, as would be desirable for our children. He will always avoid me, because he is conscious of his wrong, and I shall never seek him but from duty to my children. A feeling of shame will always prevent my making advances to a man, even though my husband, when I think of all he has done for him, and when I feel that other ideas, repressed for so many years, have, rather than my affection, urged me to his arms.

"My God! you alone know what privations of the affections and all other kinds I have suffered. If I have not yielded to temptation, the glory be thine, O Lord! O, abandon me not now, for, without thee, I shall sink! My God, my God, support me, stretch me! I fear the future, the threats he has made us, the difficulties which arise daily but thou will be there, my God, and in that is my trust that thou will support the poor mother to whom thou hast given strength to strive for her children. Lord, help me!"

Details of the accompanying illustrations are given in the previous columns. It should, however, be added that the dotted line to the left of the Court-yard denotes the direction followed by Auguste Charpentier, on the ringing of the bell. The dotted line on the left shows the direction followed by Auguste, in going to call Mervilla, and by the same line. The straight line, from line, in tl e centre, denotes the route taken by the femme-de-chambre, Leclerc, to fetch the porters, and her return to the grand saloon, the door of which was opened by the Duke.

THE LATE MR. WALTER, OF THE "TIMES."—The will of the late John Walter, Esq., of Bear-wood Hall, Berks, and Printing House-square, London, was executed by him on the 9th of February, 1847, and he died on the 28th of July. He has devised to his son, John Walter, Esq., M.P. for Nottingham, the entire freehold premises and warehouses belonging to the establishment of the Times, in Printing House-square, and leaves him all his interest in the business. The freehold and copyhold estates which he possessed in the counties of Berks and Wilts, together with the right of presentation to St. Catherine's Church, Bearwood, he leaves to the trustees under the terms of the settlement on the marriage of his said son. The residue of his real and personal estate to his wife, Mrs. Mary Walter, for her own absolute benefit, and has named her sole executrix. Probate of the same was valued for probate duty at £90,000.

BEQUEST OF £9000 TO THE SINKING FUND.—The will and codicil of Mr. William Akers have been proved at the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, by the executors, the sum of £9000 is left to private individuals, and £6000 to the Goldsmiths' Benevolent Institution, the plate, china, books, and furniture to his executors, and £50 each. The residue is disposed of as follows:—"All legacies to be paid out of the Stock in New Three-and-a-Half per Cent., and at the current price of Stock on day of my decease; after all the foregoing legacies having finally settled and concluded, in my mind as to any further bequests—the residue and remainder of my Three-and-a-Half per Cents., and also all the Stock standing in my name in Three per Cent. Reduced, may be added in a codicil to my will; but in case no codicil by me, then that the residue of my estate go to the national fund, called the Sinking Fund, out of the regard I have entertained for my country."

And wins easily.

(a) By this move, Black weakens his position on the King's side.
(b) White very properly avails himself of the opening now afforded for pushing his attack
(c) White's men so completely command the board, that the poor Knight is quite excluded from the enemy's territory.

GAME II.

Mr. Slous gives the Pawn and two moves to Professor Forbes.

(Remove White's K B P from the Board.)

BLACK (Prof. F.)	WHITE (Mr. S.)	BLACK (Prof. F.)	WHITE (Mr. S.)

16. P takes P	Kt takes P	33. R to Q R 8q
17. B takes Kt	B takes B	And wins.

(a) This is too feeble. Black has no occasion, in such a position, to play defensive moves All his forces should be brought to the attack of the discomfited King.
(b) Threatening to take the Q B P with his Bishop.
(c) B to Q R 3d, first, appears to us a stronger mode of play. (d) An inconsiderate sacrifice

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

NEW JURISDICTION IN THE CITY OF LONDON.—On the 29th instant, an Act of Parliament, passed on the 2d July, will come into operation, entitled, "An Act for the more easy recovery of small debts and demands within the City of London, and the liberties thereof." The Act contains as many as 126 sections, with a schedule of fees; a number of provisions have been copied from the New County Courts Act, as also the table of fees. The Court of Requests in the City to be abolished, and on the operation of the Act actions are to be commenced in the Sheriffs' Court for sums or damages not above £20, to be heard and determined under the provisions of the Act. The Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons are to appoint the place and days for holding the Sheriffs' Court for the purposes of this Act, and the order for holding the first court is to be advertised, and notice given for the period of one month at the least before the day appointed for the first holding of the court. The Judge of the Sheriffs' Court (the Commissioner Bullock) is to be the Judge under this Act.

THE BANK OF ENGLAND.—On Tuesday, there was an election of a new Governor of the Bank of England, in the place of Mr. W. R. Robinson. There was no opposition, and, of course, Mr. Morris, the only candidate, was the party chosen.

THE QUEEN'S COLLEGE, LONDON.—A college, under the above designation (so named by Royal permission) in conjunction with the Governesses' Benevolent Institution, has been formed. Its objects are to place female education on the same basis as that of endowed schools and universities for the male sex. Its chief purposes consist in the examination and granting diplomas and certificates of qualifications to governesses, to enable them to produce satisfactory evidence of their merits, and in affording the best competent and adequate and orderly preparation for their work.

MODEL LODGING HOUSE.—The model lodging-house recently opened in Glasshouse-street, East Smithfield, has an infirmary or sick ward attached to the establishment, to which the inmates, in case of being suddenly attacked with sickness, are immediately removed, and medical attendance, &c., is provided gratuitously, until either the patient recovers, or an order for his admission to an hospital can be obtained. No spirituous liquors are permitted on the premises, unless such as have been prescribed by the medical officers of the establishment.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS IN THE METROPOLIS.—The return of the Registrar-General for the week ending August 28, gives the following results:—Births, 1222; deaths, 1084.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The Scotch Bench of Bishops has lost one of its members. Dr. Moir, Diocesan of Brechin, a gentleman of much amiability, died last week. He was ordained fifty years ago, and consecrated in 1837.

A prospectus is in circulation, of a society proposed to be founded under the title of "The Caxton Mutual Improvement Association." Its objects are to offer to the members employed in the printing profession in the metropolis the means of literary instruction. It will include lectures on the Sciences and Arts, and the discussion of questions literary, historical, and political.

At the meeting of the Marylebone Reform Association last Saturday, it was agreed that the Association should be dissolved.

A Ladies' Literary Institution and Mutual Improvement Association has just been established in Beak-street, Regent-street, by a Committee of Ladies, for the purpose of affording facilities for the mental, moral, and social advancement of their own sex, for which purpose a library and classes are being formed for every branch of study. Drawing-room lectures, conversazioni, and soirées will also be occasionally given.

The Free-Trade-ers of Lancashire have elected William Brown, Esq., M.P., as their Representative to the Congress of All Nations, which is to meet at Brussels, on the 16th instant, to discuss the principles of political economy, and the doctrine of free exchanges.

Lord John Russell, with a kindness that does honour to his heart, has granted the sum of £250 to the Dowager Lady Brunton, in consideration of the distinguished services of that gallant officer, Sir Jaddeel Brenton.

Passengers may now leave Glasgow by an express railway train, by way of Edinburgh, at twenty minutes past seven o'clock in the morning, and reach London at nine o'clock on the evening of the same day. In the year 1810, the shortest time in which this distance could be traversed by coach was seventy-eight hours. The distance is 400 miles.

The Gazette of Tuesday night publishes an order in council, announcing that copyright is secured to authors and composers in the Thuringian Union, for such works as may be printed and sold in Great Britain and Ireland, and once served. The Thuringian Union consists of the following States:—Saxe-Weimar Eisenach, Saxe-Altenburg, Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, Saxe-Meiningen, Schwarzburg-Rudolstadt, Schwarzburg Sondershausen, Reuss-Greitz, Reuss-Lobenstein-Ebersdorf, and Reuss-Schleitz.

The posts for the electric telegraph have been put down and the wires have been laid along a part of the Liverpool and Manchester Railway, so that in a month or two there will be a telegraphic communication from Liverpool to London and Manchester.

The gross amount of the recent failures in the Corn Trade has been stated at somewhat over three millions; it is, however, believed that it will be found to approach nearer five millions.

Sir Cloudesley Shovell's ship's guns, about 30 in number, and several round and cross-bar shots, were seen on the 17th ult. near a rock called the Gilstone, to the westward of Scilly Islands by a diver belonging to the cutter Argyle, Mosse, of Jersey. He states that two of the guns could be raised with ease, but the remainder are covered over by a rock apparently of about 30 tons weight, which must have fallen upon them.

A Constantinople letter of the 18th ult. mentions the complete defeat of the Albanian insurgents at Berat by the troops of the Sultan, on the 26th of July. Cases of cholera had manifested themselves at Khars and Tagsanrog.

The works of the Direct Northern Railway, whose terminus is to be at King's-cross (the Fever Hospital having been purchased for that purpose), are proceeding with extraordinary rapidity. The greater part of the distance up to Barnet is nearly staked out, the width of the ground taken possession of being between 120 and 160 feet.

The last letters from Newfoundland speak favourably respecting the success of this year's fishery, and also of the progress of the crops. Typhus fever had appeared among the inhabitants, and many deaths had proved fatal. The general state of affairs in the island, as exhibited by the report of the Chamber of Commerce, may be regarded as satisfactory.

The Norwich Valley Railway, it is reported, will be opened on Monday next. Goods and passengers have been conveyed for some time by the Contractor's engine, between Codner Park and Long Eaton.

Sir Robert Peel has purchased from a gentleman in Edinburgh the full-length portrait of Dr. Chalmers, painted by John Watson Gordon. As a painting it is a work of great excellence.

During the week ended 29th ult. there were 3091 passengers between Boulogne and England, against 2640 in the corresponding week of last year, and 569 between Calais and England against 640.

There have been three failures in Liverpool during the week; two in the corn and one in the East India trade. They are not for large amounts, although highly respectable firms of the Hungarian and Prussian trade. So far as about £60,000, and that of Messrs. Gregg, £30,000. The East India house is for £50,000, and will, it is said, pay 20s. in the pound.

The Manchester Chamber of Commerce held a meeting last week, for the purpose of receiving a report from Dr. Lang as to the desirableness of making an effort to introduce the cultivation of cotton in a district of North Eastern Australia, called Cooksland, and which, according to report, is admirably adapted for the purpose.

Private letters have been received in town which leave very little doubt that her Majesty's ship Auckland has been wrecked. This vessel was engaged in conveying out Lord Grey's project of Sanitary Settlement, to fit site for a new penal settlement, to the north of Port Essington. A site was discovered, but it was completely without water, and was so infested with musquitoes as to be actually uninhabitable. It was on her return to announce this hopeful discovery that the Auckland went upon the rocks.

On the 15th ult. about three o'clock in the afternoon, a fire broke out in the Turkish quarter of Semburi, and burnt with great fury for five hours, destroying upwards of 300 houses and shops, two chawris, and one mosque. It was quite accidental. On the same evening another very extensive fire broke out in Asli-Mermer, in Constantinople, and burnt upwards of 90 houses, many of them noble mansions.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department has presented the sum of £20 to each division of the metropolitan police, to be disposed of in the purchase of useful books to be placed in the various libraries attached to the stations for the use of the men. The station libraries are already possessed of several hundred volumes, and the men pay one halfpenny per week subscription for their use. It is intended to form reading rooms at all the station-houses in the metropolis.

On the 13th of July the Empress of Brazil was safely delivered of a young Princess, and, with the infant, is reported "to be as well as can be expected."

The Emperor of Russia has presented to Admiral Sir Charles Ogle, the Commander-in-Chief at Portsmouth, a superb silver vase, as a mark of his Majesty's esteem, for the attention and kindness shown to his son, the Grand Duke Constantine, last year, when he was a visitor at the Admiralty House for a week. The vase is of Russian manufacture, stands about three feet in height, and is elegantly and most elaborately carved.

THE QUEEN IN THE HIGHLANDS.

ARDVERREKIE LODGE, FROM THE LOCH.

MONDAY.

In our Journal of last week, we detailed the Royal sojourn at Ardverrekie, to Monday. At about ten o'clock, Prince Albert, and the Prince Leiningen, left the Lodge, mounted on Highland ponies, for grouse-shooting on the farm of Shervamoor, in Glen Sherva. His Royal Highness was accompanied by Mr. G. E. Anson. The Marquis of Abercorn joined the party at the Lodge, and proceeded with them to the moors. Earl Grey and the hon. Captain Gordon, left about the same time for the moors of Strathmashie. The Prince and the Prince of Leiningen, alone carried guns, the Marquis of Abercorn and Mr. Anson being, in point of fact, spectators. There was a large retinue of gamekeepers, bagmen, &c., in attendance, Mr. Taylor, from Derbyshire, acting as superintendent.

The Princes conjointly bagged, notwithstanding the unfavourable state of the moors and the shortness of the time, eight brace of grouse and one hare. Earl Grey and the hon. Captain Alexander Gordon, extended their excursion to three hours, and bagged eight brace. It appears that the prevailing disease amongst grouse has extended to this district most extensively.

The Duke of Athol visited the Lodge this day. The Marquis of Abercorn had the honour of joining the Royal dinner party last evening.

TUESDAY.

This morning, Prince Albert, preceded by the keepers and dogs, rode from the Lodge to Ben-Aulder Forest, to enjoy the sport of deer-stalking. The Prince succeeded in bringing down a Royal stag and a roebuck, and returned to the Lodge in time for dinner. While the Prince was in the forest, her Majesty rode out, accompanied by the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal. The Queen and the Royal children were mounted on small Highland ponies; they did not extend their ride further than the east end of the lake.

Prince Leiningen and Mr. Anson drove off at ten o'clock, for Strathmashie moors, and returned at five o'clock with fourteen head of grouse. Earl Grey enjoyed an hour or two of Waltonian sport in the Peatock river, and was rewarded with a dish of black trout. Cluny Macpherson called at the Lodge, and made his Royal Highness an offer of his shootings of Aberarder, which Prince Albert accepted.

YOUNG MACPHERSON'S INTRODUCTION TO THE PRINCE OF WALES AND PRINCESS ROYAL PUTTING THE HEAVY STONE.

WEDNESDAY.

This morning, shortly after ten o'clock, Prince Albert rode out, attended by Cluny's gamekeeper, to the grouse shooting at Aberarider, and returned early in the afternoon with three brace of grouse, some black cocks, and a few hares. Her Majesty, the Prince of Wales, and the Princess Royal rode out again to-day on ponies in the neighbourhood of the Lodge.

In the evening, the sailors of the Royal yacht, about twenty in number, took up their abode in the inn at Laggan.

THURSDAY.—CELEBRATION OF PRINCE ALBERT'S BIRTHDAY.

This being the anniversary of Prince Albert's birthday, his Royal Highness was the special object of public honours. A gathering of the clans in the neighbourhood had been summoned to commemorate the occasion; but as the day would necessarily be advanced before the "tartaned array" could assemble from the distant glens, it was thought desirable that the early morning should be signalised by some appropriate compliment to the Prince. The presence of the sailors of the Royal Yacht was opportune; and, by the Queen's desire, it was arranged that they should repair to the Lodge at dawn, and, stationing themselves under Prince Albert's windows, hail the approach of day with vocal melody.

The morning was most auspicious—the air was calm and balmy, and not a ripple disturbed the surface of the lake.

The Royal sailors passed round to the Lodge by the floating bridge; and a little after six o'clock commenced to serenade the Prince, by singing in excellent style Bishop's fine glee—"Hail! Smiling Morn!" The deep swell of their voices, mingled with the dulcet strains of the violin, resounded over the bosom of the loch, and was echoed back by the hills. The sweet sound startled the Prince from his slumbers, and his Royal Highness, astonished and delighted, presented his thanks to the jolly tars. The party were afterwards entertained to breakfast, and remained at the Lodge during the rest of the day.

THROWING THE HAMMER.

At twelve o'clock, the Highlanders began to assemble at the floating bridge.

"The scene," says the Times Correspondent, "presented a spectacle of unusual brilliancy and animation. Towards the north lay the Lodge, with Loch Laggan extended before it; beyond Curarder, with its fine crest, and extending from it a wild and solitary range of hills, which terminated in the distance with the round-backed outline of the Monnie Leagh. To the west, the fine form of Binnen swelled on the view, its base clad with natural timber, its heath-covered summits, where not shrouded with mist, looking sombre and dark in the distance. The advancing autumn has greatly added to the beauties of Loch Laggan, by deepening the contrasts of light and shade in its scenery, bringing out in their full perfection the brown tints of the heather, relieving the whole prospect from the monotony of an uniform green, and imparting to it more of that wild, solitary, and unfrequented look which recommends it to those to whom retirement is a luxury."

THE LAGGAN GAMES.—LEAPING.

When the Royal Party had taken up their position, Cluny proposed three cheers for her Majesty, which were given with tremendous effect, the sound being taken up and re-echoed by the surrounding mountains.

The games then commenced: they will be found described in our own Correspondent's letter.

The following were the successful competitors in the games:—

Putting heavy stone	Samuel Kennedy.
Putting light stone	Alexander M'Donald.
Leaping	Archibald Gunn.
Race	Colin M'Donald.
Throwing hammer	Colin M'Donald.

In each of these games, £5 was awarded to the man who stood first, and £2 to him who stood second; the £2 being raised to £3 in favour of the second runner; her Majesty giving the prizes. We have engraved the most stirring points of these "Laggan Games;" and more especially "the Race," which was a very striking scene.

While the games were going on, the pipers struck up strathspeys and reels; and in a minute feet were frisking and heads "bobbing" in the Scottish reel, "houghing" and cracking of thumbs keeping time to the movements of the feet.

THROWING THE CABBER.

Her Majesty and suite now retired, and the gentlemen and ladies present were invited, through Cluny, to partake of luncheon at the Lodge. In a short time the Queen and the Royal Party again appeared on the grounds; and, with some very satirical dancing, the amusements of the day concluded. The Queen and the Prince, in retiring, were loudly cheered, and the little Prince of Wales, who was dressed in the Highland garb, and played all day with Cluny's youngest son, also came in for his share of loyal and affectionate greeting. Our artist has depicted the introduction of young Cluny to the little Prince.

The next Illustration is a scene which took place after the Queen had retired, when Prince Albert sent for Cluny's band—a poor wandering, half-witted creature, fantastically dressed in a pepper-and-salt jacket, scarlet vest, and white trousers. He sang a long song to the Prince, who seemed much amused at the grotesqueness of his appearance and gesticulation.

In the evening, bonfires were lighted on the Queen's Island, on Corryarder, and other prominent points round the loch.

In the course of the day, Cluny Macpherson, Mrs. Macpherson, Davidson of Tulloch and his lady, and others, had the honour of taking lunch at the Lodge with the Royal party. Her Majesty was in excellent spirits, and seemed to enjoy the scene very much. There were about 1,000 persons present. In the evening, the Queen entertained a select circle at dinner.

FRIDAY.

Early this morning, her Majesty, with the Royal children, took a ride on ponies over the hills, as far as Lochaich, a mountain farm about two miles distant from the Lodge, in Ben Aulder deer-forest. The Prince also rode out, accompanied by the head keeper, Mr. Cattanach, and made a survey of the deer-forest. Her Majesty drove out in a carriage, about four in the afternoon, intending to drive up Strathmashie; but, rain coming on, the Royal party returned to the Lodge. At five o'clock, the Earl of Aberdeen arrived from his seat in Aberdeenshire.

SATURDAY

This morning, Prince Albert and Lord of Lethingen, and their suite, left the Lodge for the Galloway moors or glen, adjoining the Forest Road, which is about three miles in length, and abounds with game, including roe, grouse, and snipe. The sport was kept up with spirit until half-past one o'clock, when his Royal Highness and party returned to the Lodge and joined her Majesty at lunch. There were bagged in all fifty brace of grouse and other birds. In addition there were killed two roes, and twelve hares. The game was immediately conveyed to the lawn in front of the Lodge, and exposed to the view of her Majesty and the ladies in attendance. Her Majesty and the Royal children walked about the gardens in the morning, and, at a later period of the day, accompanied his Royal Highness Prince Albert in a drive beyond the moors of Strathmashie, passing through the farm of Colonel Macpherson, with whom the Queen and Prince Albert entered into conversation.

SUNDAY

The Court did not attend divine service at Laggan village church; consequently many were disappointed, and but little is left to record of the Royal movements. The pew occupied by Cluny Macpherson and Mr. Davidson, of Tulloch, was newly covered with blue cloth, and every preparation had been made, should her Majesty have determined upon using that place of worship, but divine service was performed at the Lodge. In the evening, the Marquis of Abercorn joined the Royal dinner party.

THE QUEEN'S VISIT TO THE HIGHLANDS.

(From our own Reporter.)

LAGGAN INN, WEDNESDAY.

A FINGER-POST erected in the opening scene of one of Planché's burlesques informed the audience that the precise spot on which the proceedings were to take place lay "20,000 miles from everywhere." Dropping the thousands—including the tens, the Lodge of Ardverikerekie may be said to occupy a similarly remote geographical position. I have never seen so uncomeatable a place. Coaches passing near it, there are none; villages in its vicinity, there are none; farm-houses within sight of it, there are none; peat built hovels within anything like a reasonable distance, there are none. From it, then, Query, it is said, wants retirement; and certainly, in her present quarters, she has got it. By Loch Laggan there are no intruding Scotch Cockneys from the banks of either Forth, Clyde, Tay, or Ness. Were such animals to venture upon a pilgrimage into the wilds, in the vain and futile hope of ever beholding the enchanted castle of Ardverekie, the probability is that years would elapse without their ever having been heard of, until, perhaps, in some lone corry, or wedged amid the pointed rocks of a desolate ravine, the shepherd or the hunter would find a moulder ing skeleton, grasping an "Anderson's Guide to the Highlands" in one hand and an empty whiskey flask in the other—the mortal remains of a "Glasgey" spinner or an "Edinberry" writer, who had started one fine autumnal morning, when his grown son was a baby, to have a look at the Hunting Quarters of Royalty.

You leave civilisation and the world utterly behind, when you start upon the pilgrimage into these dreary wilds of Badenoch. If you cannot eat oat cake, you must postpone dinner till you come homs again; and, if whiskey has no charms, you must be content with the virtues of bog water, in all its fulness. You look in vain for the "Inn" sign-board—the grateful promise of entertainment for man and horse. Heather, rock—rock and heather—torrent, bog—bog and torrent—on you go, mile after mile, mile after mile—sheep dotting the distant hills —grouse whirring from the sides of the lonely track—here a screaming hawk balancing itself in the mist-air—anon, a white-winged sea-mew floating by the brink of a heathery pool—and all around, hill, hill, hill—ridge over ridge—Alp over Alp; now a deep, dark scaur, through which the rains come down in gleaming waterfalls; again, a sheltered hollow, high up among the rocks, showing white patches of nerve-melting snow—until you fairly—so long and so dreary is the way—begin to doubt the existence of either loch or lodge, and to put them down in the catalogue of those fairy domains which got further and further off, the longer you travelled towards them.

Such were really the feelings which would keep moving across me, in my dreamy progress through Lochabar and Badenoch to Loch Laggan, and many hours had elapsed since the dog-cart on which I was perched had passed what appeared to be the last boundary of breathing humanity, ere the broad white waters of the lake appeared before me. The everlasting hills rose in stern silence around; and, girdled in by their huge brown proportions, lay the sleeping loch, birch and oak trees feathering its banks, and bending—now over a shore of rocky ledges—now scattered along a shingly beach. Beds of heather and green wood in luxuriant patches, whilst above this belt of mountain verdure, rose steep wastes of barren moss and moor, broken here and there by wrinkled cliffs, or grey lumps of shapeless stone.

The land belongs to Cluny Macpherson, the Chief of the Clan Chattan, or Macintoshes, one of the tribes which furnished the quota of savages who fought upon the North Inch of Perth. Everybody will remember Scott's description of the scene in the "Fair Maid of Perth." Cluny's Castle lies some seven or eight miles from Loch Laggan; but, upon its eastern bank, in a green hollow, surrounded by pleasant woods of birch and oak, and sheltered from the bleak winds by a heathery mountain screen—the shoulder of a huge hill which flings itself back from the lake—he has erected a capacious shooting lodge. It is a rather handsome, irregular building; full, in familiar phrase, of "nuts and ins," bristling with gables and vanes, and trim and tidy-looking. To approach this most unapproachable dwelling, you have to arrive first upon the opposite shore of the lake; there is no road upon the Ardverikie bank, with the exception of about three miles from the lodge to the head of the lake, where a small river empties its waters, and which you have to cross by a rude bridge. This means of conveyance withdrawn, Ardverekie becomes literally inaccessible; for in front of it is the lake, and on every side but this one rises chains of stupendous hills.

The occupations of the Royal party in their solitude, are of the usual country character. Prince Albert and the gentlemen shoot—the Queen and the ladies walk, drive, or sometimes fish. The usual routine of a Court, in the meantime, going on just as it would at Claremont or Osborne House.

On Thursday last, however, there was some novelty—some excitement. It was Prince Albert's birthday; and, at the Queen's desire, the occasion was signalised by a Highland gathering and Highland games. On hearing that the fiery cross had thus been sent metaphorically, at least through the hills—although on most of them there was nobody but sheep to answer the summons—I started for Ardverekie. The dreariness of the journey I have already adverted to. It had an end, however, like other sublunary things, and early in the afternoon, I arrived at the head of Loch Laggan, close by the Boat-bridge, which I have already mentioned. Irregular grassy hummocks here arise along the river's edge, and two or three turf-built bothies are perched upon and between them. Below, winds the road, close by the margin of the stream, which is fringed upon the other bank by a thicket of thriving young oak. The head of the loch is formed by a succession of shallow sandy bays; and round the sweep of shore, and about three miles from the upper extremity of the lake, embosomed in its wood, lies the Lodge.

This was the spot chosen for the rendezvous, and there, accordingly, were collected some two or three hundred people, lounging about on the grass and heather, and idly chatting in groups along the water's edge. A row of dusty gigs, carriages, and carts lay along the road, and many of the horses which had pulled them were grazing about in the heathery grass. The majority of the crowd was composed of the peasantry of a wide surrounding district—a good sprinkling clad in kilt and plaid, and mostly all wearing some piece of tartan apparel—or badge in the way of bonnet or heather—of the mountains. A goodly number of stylish vehicles, and gally-dressed ladies, showed, however, that the distant residence of Laird and Factor had poured forth their inmates, as well as mountain bothy and moorland hut. After a chatty wait of an hour or so, the sound of distant bagpipes announced the approach of the Cluny Highlanders, and presently a body of about fifty picked men—sturdy, stalwart mountaineers—dressed in full Highland costume, sword, targe, dirk, pouch, horn, and pistols, emerged from the glen, and drew up in line upon the strand. The standard bearer of Cluny's men was an immense fellow, nearer seven than six feet, and he carried a tattered flag of faded green silk, bearing the arms of the Clan Chattan. Some degree of attention was bestowed on the immense personable banner. It was twice "out"—that is to say, it waved over two insurrections—that of 1715, and that of 1745. The Highlanders alleged that every hole it showed was the effect of a bullet or a sword blow; but I suspect that damp and the moths had more to do with its dilapidated condition than either steel or lead.

After a short delay the ferry was crossed, and the assemblage formed themselves into a rough procession, the Cluny men, with their piper and banner, in the van; and a string of very miscellaneous vehicles bringing up the rear. The road to Ardverekie occupied nearly an hour; the road winding along the banks of the lake, through a thriving young oak wood, and thickets of fern or brackens.

Arrived at the Lodge, we found the Queen and her party already upon the ground. A cluster of green hillocks rise behind Ardverekie. On the top of the highest of these the Royal standard was hoisted, and a gentle slope of bright green sward beneath was fixed on as the arena for the games. Meantime the Highlanders formed in line, the public in general drew up in more irregular array behind, and, at Cluny's summons, the competitors for the sports stood forward—all of them powerful, muscular, men—two or three wearing lowland pantaloons, but the majority boasting the somewhat simple costume of a kilt and a shirt.

What are called Highland games generally consist of "putting," or throwing, the stone, throwing the hammer, tossing the caber, running, and jumping. The Royal party of these amusements are mere feats of animal strength, displaying and requiring neither dexterity nor grace In putting the stone the candidates try who can pitch furthest upon the green sward a rounded lump of granite, weighing from twenty to thirty pounds. Tossing the hammer has, perhaps, a trifle more of picturesqueness in it. The shaft of the implement is made very long—perhaps four feet; the thrower grasps it in one or both hands, swings it round and round, turning with it himself, and then launches it into the air. The second or third best throw was achieved by one of the Queen's coachmen—a stately, jolly-looking John Bull, whose round, beefy face and grinning mug contrasted strikingly with the high cheek-bones, and grave, rugged expression of the men of the mountains.

Tossing the caber requires a word of explanation. A caber means, in Gaelic, a roof-tree or rafter. On the present occasion, the timber used was the trunk of a young fir, about fourteen feet long, and nearly as thick as a man's thigh. The player raises it perpendicularly, grasping the bottom, and resting the wood upon his shoulder; taking a short run, with the ponderous beam still poised in the air, he jerks it from him, making it perform a somersel in the air—pitching, so to speak, upon its head, and coming down with the end grasped by the thrower the furthest from him.

The jumping was only so-so-ish, with the single exception of the feats of the individual who carried off the prize. This hero—a bank clerk in Inverness—had the credit of getting cool style of getting over a bar. Whilst the others puffed, and strained, and sweated, and, after all, hit their knees against the wand they wished to clear, the winner took two or three quiet steps, and leaped as softly, as deftly, and as lightly as a deer, clearing the barrier apparently without the slightest effort.

But, after all, the running games and the characteristic feature of the day. The course selected would have staggered English pedestrians—the heroes of Lord's or the Rosemary Branch. Behind the green knolls, amid which the sports took place, rise three steep heathy ridges, each swelling above that in front, and the rocky hollows between. The furthest off of these ridges, must have been a good mile as the crow flies, from the starting post, and the trudge to the top, I should conceive, a very fair forenoon's walk. Well, the course was round a flag, pitched upon the highest spot, and back again to the ground, where

NATIONAL SPORTS.

In a dozen days from the date of these presents, the last great race for the season 1847 will be disposed of—the Great St. Leger. All the turf meetings in Great Britain have their peculiar attractions—it might be hazardous to say their particular properties. Without giving a catalogue of these distinguishing features, it will serve our purpose in this instance to state that Doncaster is remarkable for its contretemps result, under all the circumstances of the case, is about as charitable a figure of speech as the occasion merits, or "can be expected." It is to these we venture to appropriate the present paper—which will come in season at all events, whatever may be its reason. But, be it not imagined that we are about to pioneer for speculation, save inasmuch as it may be the agent of a wholesome excitement. With betting, as a business, we have no sympathy, neither any connection. The Ring is able and willing to minister to its members; it is sufficient for the evil of its own offices, and all who have recourse to them.

At every race-course of any pretension there annually occurs a sensation—a "shindy," as the conversational slang has it—but is to say a row, without the accompaniment to a robbery: but, compared with these, the ordinary squabble at Doncaster is as an earthquake to the discharge of a pop-gun. The Derby is a pickpocket, a mere petty larceny regue; the Leger, a remorseless villain that strips you to the skin, and tars and feathers you into the bargain: you'll be cautious how you bet upon the Leger. . . . . Yet the market returns from Tattersall's would not seem to show such to be the general rule. For many years last past there has been an autocrat of the odds for the great northern prize, but none so superlious as the instant leader

According to present probabilities, the field for this year's St. Leger will be selected from a couple of dozen animals; several of them—many more than the usual average—very good public performers. At the head of the list, backed freely we are told, is Bessarabian, by Emilius, out of Barbelle, full sisters for colts of his age. Backed freely, at odds on him! Fools and their money, the proverb says, are easily divorced. Such speculation must be resigned in favour of those who are desirous of buying what is dearer, as Bessarabian—the odds notwithstanding—perhaps is: is so still; but that, calculating the chances of the game he is playing, it is fair main to lay odds on him, we take leave to doubt. Planets is foremost among the "pollos"—for the Cossack is the Leger, as Epsom Derby, and Ascot Cup is the bright particular star of the Goodwood stable; but the course is too long for him—is it? Rynx is one of the gamest nags of his inches in the world—except the Hero—that ever stepped to the post; ought to be the money by those who say Cossack cannot be beaten, burring by "the Great Teacher." Van Tromp: what a flyer that was over a level course, and the hill at Doncaster is but a molehill:—is his born game humbled? Let us not follow the many, as the phrase goes, but indicate the coursers which, from their achievements, ought to be dangerous to those who follow the market. Mathematician has run stoutly, Red Hart is a rare horse. The Swallow is a decent filly; and who has bought the Farmer's Daughter?

But all this time we are not saying a word about John Scott! Won't the Black Dwarf come; or, rather, won't John bring him—"to the fore?" Didn't he do as much for The Baron? Philosopher, Oxonian, Foreclosure, Mr. Martin each has his friends; and thus, or something like it, stands the problem as a "Mathematician" might demonstrate it. But who supposes that reason will be on its merits. Was it ever so at Doncaster, or will it ever be in secula seculorum? The thimble-rig is allowed, now, pretty generally, to be against the player and in favour of the table. It will not be long before the dispassionate will be that the Great St. Leger is in a similar category. Forasmuch as that fact, however, is still in abeyance, we take the liberty of presenting the courteous reader with this pen and ink etching, whose name is Legende Intus."

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—The great feature of the afternoon was the return of EPYX, who after lasting several days in the shade, "came" again with a rush, and once more put the Doncaster nose out of joint. Cossack was also in high favour, and several ponies were laid out on Planet at 6 to 1. The other transactions were unimportant.

CRICKET.—ALL ENGLAND AGAINST TWENTY-TWO OF BIRMINGHAM AND TWENTY MILES ROUND. This match, which has excited considerable interest, commenced at Birmingham on Monday last, and concluded on Wednesday. The match was a very close one, the Birmingham players winning by five notches only. All England was fresh from the victory over Sussex, which were taken largely, and a considerable amount of money changed hands on the occasion.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—The arrivals of English wheat coastwise during the present week have been on the increase, those by land carriage very small. The supply on offer to-day was fair, to a moderate extent, from the north, owing to the limited supply of foreign grain and flour, was very dull, at a further decline in the quotations, where sales were effected, of from 1s to 2s per quarter. A very extensive business was transacted in barley, which very largely changed hands. All descriptions were extensively dull, and quite 1s per quarter lower. The barley trade was in a very sluggish state. The arrivals of malting sorts might have been purchased on somewhat easier terms. In malt but little to nothing was doing, and the currencies receded quite 1s per quarter. The best oats experienced late sales, but for other sorts we were somewhat lower. All other articles, late rates.

Arrived this week:—English, Wheat, 2510; malt, 3793; oats, 860. Irish: Wheat 7; barley, —; malt, —; oats, 2140. Foreign: Wheat, 31,580; barley, 5830; malt, —; oats, 1100; flour, 3160 sacks, 50 500 barrels.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 40s to 44s; ditto white, 44s to 52s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 40s to 44s; ditto white, 42s to 50s; rye, 30s to 32s, grinding barley, 26s to 32s; distilling, 32s to 36s; malting ditto, 36s to 38s; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 60s to 70s; brown do. 57s to 59s. THE QUEEN IN THE HIGHLANDS.

THE PASS OF GLENCOE.

the people were assembled. It was not, of course, a trial of speed, but a contest, and a very severe one, of wind and bottom. About a dozen competitors appeared—nearly all of them in the kilt, and, barring a shirt, not another stitch. The word was given, and off they went, passing the spot where I stood at a rattling pace and well together. The next moment they were lost in the first hollow, only to reappear on the steep heathery rise which succeeded. Up they went, sometimes on all fours, scrambling amid the rocks like a parcel of cats; and then, after glancing for a moment on the summit of the ridge, down they dived into the ravine beyond. In climbing the furthest brae, it was evident that one man had a clear lead. He swung himself round the flag-post, and darted back on the return course, taking enormous bounding leaps down the steep declivity, and flinging his arms about like windmills. It was a curious and characteristic style of running; but the greatest wonder of all appeared to be the condition of the man when he came in. I expected to see him panting and blowing and half dead. Not a bit of it: the Highlanders are rare fellows for wind; and the winner of this Mountain Derby appeared just about as much distressed as I should be after a saunter through the Burlington Arcade.

Dancing and pipe-playing succeeded, and a Highland Bard recited a long piece of extempore Gaelic poetry in honour of the occasion. I regret that I can give you no translation of the concatenation of guttural grunts which formed the lyric in question.

The Queen, the Prince, and the Royal children—the Prince of Wales in a tiny kilt—were upon the ground all day; and I hope that Royalty duly appreciated the exceedingly orderly and unobtrusive bearing of the people. There was no crowding, no rude staring. Her Majesty could walk hither and thither unmolested by the slightest degree of prying impertinence.

Since the games, Ardverekie has been very quiet.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

The Scenes from the Laggan Games; the introduction of young Macpherson; and the singing Bard: have already been detailed.

Ardverekie Lodge, the subject of the large Engraving, at page 156, has been incidentally noticed: it is vividly described by the Times Correspondent:

"The Lodge occupies a green flat at the head of a little bay, which glides behind one of the wooded promontories that jut into the bosom of Loch Laggan. It is a long and irregular building, erected in the cottage style, of great size, and occupying as warm and sheltered a situation as so bleak a region could be expected to afford. The background is rather bare of wood; but the birch and other spontaneous productions of the forest surround it on each side. Its triangular front looks slantingly across the Loch, and, from its numerous windows, commands a fine view of the islands, the green meadows of Aberarider, and the lofty mountains which gird the opposite shore. A couple of galleys ride at anchor in the bay; and at a little distance from the Lodge, on the right, the Royal standard floats from a flag-staff reared in a green mound, which is said to contain the dust of Feargus and four other Kings.

"Around the Lodge, and onward to the eastern extremity of the Loch, the land sweeps back in gradually ascending heights, covered with a mantle of deep green, and extending backwards in successive corries till lost amid the dark outline of distant hills. This is the forest ground of Ardverekie; where herds of deer, left to the sole possession of the wilds, are rapidly multiplying in numbers. Raspberries, hazel-nuts, and other wild fruits, grow in great abundance along the sides of the Loch. There is an excellent garden, well-[illegible] vegetables, at Ardverekie Lodge; and a number of good milch cows supply the Royal household with dairy produce. A party of London police act as sentries at the Lodge."

Glencoe, engraved at page 160, was visited by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, on Friday, the day previous to her Majesty and suite landing at Fort William. (See page 137.) "What tourist in the Highlands," says one of the reports of the Royal Tour, "has not visited Glencoe, one of the most savage and utterly desolate of these northern glens? And who that has ever stood in the stillness of that mountain solitude will ever forget the iron-like ridges of eternal rock which heaved upwards around him, the vast heathy slopes and wastes stretching away in interminable amphitheatres of gloomy naked hill? And who, too, that has lingered in this glen, perhaps in the golden summer time, when the surrounding brass show like masses of emerald, chequered by spots of grey and green, where the naked rock alternates with the foxglove and the lady-fern, but will bethink him of one wild winter's morning, when snow lay deep upon the ground, and when flying parties of wounded men and fainting women toiled on amid the frozen rocks, ever and anon turning to face the pursuing soldiers—the detachment of Argyle's regiment, who were singled out by Stair for the massacre of Glencoe?"

The prospect embraces, on one side, the shores of Loch Leven, rock, knoll, and woodland, extending, in beautiful perspective, to bare and lofty heights; and, on the other, a rich valley, terminated by the sombre and majestic precipices of Glencoe. The entrance to this celebrated pass, through a long and stately avenue of forest trees, corn-fields, rich meadows, copse, and wood, contrasts strangely with the utter desolation of the barren and stony region which extends beyond to its further extremity. Some huts occupy the site of the abodes of the unfortunate inhabitants of this valley, who were treacherously murdered by the soldiers who had partaken of their hospitality.

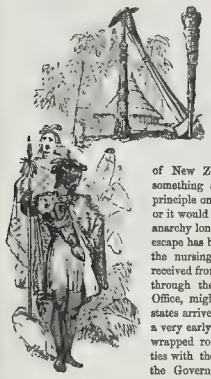
NEW ZEALAND.



NEW ZEALAND, by the last accounts from the colony, seems to be progressing favourably. There are some undertakings that no mismanagement can ruin, as there are plants so hardy as to defy all the skyey influences, however hostile; and the settlement of New Zealand must have had something sound and healthy in the principle on which it was conducted, or it would all have been a mass of anarchy long ago. Even as it is, the escape has been a very narrow one: the nursing the infant community received from the "Mother Country," through the hands of the Colonial Office, might have killed any five states arrived at maturity, it was at a very early period of its existence wrapped round so closely with treaties with the natives on the part of the Government, agreements with the same natives on behalf of the Company, compacts between the Government and the Company themselves, misunderstandings of those compacts, quarrels about titles to lands, about reserved lands, about possessors who held from dates prior to the Company—all this was bad enough. But, as time wore on, things got worse: the incapacity of Governors—and the jealousy, it is said the confirmed dislike on the part of Lord Stanley to the whole concern, being the later ingredients of the mess. Take the usual official delays that occur in the arrangement of almost the simplest matter, and add to them the time necessary for despatch and answer to traverse the circumference of the globe, and we shall cease to wonder that the controversy extended over a series of years: that, as between the Government and the Company, it has only just terminated. But, as between the Company and the settlers, the ruinous consequences of all this strife have still to be settled, by compensation demanded on one side, and not yet acceded to on the other.

As one of the greatest attempts to carry out a real systematic plan of colonisation everybody wished the project of the New Zealand Company every success; perhaps, their error was they were too sanguine, "did protest too much," and described everything as they saw it themselves, rather overcharged with couleur de rose. In their early enthusiasm, when ship-loads of emigrants embarked with the cheers and speeches of champagne breakfasts in their ears, they, perhaps, did not come to that clear understanding with the Colonial Office which admitted of "no mistake." At all events, mistakes without end did afterwards occur: the colonists bought land of the Company, naturally expecting a legal title to it: the Government and the Company could not come to any agreement on the point, and the settlers were thus left to build and plant under a doubt whether the land was really their own or not; and, to this day, we believe the Colonists have not a Crown title to a single acre; they have the Company's receipt for the purchase money, and that right which springs from possession of a very small part of what they lay claim to. During the period the Company was contending almost for its very existence with the Colonial Office, it could justly ask for forbearance—it could not give what it did not possess; the Crown alone could grant the required titles, and the Crown is not easily persuaded—still less easily coerced; the Company was subjected to a higher power—tied and bound by the official red tape of Downing-street.

But, now the dispute between the great contracting Powers is ended, the grievances of the third parties in the business, the settlers, begin to come out with extreme distinctness. That they have been sacrificed during the contest—that they have, in fact, been nearly ruined in consequence of it, there is no doubt; but the question as to which party is bound to compensate them, is very difficult to decide; and, with this problem waiting solution, opens the second chapter of what may be called the political or Governmental history of New Zealand.

The claims and grievances of the Colonists have been embodied in a memorial to the Directors of the Company, in which they demand compensation for the losses they have sustained by the inability of the Company to fulfil the contract it made with them seven years ago. Admitting all the difficulties the Company has had to encounter from the almost unaccountable hostility of the Colonial Office, they contend the Company is bound to perform what it undertook to do, or pay for the damage sustained by the non-performance. The Company, by the recent arrangement with the Government, has obtained a grant of 1,300,000 acres of land, which, if sold at the minimum price of £1 per acre, the settlers assert, will amply repay the Company for all its past losses; and argue, justly enough, that, as the Company has, by agitation in Parliament and otherwise, obtained thus much compensation from the Government, it, by the very fact, admits that similar compensation is due to them.

We have noticed a reported improvement in the state of the colony; we should observe, it is almost confined to the natives and their exertions, and such progress as, by the favour of soil and climate, not even Governments or Companies can wholly check. But as to the prospects and condition of the colonists, as described by themselves in the above-mentioned memorial, they are gloomy enough. "Relying on your representations, feeling confident that men such as are at the head of the New Zealand Company would never lend the sanction of their names to any scheme which might by any possibility involve others in ruin, without being at any rate prepared to take on themselves any responsibilities they had fairly incurred, we purchased land, to which you said you could give us a good title, and of which you assured us you could put us in the quiet and peaceable possession; we severed all the ties of kindred, abandoned our occupations, sacrificed all our prospects in the Mother Country, and planted ourselves amidst savages in a country almost unknown, bringing out with us a capital which has been estimated at from £1,000,000 to £2,000,000. And what have been the results? To not a single acre at the present time have we a drowning title; and of all the land selected we have only obtained a precarious possession of a few thousand acres; for six years we have been doomed to inactivity. Instead of employing our capital productively, we have been obliged to subsist upon it. We have, during nearly the whole of this period, been exposed to the outrages and aggressions of hostile savages; we have seen armed bands of natives for three days taking possession of the most populous agricultural district in the settlement, driving the settlers into the town, and then plundering and destroying all their property. We have seen houses destroyed, crops burned, and recently we have had to mourn over the murder, in open day, of some of our industrious settlers. For months and years the whole settlement, including the town itself, has been kept in a state of perpetual alarm and insecurity; the whole community has been obliged to arm and defend the lives of themselves and families; in short, there are few who are not irretrievably ruined. Many have already left the colony, in several instances so utterly destitute as to have been compelled to accept some menial office on board the vessel in which they returned. Of those who remain many are without the means of leaving; and even if they had the power to return, how vain would be their attempt, with funds exhausted, and connections broken, to regain their original position at home?" All these ruinous results the settlers distinctly assert have been caused "by the non-fulfilment by the Company of the contract formed with us, seven years ago;" and, in short, they say, as the Government has, by an immense gift of land, compensated you for your losses (though you always said your object was not mere pecuniary gain), you can very well, out of your prospective funds, repay what we have lost by your non-performance of your contract, which, whether caused by want of will or want of power, was, in its effect on us, just the same. One other argument they use, which, remembering the substance of many New Zealand debates, we imagine the Directors will find difficult to answer:—"Are we to infer," they ask, "that as long as our sufferings and sacrifices were profitable to you—as long as they afforded you a formidable weapon against the Colonial Office, our claims upon you were admitted; but that the very instant you have succeeded, by means of our sufferings, in wringing from Government important advantages for the Company, you are prepared to turn round upon us, and, presuming upon the state of helplessness to which you have reduced us, to deny all your liabilities to us?" Such is the unsatisfactory state of the present relations of the colonists and the New Zealand Company to each other.

H. HARRISON.

THE WAR IN KAFFIRLAND.—CAPE MOUNTED RIFLES IN PURSUIT OF KAFFIRS.—(SEE NEXT PAGE.)

Against this may be placed the better symptoms, which speak of physical and social progress, amid all these jarring elements. Rangihaeta, the insurgent chief, has been deserted by his followers, and is too weak to do the colonists any mischief. The natives at Otaki are advancing in civilisation, having subscribed £300 to build a flour-mill; the people are beginning to find it is better to plant food than to fight; and the demand for work for wages is the most hopeful sign for the rising community. One hundred natives have been employed in constructing a road from Auckland to the Manukau Harbour. As the Romans taught our savage ancestors, we are teaching the arts of life to a race to whom we are the Romans of the modern world. It is this energy on both sides that brightens the prospects of the future; determined effort, continuous labour, and the lapse of time there would seem the least chance of it; it built Venice in the waves, and raised Holland upon mud and marsh. Certainly, we hear nothing of Colonial Offices in those days, meddling and threatening with their tape-tied notions and pedantries. Freedom of action is more necessary to an infant colony than an old community; and the very best thing a Government can do for a body of Englishmen founding a new settlement, is—to leave them alone.

THE WAR IN KAFFIRLAND.

CAPE of Good Hope papers, to the 30th of June inclusive, have brought the very unsatisfactory intelligence of a sharp affair between the British forces and the Kaffir tribe under Sandilla, on the 15th of June, giving the latter the advantage, in consequence of its numerical strength. The loss of the Kaffirs, however, was no doubt very considerable; while that sustained by our arms was comparatively insignificant, though we deeply regret to announce that Lieutenant Russell (said to be of the family of our noble Premier) was mortally wounded, on having died on the 17th.

The following details are abridged from the Graham's Town Journal, June 19th:

It appears that some stolen property having been traced to some friendly Kaffirs, adherents of Sandilla, at a short distance from Block Drift, the Kaffir police, recently organised, were sent to the chief's kraal, for the purpose either of re-taking this booty, or of seizing other cattle as restitution. These men were supported by a party of dragoons, who were ordered from Fort Beaufort to Block Drift; the engineers were put into garrison, and the drifts and passes guarded. On the morning of the 15th, a patrol or detachment, consisting of 50 of the 7th Dragoon Guards, 15 Cape Mounted Rifles, 100 of the 45th Regiment, 20 of the Pringle levy, and about 70 of the Kaffir police, numbered, in all 255 men, marched from Fort Hare, upon Sandilla's Great Place, near Burn's Hill, which they reached while it was yet dark. They dashed upon the place, and seized about a hundred head of cattle in the chief's own kraal, and another. Observing at this time some Kaffirs in a kloof or ravine at some distance, they sent forward a party to attack them. This party was repulsed, and the whole body, with the cattle, began to move back to Fort Hare. The Kaffirs now became the assailants, speedily retook most of the cattle, and pursued the patrol some 12 or 15 miles, to within sight of Fort Hare.

The colonists flew to arms; many shots were exchanged; and we are sorry to add that Lieutenant Russell, of the police, a fine young man, about twenty-three years of age, and a soldier of the 45th Regiment, were killed, and several others wounded. Early in the attack, the Chief Sandilla escaped from his hut with five armed followers, and took shelter in the adjacent bush. The numerical force of the Kaffirs is estimated at the lowest at 1000, while, for every man fired on our side, it is supposed they returned three. By this superiority of strength, the Kaffirs were not long in retaking the greater part of the cattle, hurrying and shouting that they had beaten the English. Provided with this, they followed the expedition, hanging on its flanks and rear to within three miles of Fort Hare, a distance of twelve or fifteen miles, and only returned on seeing a reinforcement approaching from the Fort, with a fresh supply of ammunition. The Kaffirs succeeded in retaking the cattle, with the exception of thirty, and two horses. By later intelligence, Sandilla is stated to have expressed his sorrow for what had occurred, and entreated forgiveness.

Our Illustration shows a party of the Cape Mounted Rifles in pursuit of Kaffirs, and affords some idea of this kind of cattle foray.

The arrival of Sir Harry Smith, the newly appointed Governor of the Cape, now becomes of great importance from his known prompt and vigorous policy in such cases; for, according to the latest advices in the Kaffir colony, "the whole colony, and more especially the frontier districts, feel that their all is at stake. This war, instead of humbling and disarming, has been training the Kaffir for victory and conquest. Another year of such management, and the Kaffirs will be masters. They will find employment for twenty thousand men."

ELECTION OF SCOTCH PEERS. This election took place at Edinburgh on Wednesday, and the following were the Peers elected:

Marquis of Tweeddale	Earl of Orkney	Lord Sinclair
Earl of Morton	— Seafield	— Elphinstone
— Home	Viscount Strathallan	— Colville of Culross
— Airlie	Lord Saltoun	— Rollo
— Loven & Melville	— Gray	— Polwarth
— Selkirk

The Earl of Dundonald had votes as follows:

Peers present	4
Proxies	7
Signed lists	4
Total	11

The gallant Earl did not record his own vote in favour of himself, which was done by all the elected Lords.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE

PARISIANA.

PARIS, September 7.

(From our own Correspondent.)

I have to add a last and rather unexpected chapter to the long accounts of the Praslin tragedy. The Chamber of Peers, and its Chancellor, the Press and public opinion, had already construed its inflicting severe blame upon M. Delangle, for his having hesitated to order into custody the noble assassin. Now, the Monitear is not content to join in the general outcry against the Procureur-General; it goes to the length of declaring that, in any case of flagrant delit, the Constitutional Charter, soundly interpreted, grants by no means to a Peer the privilege of being out of the reach of ordinary justice. A long article to this effect appeared in its columns, and all the Parisian papers that had not represented this official answer of the Government, were formally summoned, through an huissier, to insert it, within the shortest delay. The publicity of all the documents relative to the late murder, has nearly put an end to the highly piquant sorts of our journals on the Duke's suicide, or "death by poison," as many called it on purpose. Now, at last, the Parisian Press has awakened from its apathy with regard to the Italian and Spanish affairs, and has even appropriation in generally bestowed on the conduct of the English Government, which will probably save our Ministers from rushing to their own ruin.

The Débats, the authorised organ of the Cabinet, was at first evidently leaning to the views of Austria, and all but positively charging the Pope with setting Italy on fire; but of late its language has notoriously altered, and it has become so warlike as to anticipate the possibility of a French intervention. The Opposition papers, as usual, confine themselves to accusations and passionate denunciations, hardly disguising their complete despondency, and settled conviction that the Cabinet will last in spite of all, because their party have worn themselves out, and cannot command the confidence of the country. The tergiversations of our Government in the Italian question were commonly ascribed to an ancient compact entered into with Austria, upon the occasion of the Spanish marriages—another paltry trick of an ever paltry policy. A journal affirms, that every day Count Appony pays a visit to St. Cloud, the present residence of the Court. The Sardinian Ambassador is said to have forwarded a note to M. Guizot, to the effect that, in the event of the Pope's soliciting the aid of the King of Sardinia, he will not be refused against an Austrian invasion. The Nouvelliste of Marseilles mentions a report that Rear-Admiral Trehouart, who commands the squadron of evolution of the Mediterranean, in the absence of the Prince of Joinville, has been ordered to sail for the Adriatic coast. At any rate, the Terrible and Jupiter men-of-war, and the Magellan steam-frigate, which were stationed off Tunis, suddenly left for Naples on the 23d ult.

The Union Monarchique states that the post of French Ambassador in Madrid has been given to M. de Bacourt, who made his diplomatic début under Prince Talleyrand in London, and was subsequently for some years our Minister Plenipotentiary at Washington. It appears that a sort of family council was lately held in the hotel of Queen Christina, to which the Dukes of Montpensier and Aumale and MM. Duchatel and de Montebello were invited in consequence of recent despatches from M. Martinez de la Rosa, the confidant of Queen Christina. It was asserted that Queen Isabella had positively declared her intention of quitting Madrid, if her sister and the Duke of Montpensier did not, without delay, pay her a visit.

During the whole of last week, the Rue St. Honoré, in the neighbourhood of the Oratoire, was a scene of undisturbed tumult and uproar, without any one being able to account for the duration of these puzzling disturbances. A quarrel had arisen between a shoemaker and one of his journaymen, owing to a slight reduction in the salary of the latter. In the evening, a crowd, chiefly consisting of workmen, assembled before the shop, and broke its front windows to pieces. From that moment up to Sunday, the Rue St. Honoré and adjoining streets were blocked up every night by an immense multitude, who kept on roaring and smashing gas-lamps for five hours together. The Opposition papers were evidently afraid lest these noisy assemblages should be magnified into anything like an émeute, and they earnestly advised the working class to abstain from all such demonstrations. In fact, politics had nothing to do with these disturbances, which were only kept up by the dregs of the population. According to their inveterate habit, the policemen and Municipal Guards have been outrageously rude to the most peaceable citizens; but no effective measures were resorted to for several days by the Prefet of Police. On Thursday, however, a patrol of the National Guard, after being greeted by hootings and furious cries, was so much pressed in the mob, that it was obliged to seek refuge in the guard-house of the Municipal Guard, near the Ponte St. Eustache. The mob immediately smashed the windows of the guard-house, but the patrol and Municipal soldiers rushed out, and captured a considerable number of persons. On the following nights, others were captured; and, thanks to this tardy intervention of the authority, as well as to the rain, the Rue St. Honoré is now restored to its former tranquility.

It was falsely reported that the eldest son of the Duchess of Praslin had committed suicide; but, positive as has been the Moniteur Parisien, an half-official organ of the Government, in giving the lie to other rumours concerning Prince d'Eckmuhl, the accounts of his attempt on the life of an Indian lady, were, nevertheless, partly correct. The facts, however, are far from having as much gravity as was supposed at first. For several months back, the young nobleman's wits had not been sound; and he was evidently not in his reason when, a month ago, on coming home, he threw himself on his servant, and struck him repeatedly, threatening to kill him, without any motive or provocation. On a second fit, whilst still under the empire of his fit of madness, Prince d'Eckmuhl proceeded to the residence of a lady with whom he had been, for a long time, on the most intimate terms, and who had followed him from Pondicherry, his native place, where he had known her during a voyage of circumnavigation he had made four years ago. If we are to believe in the assertions of a journal, this lady was endeavouring to prevail upon him to marry her, and the Prince had been considerably excited by her attempting to carry so far the mastery she had got over him. However it may be, he gave way, on seeing her, to great violence, and even inflicted on her a wound in the breast with a knife, yet not dangerous her any great injury. As soon as his family was informed of this event, the Marshal-in-law of Eckmuhl, his mother, carried him off, it is said, to her property in Berry, and finally to St. Sever, in the South; but no declaration was made to the authorities, no complaint preferred, and the circumstances were in fact a month old, when they were seized on by the press.

The grand camp, or rather two camps of Compiegne, are now completely formed on the banks of the Oise, where, every day, strategical movements, reviews, mock skirmishes, and sham battles, are taking place under the command of the Duke of Nemours.

On the 1st inst., two Royal Ordonnances were issued concerning the administration of Algeria; the present directions of the interior, of colonisation, of public works, of the finances, and of the marine, are to be superpressed; and in each of the three provinces there shall be a direction of civil affairs, which is to correspond with the Governor-General.

The corvette, Mouette, commanded by M. Le Prapper, has just entered the roadstead of Brest, coming from Tahiti with 190 infantry, marines, and artillery on board. She left in Tahiti the French vessels of war, the Uranie, the Artemise, the Phaëton, and the Fortune.

A treaty for the reciprocal extradition of criminals was recently concluded between France and the Grand Duchy of Oldenburg.

A new journal has been started, under the title of Le Conservateur. Its designation is sufficient to indicate its political tendencies. Several members of the Chamber of Deputies are said to participate in the undertaking.

Whilst new theatres and fraudulous practices are exposed every day in the Post-office administration, as in all other public services, the reform banquets and meetings are spreading throughout France, to the evident dissatisfaction of the Cabinet.

My theatrical news is scanty. To-morrow night, the Académie Royale will open with "La Juive," Miss Birch, who, we hear, is coming to Brussels, among her new acquisitions, is to make her début in the opera of "Guillaume Tell." Bouffé has come out again, in the "Garçon de Paris," at the Variétés. Madame Viardot-Garcia and Duprez have concluded a new engagement at the Berlin Opera, for January and February.

An immense ceiling picture, on canvass, by Horace Vernet, has just been added to the decoration of the Salle des Séances in the Chamber of Deputies. It is an allegorical composition, representing Commerce, Agriculture, Navigation, the Arts, and War, with their respective attributes. The copies of the "Stanze and Loggi," of Raphael, which have been executed at Rome by the Pensters Balze, for the Department of the Interior, are now deposited in the Pantheon, where they are to be exhibited in a few days. Marble statues of different periods are being placed at this moment in the niches round the inner Court of the Louvre. Mr. Ingres has thrown open his studio to let the public be judge of his last work, a fine portrait of Madame de Rothschild.

On Sunday last, the extraordinary night fête took place at Versailles, in the Royal Gardens. Extraordinary, indeed, it may be called, for the quietics, fanciful illumination, and still more fanciful dancing feats of the Chateau Rouge and Bal Mabille, had crowded the whole of the Versailles Road. However nice a pleasant it must have been to the shade of Louis XIV., the celebrated Bosquet de la Reine was the scene of a public ball; and, strange enough, several fountains of the Park were allowed to play in the night, scattering on their silver spray amidst the red sparks of a firework. In spite of a rather sallen sky, the Bosquet de la Reine was extremely gay, with its painted-glass lamps peacefully gleaming as a myriad of fire-flies. But the quadrilles had hardly begun, when the dancers were called out to witness the firework, and on their coming back to take up their revels, they found the access to their Elysium menacingly barred by dragoons, who would not let them in. It appears that an attempt had been made by a few individuals, who had no tickets of admission, to force their way into the ball; and, in order to prevent this enormity, it had been judged advisable to shut out the many promenaders who had paid for the right of enjoying all the attractions of the Bosquet. Of course, a slight émeute was the consequence of this tyrannical measure.

SPAIN

Our Madrid news this week is more than usually interesting. General Narvaez failed in forming a Ministry, owing, as it is said, to the indisposition of the Queen to make any concessions, and M. Salamanca has organised a Cabinet, which, however, is considered merely as a re-construction of the last.

The Madrid Gazette contains ordinances accepting the resignation of the other Ministers, and appointing in their places—

General Fernando Fernandez de Cordova, War

Patricio de la Escosura (Political Chief of Madrid), Interior.

General Rios de Olano, Public Works, Commerce, and Public Instruction.

Antonio Caballero, Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to be Foreign Minister, ad interim.

Salamanca, Finances.

Sotelo, Marine and Justice.

Marquis Cavena, Justice and Public Worship.

The Presidency of the Council, with the portfolio of Foreign Affairs, was offered to the Duke of Trias, whose answer has not been received.

A Royal Decree was signed at Madrid on the 3rd instant, authorising the return of all political emigrants without exception, and that all prosecutions commenced against them should be annulled. The Duke of Frias left Bayonne on the 4th to go for Madrid. The Duke of Sotomayor likewise left for the capital on the same day.

Before leaving the Ministry M. Pacheco addressed a letter to General Narvaez, in the name of the Queen, requesting him to resume his ambassadorial functions in Paris. The General did not think proper to comply with the request, and was waiting the appointment of a Minister for Foreign Affairs to tender his resignation.

The Presse gives the following curious version of the failure of the attempt of Narvaez to form a Ministry. It says:—

"After having come to an understanding with the leaders of the Moderado party, Narvaez presented to the Queen a list of the persons whom he wished to be his colleagues. This list was delivered to her Majesty at seven in the evening of the 29th ult., and she appointed the following day to answer at midnight. At a quarter of an hour before the time appointed, Narvaez was at the Palace, and the Queen, a few minutes after, returning from the theatre, had with him the following explanation:—'Will your Majesty deign to answer me at once, or give me the decision you have come to?' 'The decision I have come to? Why, the list you have presented to me contains scarcely any other names than those of my enemies.' 'The names in question belong to men but too well known for their attachment to the throne, and their devotion to the person of your Majesty.' 'I repeat, that the majority of them are my enemies.' 'Will, then, your Majesty deign to make a choice, and point out to me those whose presence would be most agreeable to you?' 'I reject them all equally, and shall call in the Progressists.' 'Your Majesty doubtless forgets that the Progressists are by tradition, by position, and by their principles, the most dangerous enemies of your throne, and the adversaries of its prerogatives.' 'I forget nothing; my resolution is taken, and, at all events, if I can do nothing better, I shall retain my present Ministry.' 'Your Majesty will, therefore, allow me to observe to you that it was not necessary to make me come from Paris.' 'It was not I who sent for you.' 'Then my mission is at an end?' 'Perfectly so, and you may go about your business.'"

GREECE

A Government proclamation was issued at Athens, on the 21st of August, announcing the defeat that a band of insurgents had met near Chalcis with regular troops and Grisiotî, in which the latter is stated to have been mortally wounded, and his followers completely routed and dispersed. The killed and wounded on both sides are said to amount to 400 men. The chief of the rebels, General Grisiotis, lost an arm in the battle, which took place on the 18th, and then withdrew with his men into a convent near Kumi, which he had fortified. On the 20th a second engagement took place, in which the reinforcements of the enemy were taken by storm, with a great loss of life on both sides. The insurgents have fled to the mountains. The island was blockaded by sea and land."

SWITZERLAND.

Our last letters from Switzerland contain news of importance. The Swiss Diet has definitively resolved to expel the Jesuits. The first of the two sittings of the 2nd and 3rd instant is of a nature to aggravate the state of affairs, and a struggle may now almost be regarded as inevitable. The four cantons of Switzerland wherein the Jesuits have a footing are Lucerne, Fribourg, Schwytz, and Valais. The question of the Jesuits was brought before the Diet in the sittings of the 2nd and 3rd instant, and at the close of the sitting of the 3rd, it was decided by twelve cantons and two half cantons—Unterwalden of the Jesuits was a federal one; secondly, that the cantons in which that order existed should be called upon to dismiss them; and that the other cantons should not be allowed to admit them on any pretext whatever.

Against this decision the representatives of the Jesuitical cantons energetically protested in the name of their respective Cantons, and declared that they would maintain the Jesuits in spite of the decision of the Diet. The preparations for defence are going on actively in the Cantons of the Sonderbund

The deputies who had not spoken at the preceding sitting delivered the sentiments of their respective governments. The following is the voting:—1. The Cantons of Lucerne, Schwytz, Fribourg, and Valais, in which the Jesuits are established, are invited to expel them from their territories. 3. The admission in future of Jesuits into any part of the cantons of Switzerland is unauthorised.

THE WEST INDIES AND MEXICO.

The Great Western has arrived with the West India mail. The dates are—Tampico, July 25; Honduras, 20; Carthagena 29; Vera Cruz, August 2; Havannah, 11; Jamaica, 8; Demerara, 4; Trinidad, 5; Barbadoes, 8; Grenada, 9; St. Thomas, 15; La Guayra, 8; Bermuda, 20

The weather in the West India islands is described as being fine in general, but in some of them the drought is represented to have been extreme, and to have seriously affected the canes, which were represented as being, in particular places, nearly burnt out of the ground. It was also stated that there was a large quantity of manufactured produce remaining over for want of shipping.

At Barbadoes, large supplies of provisions of all descriptions had arrived from America, as well as from the neighbouring colonies nearly 3000 bunches of plantains, besides other esculents, having arrived in a single day from Demerara alone. Notwithstanding, the market was still high and much distress prevailed.

A slight accident had happened to the Governor from his horse falling with him, from the effects of which, however, he had quite recovered.

When the Great Western left Vera Cruz, no letters had been by communications with Mexico and the interior during the whole month of July until the arrival of the courier of the Legation, who alone is allowed to pass the belligerent lines, and had arrived at Vera Cruz on the evening of the 1st inst.

The intelligence received by him from the city of Mexico was very unsatisfactory. There was a very strong party for coming to an arrangement with General Santa Anna, of whom there was a good deal in the south; but the head of about 15,000 men, and who, it was expected, would march on Mexico as soon as he was joined by the reinforcements on the road.

There were about 20,000 Mexican troops prepared to oppose his entrance into the city, but such was the state of parties, and the disunion among the Mexican leaders, that the general opinion was that the American army would gain possession of the capital with little more trouble than the entry of Puebla.

At Vera Cruz trade was entirely at a stand, which is explained by the impossibility of introducing goods into the interior.

As to the prospect of peace, there was none whatever—almost all the departments of the republic have declared themselves opposed to it, negociation, and it remains to be seen what General Scott will do when once in the capital.

THREE MURDERS AT BRUSSELS.—The inhabitants of Brussels were thrown into consternation on the morning of the 31st inst., by the discovery that, on the preceding evening, the sister of M. Evenpoel, agent of the Count de Morode, a woman of about forty years of age, and her two young female servants, had been murdered at her brother's house, in the Rue de Cerf. Mr. Evenpoel was at the theatre, and on his return found the three bodies still bleeding, but life totally extinct. The furniture was in great disorder, and a quantity of valuables had been carried away. It would seem that the murderers were well acquainted with the premises. The unfortunate victims were interred on Friday afternoon (last week), after a solemn funeral service had been performed. An immense number of persons followed the funeral. The police, after having undergone a strict examination, has been set at liberty. Two young men, who were courting the servants of M. Evenpoel, are still in custody, as well as a cab-driver. Amongst the objects stolen were gold watches and gold chains, diamond pins, several pieces of plate, Dutch silk pieces, and a quantity of English expences. The river Senne, which runs behind the garden, was dragged but nothing was found in it. Notwithstanding the suspicions entertained against the murderers, no one had yet been arrested

THE NEW PARLIAMENT.

During the progress of the Elections, we gave the results up to the latest period, and a list of the Members returned, with some few exceptions, has already appeared in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. The Elections being now all completed, however, we give a perfect list, which will, no doubt, be acceptable to our readers for reference

On a former occasion, we furnished an analysis of the opinions of the various Members, but, it is so difficult a matter to state them with precision, that we now content ourselves with generally mentioning that, as far as we can ascertain, the relative position of the Parties in the New House will be as follows:—

Liberals returned	.. .. ..	336
Ditto ditto	.. .. ..	117
Protectionists ditto	.. .. ..	201
Liberal majority over Protectionists	.. ..	135
Liberal majority over Protectionists and Peelites		18
Liberal and Peelite majority over Protectionists		252

The Herald calculates that the parties are nearly balanced. In the country, the Manchester Guardian calculates that the Liberal party has gained 44 seats, equal to 88 votes; the Leeds Mercury gives their increase only 18; whilst the Birmingham Gazette gives the Conservative gain at 31 (three of which are in counties), and the Liberal gain at 71 (seventeen of which are in counties); being an increase of 48 Members, or 96 votes in favour of the Government.

The Members returned may be thus divided:

England	County Members	143
English	Boroughs	326
Wales	.. ..	29
Ireland	.. ..	105
Scotland	.. ..	53
Total	.. ..	656

That excellent authority, "Dodd's Parliamentary Companion," states that 223 persons have been returned to the new Parliament, who had no seat in the last.

POPE PIUS IX.

THE AFFAIRS OF ITALY.

Rome appears to be now the great focus of interest in the political world. The present Pontiff bringing to the possession of power a liberal and independent mind, he at once decided upon a corresponding policy, in which he has met with determined opposition. His first great act was a general amnesty for political offences, by which he at once gained the strongest attachment of the Papal States. His next great improvement was the liberation of the press, and the establishment of its freedom, under the mildest form of censorship. His reforms of the ecclesiastical orders, his change in the succession of the Cardinalship, and other measures of the same character, with the opposition thereto, must be fresh in the reader's recollection.

In consequence of the invasion of his territory by the Austrians, "a very large portion of the citizens of Rome," says the Morning Chronicle Correspondent, "old and young, rich and poor, men of rank and men without rank, have pressed forward to enrol themselves as a national or municipal guard for the protection of their Sovereign, for the maintenance of the public peace, and the security of their liberties. They are daily detailed to perform their military duties, and form now the police of the city. The streets swarm with people; the restaurants and cafés are crowded with politicians, several most exciting political sermons have been preached in some of the churches, and a spirit of resistance to foreign domination, and a determination to stand by the Pope and the country, are everywhere avowed with a boldness and emphasis which mark a deep apprehension of an approaching crisis.

Not an opportunity is lost of the demonstration of the warmest attachment of the people to the Pope. On the 16th ult., "an extraordinary festival in the Church of Rome, being the day of the Assumption of the Virgin, was an occasion of great excitement. The whole city was early in motion. The Pope went in grand procession to one of the great Basilicas, where high mass was performed; and afterwards he gave, as is usual, from the balcony, his benediction to an immense crowd assembled in the Great Square of the Church. Thousands and tens of thousands were upon their knees at this solemn ceremony, and it was no sooner ended than they with a united voice thundered out their hearty vivas, 'Long live Pius IX.'"

"His personal appearance is extremely benignant, and he is said to unite with a perfect self-command an indomitable resolution and perseverance. He is entirely absolute in his authority; but he recently summoned his Cardinals for advice. On taking a ballot by balls placed in a box, it was found that the black balls, which negatived his proposition, very much exceeded the white. He wears a small white cap, and it is said, that having put all the black balls together, he took his cap and placed it over them, saying at the same time to his surprised Cardinals, that now the balls were all whites, and, thanking them for their advice, dismissed them."

The Correspondent of the Daily News observes, with reference to the position of Pius IX. in bold defiance of his Austrian foe, it seems a fatality from the days of the Fourth Henry and Hildebrand, to those of Joseph II. and Pius the Sixth, that Vienna should be the grand antagonist of the Vatican. Yet there was a time when the House of Hapsburg, in its humble origin, gloried in being the meek creature of the Roman Pontiffs, and wore, engraved on the circlet of gold which formed its barbaric diadem, the following significant inscription:—

Petra dedit Petro, Petrus diadema Rodolfo.*

THE POPE BORNE IN PROCESSION.

There are few additional facts of importance this week. The Cabinet of Vienna has issued another official document, in which it contends for the right of Austria to occupy Ferrara.

The Nuremburg Correspondent of the 2nd instant, takes up the question as regards France. That journal affirms that, France having acknowledged the right of Austria to garrison Ferrara and Comacchio, it follows that the occupation of Ferrara cannot cause any step on the part of France. It is certain, it says, that M. Guizot has not protested, and will not protest, against this proceeding. It goes on to say that, on the contrary, France has called on the Pontifical Government to consider the incontestable rights of Austria, and to take no ulterior measures which shall revive a tendency to increase the excitement in Italy, to forbear from protestations, and to conduct the affair by the way of diplomacy.

The same journal states, under the date of Rome, the 24th ult., that the Capucins of Perugia had published a manifesto, in which they declare that they are ready to take up arms for their country. This document begins as follows:—"We also (the monks of Perugia) feel that we are citizens, and we regard it as our most sacred duty to support with all our efforts our common country." They conclude—"At the call of our magnanimous Pope Pius IX., we shall be ready, as were formerly the monks of Legnano, Genoa, and Corsica, under Paoli, to defend our beloved country, and to mingle with the rolling of drums, and to join in the songs of victory. We shall thus prove how basely we are calumniated by those who say that we are not devoted to Pius IX. and Italy."

The Augsburg Gazette, under the date of Rome, the 26th, says, that Romagna is still in a state of the greatest agitation, in consequence of the occupation of Ferrara, and that the Pope has given notice to the Austrians to evacuate that city before the end of the month.

The state of the population is such that the slightest accident may give rise to a serious collision.

The Debats contains a letter from Civita Vecchia, which announces (under date 30th ult.) the unexpected departure of Cardinal Lambruschini from that city (where he had resided since his removal from office) for Rome. This event produced an unfavourable impression in Paris; and, taken in conjunction with the continued rumour that a "movement" in Italy would take place on Wednesday ("the festival of the nativity of the Virgin"), induced fears that the liberal progress of his Holiness Pope Pius IX. would not be uninterrupted.

A Prince Travelling in a Cart.—A somewhat singular circumstance occurred in connection with the recent visit of Prince Waldemar of Prussia to Earl Fitzwilliam, at Wentworth House. His Royal Highness, with his suite, among whom were Count Brühl, Count Groeben, and Baron Lanir, arrived at the Worsley station, on the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway, by the train which reaches there about twelve o'clock; and, being anxious to proceed direct to Wentworth, he endeavoured to obtain post-horses to attach to the travelling-carriages in which they had arrived at the station. The officials at the station being unacquainted, with the distinguished rank of their passengers, after making some inquiry, reported that post-horses could not be obtained in the neighbourhood, and that the only means of conveyance available was a spring-cart belonging to a neighbouring farmer. His Royal Highness and suite availed themselves of this vehicle, in which they arrived safely at Wentworth House. The adventure did not end here. A carriage and four, with outriders, had been dispatched to meet his Royal Highness, who was not expected to arrive by so early a train. The two vehicles passed each other on the road without any recognition taking place, no one in his Royal Highness' suite knowing the carriage of Earl Fitzwilliam, and his Lordship's servants not expecting to meet a Prince and his suite travelling in a farmer's market-cart.

THE POPE BLESSING THE PEOPLE.

BUST OF SIR HARRY SMITH.

MR. PATRICK PARK has just completed the bust of the Hero of Aliwal, which we announced in a recent number of our Journal. It is an excellent likeness; the marked features of the Commander being rendered with admirable effect; and the Bust is, altogether, very spirited and full of character. It is to be sent to Glasgow, with a bust of the Earl of Dundonald, also from Mr. Park's chisel.

About the 16th instant, Sir Harry Smith, accompanied by Lady Smith, will embark for the Cape of Good Hope, to the Governorship of which Colony he has recently been appointed.

We learn from the subscription-paper which has been lying for a few days at the Royal Exchange, Glasgow, that the sum of £390 has been subscribed for the purpose of presenting Sir Harry Smith with some testimonial from the citizens of Glasgow, seeing that they are not to have the pleasure of entertaining him at a public dinner.

WELTON CHURCH, STRUCK BY LIGHTNING.

IN part of our impression of last week, we recorded this appalling catastrophe, in the village church of Welton, to the eastward of the north road between Carleton and Scampton, and about five miles distant from Lincoln. By aid of an Artist resident in the neighbourhood, we have obtained a Sketch of the Church, showing the extent of the damage which it has sustained.

The circumstances are briefly as follow. On the afternoon of Sunday week, Welton was visited by a violent storm, during which, while the congregation in the Church were singing the hymn previous to the sermon, the Rev. Mr. Williamson, the Curate, having ascended the pulpit, the lightning entered the Church from the tower, or belfry, and caused an instantaneous explosion in the centre of the edifice. There was a general rush to the door, when the Rev. Mr. Williamson immediately descended from the pulpit, and implored the congregation to calm themselves, and endeavoured to allay their fears. Attention was directed to those persons who were lying in different parts of the Church, apparently dead, some of whom had their clothing on fire. Five women were found injured, their faces blackened and burnt. A boy was discovered in another part of the building, with his clothes on fire, and nearly consumed. Several others suffered severe injury. A respected old parishioner, aged sixty-eight, was found lying at the bottom of his pew, immediately beneath one of the chandeliers, quite dead. There were no marks of wounds or abrasion about the body. The buttons of his waistcoat were melted; the right leg of his trowsers was torn down, and his coat literally burnt off. His wife was in the same pew with him, but escaped injury. A gentleman who occupied the next pew was knocked down by the shock, and seriously hurt. All the unfortunate sufferers were as soon as possible removed to their respective dwellings, and had every attention paid to them. For some time the Church was filled with a sulphurous smoke.

On the Church being surveyed, it appeared that the lightning first struck the south-eastern pinnacle of the tower and threw down a portion of the battlement. It then passed into the tower, and melted an iron rod connected with the clock. Here the current of electricity was divided, one portion having descended on the exterior and entered the earth, while another portion descended inside, and, having perforated the stone-work of the door into the interior of the Church, and thrown the clock-dial inside, passed along the north aisle. In this part of the Church were suspended three small brass chandeliers, which served as conductors for the lightning downwards, as all the persons standing underneath them were injured. On the floor of the pew being inspected, it was found to be perforated with thirty or forty small holes immediately beneath where the old parishioner stood; the current of electricity having passed through his body to the earth. In passing from the north side into the chancel, the lightning went out by two different holes in the east window, and perforated the stone wall, upwards of two-and-a-half feet in thickness, in two different places.

In the course of Monday afternoon, a Coroner's Inquest was held on the remains of the deceased, and a verdict in accordance with the nature of his death was returned.

IONA.—RUINS OF ST. ORAN'S CHAPEL AND CATHEDRAL.

HER MAJESTY'S EXCURSION TO SCOTLAND.

THE annexed Illustrations represent two of the most interesting localities in the Royal Excursion to the Highlands; and both scenes were, we believe, sketched by her Majesty, on board the Victoria and Albert yacht.

DUART CASTLE will be best described in the following extract from the Times report:

"To the right the yacht passed Lismore, one of the most fertile of the Western Isles; and at this point, the entrance of which is really to be considered the Sound of Mull, the Royal tourists commanded one of the finest of our Scottish views. The farm-houses had all their little flags fluttering away in the breeze. The lighthouse of Lismore, like the picturesque cottages amongst the trees, though not amongst trees itself, was picturesque also. Lismore, which once, we believe, contained a Roman Catholic College—a Maynooth to the Hebrides—looked green and cheerful. Morven was on the right, frowning in a darker colour and a sterner form. There were the curious ruins of Duart Castle once the seat of the M'Leans—on the left, in Mull. And the tide is working over, and leaving but occasionally bare and black that little rock in the Sound, where tradition says a faithless and murderous chieftain of the M'Lean race exposed his wife, of whom, for some tolerably apparent reason, he desired to be relieved. Vainly in all her wide domains might the Sovereign look for aught more magnificent and wildly grand than this entrance to the Sound of Mull. The bold bleak Morven hills, famed in our oldest poetry, associated with dark tales in history, are on the right. Behind, the far distant peaks of Ben Cruachan stand proudly over its multitude of attendant and minor mountains without a streak of mist up to their sharpest and highest cliff or pinnacle; and far away to the right, the mountains stretch in an apparently endless chain; while Duart, and the masses of mountains, in all grotesque shapes and forms, that to the eye make up the island of Mull, as they really conceal its green pasturage, stretch along on the left, making altogether a matchless scene of wild and romantic beauty."

LADY ROCK AND DUART CASTLE.

IONA, it will be recollected, was visited by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, who inspected the celebrated ruins here. The route is thus described:

"Passing from Loch Crenan up to Oban, the squadron left the whirlpool of Corryvrekan on the left, and crossing the "Dorus more," or Great Door, a point at which the tides of the ocean meet, steered on round the stormy shore of Easdale. Here the prospect opened up was surpassingly wild. Moving along a coast indented with lochs and studded with rugged and inhospitable little islands, the eye extended westward over the broad expanse of the open ocean, and, moving thence southwards, rested upon Colonsay and Jura. To the west lay the green hills of Argyleshire, and on the north, in formidable array, stretched the massive and iron-bound headlands of Mull, prolonged into the Atlantic, and backing up against the fury of its waters, the defence...ess and wave-worn Iona."

The island of Iona contains about 400 inhabitants, part of whom are congregated in a village near the church. The celebrated ruins consist of the remains of a cathedral, a nunnery, and St. Oran's Chapel, which were laid in ruins at the Reformation. Dr. Johnson's memorable passage on viewing them will, doubtless, be recollected—especially its close—"That man is little to be envied, whose patriotism would not gain force upon the plains of Marathon, or whose piety would not grow warm among the ruins of Iona."

It was not, however, until after Legh Richmond visited the island, that Divine service was performed there more than four times a year. A Parliamentary Church has since been erected, and a minister appointed to the Island. The ruins have been carefully preserved, an Iona Club having been formed for this purpose. The island is by no means barren; for one of the late tourists observed on it ripened barley, as heavy and firm in the head as any barley on the Clyde."

THE incidents connected with her Majesty's Visit to the Highlands that have occurred since our last, have been of so retired a character as hardly to furnish the means of giving a daily record of them.

Yesterday (Friday) week, in the forenoon, her Majesty, on her pony, accompanied the Prince a portion of his way to the shooting ground, returning to Ardverikie attended by her Lady in Waiting.

In the afternoon her Majesty and the Prince, accompanied by the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal, went out on the lake.

SATURDAY.

The Royal Party yesterday walked and drove through the grounds. At five o'clock they were somewhat startled by the appearance of snow on the Corrander and other hills in view from the Lodge. This morning the snow gave the scene a most wintry appearance.

Her Majesty did not leave the grounds of the Lodge during the day, but his Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by several gentlemen of the suite, went out deer-stalking on Ben Alder. The success attending this day's sport is said to have been but indifferent. The Prince returned home about two o'clock.

The Prince of Leiningen and the Marquis of Abercorn had some good sport on the moors beyond Glen Shera; the former bagged nine brace and a half of grouse, and the latter thirteen and a half. They were on the ground for about two hours.

SUNDAY.

Viscount Palmerston succeeded Earl Grey as Secretary of State in attendance upon her Majesty.

The Marchioness of Douro succeeded Viscountess Jocelyn as Lady in Waiting on her Majesty.

Divine service was read before the Royal Party by the Marquis of Abercorn. It is certainly somewhat unfortunate that on both Sundays since her Majesty's arrival the weather has been more or less unfavourable; so that, however great may have been the inclination to attend the church of Laggan, there was wisdom in not exposing the Royal person during a ride of twenty miles to the bleak and howling storms that sweep along the strath of Badenoch. It was an uninterrupted wet day, and her Majesty and the Prince were confined to the Lodge.

BARON DE ROTHSCHILD'S ELIGIBILITY TO SIT IN PARLIAMENT.—In consequence of doubts which have been raised with regard to the difficulty in the way of Baron de Rothschild taking his seat in the House of Commons, a case was submitted to Mr. C. Egan, the Chancery barrister, and the view taken by the learned counsel is highly favourable to the hon. member's return. It is to the following effect:—First: I am of opinion that Baron de Rothschild, having been duly elected one of the Members of Parliament for the City of London, is not, by reason of his being a member of the Jewish persuasion, debarred from taking his seat in the House of Commons. Secondly: I am of opinion that Baron de Rothschild may lawfully be permitted to take the oath of abjuration according to the usual manner of Jews, viz., on the Old Testament. Thirdly: I am of opinion that the oath of abjuration may lawfully be administered to Baron de Rothschild, omitting the latter words contained in stat. 6, Geo. III., cap. 53, "upon the true faith of a Christian." The learned counsel supports his opinion by a most erudite argument, and cites various ancient charters and legal decisions which favour his views.

SCHOOL OF ART.—A School of Art, for artists and amateurs, has been formed by the Incorporated Society of British Artists. The arrangements having been all completed, it will be open to its members in the early part of next month. The school will be principally supported by subscriptions and donations.

EATING BANK OF ENGLAND NOTES FOR A WAGER.—Two privates of the Royal Marines, just paid off from her Majesty's steam-vessel Pluto, Lieutenant-Commander Low, at Woolwich, for a trifling wager, commenced eating several £5 Bank of England notes with "bread, cheese, and onions," but were stopped by some of their more sensible comrades, who came up at the time, and compelled them to desist. Fortunately the numbers of the notes remained unmutilated. The Prometheus, Commander Hay, and the Pharnir, Commander Dennis, have just been paid off, and the seamen have been playing similar absurd tricks. Most of the sailors have received nearly £100 each.

EFFECT OF LOCALITY UPON LIFE.—It is found, from the last Report of the Registrar-General, that in the Ulverston district one person in four attains the age of seventy; in Lancaster, one in six; in Preston, one in fifteen; in Manchester, one in seventeen; in Liverpool, one in twenty.

THE REGISTRATION.—The revision of the lists of voters cannot be commenced before the 10th inst., and must be concluded by the end of October. The revising barristers are now paid two hundred guineas each, including travelling expenses. The cost of the revision to the country is about £16,000 a year. Since the last revision, Mr. Arnold, who revised the lists for the City of London for some years, has been appointed a magistrate, and Mr. Moylan, who revised Westminster and other places, a County Court Judge. Lord Denman has appointed Mr. M'Christie to revise the lists of voters in the room of the two other learned gentlemen.

CLOSING OF THE NATIONAL GALLERY.—On Wednesday the National Gallery was closed for the annual vacation, and will not be re-opened till the 16th of October.

 These Engravings, in picturesqueness and fidelity of detail, from the great pains bestowed upon their production, will equal if not surpass any Landscape Illustrations of the Life of Shakspeare which have yet appeared. They will be engraved in the first style of the Art, so as to gratify the extreme interest in the Shakspearean Localities, which has lately been revived by the contemplated re-disposal of the Poet's House at Stratford.

The Engravings will be accompanied by a brief Summary of the most authentic particulars of the Birth, Residence, and Demise, of Shakspeare; authenticated by a careful investigation of various sources of information, in the very recent visit of his Author and Artist to Stratford-on-Avon.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 11, 1847.

At the time the Health of Towns Bill was under discussion, we stated our conviction that one of the first steps in Sanatory Legislation ought to be the abolition of the practice of interment in the small and crowded City churchyards. The measure seems a most obvious one; what can be more inconsistent, while undertaking the more difficult operations of general drainage and improved modes of building, to continue feeding a perpetual source and fountain of disease? We cannot here go fully into the dreadful subject in its bearings on the public health; but we must again call attention to its demoralising and brutalising effects, and the desecration of the sanctity of the grave, to which it gives rise. Twice during the past week has the question been brought before the public—once in a representation to the Lord Mayor; but the magistracy is powerless, and can only hand the matter over to the newspapers, in hopes that public opinion may in time enforce the remedy. It appears that some burying-ground, supposed to be situated in the parish of St. Pancras, has been cleared or relieved of its gathering surplus, and this, with all its mouldering remnants of mortality, has been shot on the sites of some new roads forming near a locality called Amphill-square. What follows is from the newspaper report :—

During the night of Thursday, an immense quantity of broken-up coffins and human bones were shot upon the spot, but where they were brought from no one could tell. On the Friday, large numbers were drawn to the spot, and not only were human bones found in large quantities, but pieces of flesh were picked up. The children who were there amused themselves by raking over the soil for the purpose of finding teeth, of which great numbers were picked up.

These, it is said, were to be sold to the dentists! It is supposed that the remains have been removed from Old St. Pancras Churchyard, to make room for some enlargement of the church. Worse cases even than this have occurred; nor are these removals of human remains the most repulsive of the consequences of interring the dead in the narrow cemeteries that alone exist in the great centres of population. The statement made before the Lord Mayor was of a shocking scene caused by the digging of fresh graves in the churchyard of St. Ethelburga, Bishopsgate Within. His Lordship, after reading the statement, added, that it was but one of numerous complaints made to him on the same subject. Only a few days before he had been informed of the state of the burial-ground attached to Elim Chapel, in Fetter-lane. A man who had interred two children there, was apprehensive their bodies would be cut in pieces to make room for others, according to some horrid practice continued under the sanction of what are called "regulations." A medical man has visited the spot, and found "there were actually two or three cart-loads of human remains packed up in coffins for carting and removal to some other place, which it might perhaps be considered necessary on some future occasion to desecrate in a similar manner."

Such things are scarcely credible in a Christian land; and, in the midst of the metropolis of the country, they are perfectly monstrous. The old City churches have no more space around them now than they had centuries ago; those that were rebuilt after the Great Fire have not, in all probability, so much; yet, we have continued, for nearly two hundred years, to make them the receptacles of the ashes of a community that has increased from hundreds to tens of thousands. Let us only reflect on what a London or suburban parish was two centuries ago and what it is now! Is it not evident that in continuing to pile the same narrow spot with the dead of a population that would in itself almost make a city, we are guilty of an enormous folly, to say nothing of it in a higher point of view? It is a violation of plain natural laws, for the non-observance of which the punishment is certain and unavoidable. Those inhabitants of London who are so unfortunately located as to have one of these churchyards constantly under their enforced observation, see many things that never find their way into the public prints; in fact, they would scarcely bear publication. The time has come when this question must be attended to; the Metropolis is quaking be too often repeated, has outgrown the old arrangements that sufficed for an earlier state of things. If the Government is in earnest in its plans of Sanatory Reform, it must, whatever the difficulties may be, grapple with the subject, attention to which has formed a part of the objects of Municipal arrangements almost from the foundation of society. There is no example of any nation of antiquity having permitted the interment of the dead within the walls of their cities. The Romans prohibited either interment or cremation within the walls; the burial places of the Jews were without the cities; so are those of the Turks. In Paris, the practice was abolished nearly a century ago; yet what was the population of Paris then to that of London at present? In fact, London ought not to be called a city at all; it is a nation in itself; it contains the numbers of a nation concentrated on one spot; and any cause of death or disease, allowed to exist unchecked, rages in our crowded ranks with terrible virulence. Surely what the French could accomplish in the eighteenth century, we can do in the nineteenth. The "difficulties" alleged are asserted rather than proved, and would lessen considerably if earnestly confronted.

THE Journal des Débats is retaliating on the English journals for their articles on the social condition of France, by elaborate descriptions of the state of Ireland. That we are open to reproach in that quarter cannot be denied; even among the most recent proceedings of the authorities, such as the curtailing the hospital accommodation in Dublin, when it was officially ordered, without reference to the state of the people, the consequences were horrible, and the Débats takes a not unfair advantage of them; nor are we sorry it has done so; the sooner those in authority are shamed out of that careless, routine mode of doing business, the better. These shocking cases, when they occur, are not the result of deliberate cruelty, or even of habitual hard-heartedness, so much as want of thought and reflection. It is convenient to carry one class of measures into effect at one time, and it is not remembered with what fearful effect they may operate in certain exceptional instances.

Another case of the same sort is the indifference with which the parish officers of Liverpool have been shipping off Irish paupers to Dublin by the steamers; there is no regard to the state of the weather, to illness, to age; no preparations, even of the rudest kind, for shelter during a, perhaps, stormy passage. All is done in the lump and by wholesale; far more care would be taken of Irish cattle. That of the four or five hundred passengers in the Duchess of Kent, only two should have died, is little less than a miracle; no greater degree of exposure to the elements, about the same time killed two tourists in the Highlands, who were, by some unexplained means, left shelterless. Again, the state in which emigrants have been permitted to embark for Canada and America is covering us with disgrace in the United States. The ships, either over-crowded, or totally without proper arrangements, have become floating pest-houses. Yes, it is said, there are Government Inspectors of emigrant ships, bound to see that the vessels are fit for their purpose. How do they do their duty? Are there enough of them to do the work? There is a dreadful deficiency somewhere. To questions put to the Government, in the House of Commons, towards the end of the session, only the usual wordy, vague, official answers were given; but, the purport was, that everything was being done, that everybody was zealous and attentive. Either the Government was grossly deceived by its underlings, or, as we believe, the staff was too weak in numbers to do a quarter of the work required. We understand there are only five or six men to survey all the emigrant ships and superintend all the emigration from Liverpool! Is it a wonder that the inspection is a mere farce? Far better there were none at all, there being just enough to create the impression that all is right.

THE PRASLIN TRAGEDY.

Our Illustrations, and comprehensive and exclusive details of the recent fearful murder and suicide at Paris, appear to have excited very great interest in that capital. The Charivari, the Corsaire, the Commerce, the Reforme, the Courrier Français, and indeed the Paris journals generally, notice the ILLUSTRATED NEWS of last week. The National, of Tuesday, says :—

"Nous avons sous les yeux le dernier Numero du Journal Anglais, THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, qui donne en outre la Voyage de la Reine en Ecosse, la série la plus complète de documents et de gravures sur l'affaire de Praslin. Les efforts que les propriétaires de ce Journal ont du faire pour se procurer ces détails prouvent assez jusqu'à quel point l'attention du public Anglais a été excitée par ce drame déplorable."

THE EXPLOSION ON BOARD THE "CRICKET" STEAMER.

To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, Sept. 8, 1847.

SIR,—Your observations on the accident that took place on board the Cricket, river steamer, would lead the public to suppose that these steamers are under the inspection of the surveyors appointed by the Board of Trade; but which is not the case, as the Act expressly states "sea-going steamers."

I have not failed to call the Lord Mayor's attention to the over-crowding and dangerous state of many of these boats, which I could not but observe in my frequent passages up and down the river, suggesting, at the same time, such measures as would secure a better order of things, and public safety. This has been referred to the Court of Aldermen by his Lordship, from whom I received a summons to attend and explain, when the matter was favourably entertained by most of the Court; Sir Peter Laurie alone treating the representation I made, not only with marked indifference, but rudeness, such as I consider derogatory to the character of any officer placed in his position.

I have a second time called the attention of the Lord Mayor to the subject since the fearful loss of life and sufferings occasioned by the bursting of the Cricket boiler.

I trust you will find a place in your Journal for this statement, as the Government Inspectors have no authority over river steamers. I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

EDWARD SMITH,

Inspector of Sea-going Steamers under the new Act.

THE WEATHER.

The cold weather at the end of last week has continued through the whole of this week: the sky has been generally covered by cloud: some rain, at different times, has fallen, but its whole amount has been small: the wind has been mostly from the W. and W.S.W.: the average temperature of each day has been below that of the season. The following are some particulars of each day:—Friday, the 3d, was cold, the sky covered by cloud throughout the day, and a thin misty rain was frequently falling: the direction of the wind was chiefly W.: the day was very cold, and particularly so in the morning: the average temperature of the day 49° nearly. Saturday, the 4th was, for the most part, covered by cloud till the evening, consisting of cumuli, cumulistrati, fleecy clouds, and loose send, at different times in the day: the directions of the wind were N and W: the temperature of the day 49° nearly. Sunday, the 5th was almost one half covered by detached cumuli and fleecy clouds throughout the day: there was a fog in the evening, and some sheet lightning was seen: the day was cold: its average temperature was 49°. Monday, the 6th was entirely covered by cloud before noon, and entirely so after noon: during the latter interval of time there were several squalls of rain: and, in the evening, several faint flashes of lightning were seen to the south: the day was rather cold, its average temperature being 52½°. Tuesday, the 7th was principally free from cloud before noon, and it was quite covered by cirrostratus and send after noon: the direction of the wind was W.: its average temperature was 52½°. Wednesday, the 8th was covered by cloud throughout the day: a great gloom prevailed in the morning; and, between 10h. 50m. A.M. and 11h. 50m. A.M. several claps of thunder were heard in the east and, a while after, a rather severe thunder-storm took place, apparently over, or near to, Woolwich: the day was gloomy throughout: the direction of the wind was, at first, W., and, afterwards, N.: several showers of rain were seen: the average temperature of the day was 51½°. Thursday, the 9th was mostly covered by thin cloud during the morning, and it was partially covered after noon: the average temperature of the day was 54½°; and that for the week was 52½°.

The extreme thermometrical readings each day were :—

Friday,	Sept. 3,	the highest during the day was 5	deg., and the lowest was 38 deg.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

CHRISTENING IN EXETER-HALL.—Last Sunday morning the infant son of the Earl and Countess of Dudley was baptized by the Rev. Dr. Cumming, in the large room, Exeter-Hall. The noble Lord, with his Countess, stood up before the vast auditory which overflows Exeter-Hall every Sunday, and the minister put to them the usual questions, and addressed a few words to the congregation. Lord Dudley then presented his child in his arms at the baptismal basin, according to the usage of the Established Church of Scotland, and the minister poured water on its brow, after the usual manner. The severe simplicity of the ceremony gave it, in the circumstances, an impressive character.

ELECTION OF DEPUTY-GOVERNOR OF THE BANK.—On Wednesday, a General Court was held at the Bank of England, for the election of a Deputy-Governor for the remainder of the year, in the room of James Morris, Esq., now Governor, when Henry James Prescott, Esq., was declared to have been duly elected. In the course of the proceedings it was stated that, owing to the recent large increase of the profits of the Corporation, arising from the high value of money on discounts, loans on approved securities, &c., of late existing, the General Meeting would be called together, and, by a proprietor, be asked to vote for an additional bonus of one-half or one per cent., to be paid upon the capital stock of the Corporation, in addition to the usual dividend half-yearly declared.

THE NATIONAL ALLIANCE.—On Wednesday evening, a crowded meeting of the supporters of the National Alliance, established with the view of promoting the real representation of the people in Parliament, was held at the Eastern Institution, Commercial-road. An address to the electors and non-electors of Great Britain was extensively circulated through the Hall, congratulating them on the characteristics and results of the general election. George Thompson, Esq., M.P., took the chair, and addressed the meeting at some length in support of the objects of the Society, and was followed by Dr. Epps, Colonel T. P. Thompson, M.P., Mr. E. Miall, Mr. Vincent, and other gentlemen; and a number of resolutions were adopted in conformity with the views of the promoters of the meeting.

ITS OPENING OF THE BRITISH MUSEUM.—This National Museum, having been closed for the usual limited period, was re-opened to the public, on Wednesday, and will continue open every successive Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, from ten to four.

DECLINE OF LITERARY INSTITUTIONS IN THE METROPOLIS.—Two of the largest of these establishments in the metropolis—the Western Literary Institution, Leicester-square; and the Eastern, in the Hackney-road—have been broken up during the past week, and their collections, libraries, museums, and collections of philosophical apparatus, are to be sold by public auction.

NEW BARTHOLOMEW FAIR.—This fair, which, owing to the virtual suppression by the Court of Aldermen of the ancient fair of St. Bartholomew, in West Smithfield, was held in an extensive field, opposite the North Pole, in the New North-road; and, on Monday, immense numbers of persons were present. The fair seemed, in every essential point, to be an immense City holiday. The amusements and attractions were of the usual character.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS IN THE METROPOLIS.—The number of births during the week ending the 4th inst., was 1295, of which 652 were males, and 643 females; this number exceeds by 73 that of the previous week. The number of deaths was 1051 (526 males and 525 females); this number is less than that of last week by 35, and more than the weekly average for the last five summers by 111.

MURDER AT MEXBOROUGH, NEAR DONCASTER.—Last Saturday evening, a cold-blooded murder was discovered (lying nearly on the footpath with his head in a ditch) by a fellow workman named Gower. On searching the spot, a great quantity of blood was found where the deceased's head had lain, and a little way off his hat and a pitcher, in which he was carrying home some ale from the public-house, were found. Medical aid was procured as soon as Barker was taken home, he being alive, but quite insensible; and everything was done to save his life, but he died the following morning, about five o'clock. An inquest was held on Monday evening, when evidence of the above facts was given, in addition to which, there was the testimony of the medical men who had made a post-mortem examination, and who deposed that the deceased had received a severe fracture of the skull, a blow under the left eye, and one under the ear. The inquest was adjourned until Monday.]

POSTSCRIPT.

HER MAJESTY'S TOUR TO THE HIGHLANDS.

ABERDEENSHIRE, Sept. 7.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert walked in the morning in the grounds, and in the afternoon went out on the lake, accompanied by the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal

To-day his Royal Highness Prince Albert went to the Forest There is no addition to the Royal dinner party.

Preparations on an extensive scale are being made at Inverness to give her Majesty a suitable reception. The day fixed upon for the Royal Visit is Wednesday, the 15th instant, and a numerous and imposing gathering of the clans is expected to take place on the occasion. It was at first intended that the Royal party should proceed by the Perth or Highland road to Inverness, but that intention has been abandoned, and her Majesty has determined to embark at Fort William, and proceed by the Caledonian Canal through the great glen of Albin, to Dochfour House, the residence of Mr. and Lady Georgina Baillie, where the Royal party will sojourn for a day or two. Her Majesty will, it is reported, in the course of her progress down Lochness, view the fall of Foyers, the greatest and most magnificent fall in the kingdom. During her short stay at Dochfour House, the Queen will proceed to Culloden Moor, passing through the Royal and beautifully-situated town of Inverness going and returning.

Her Majesty having been informed that John Maclean, of Inverness, or, as he is generally called, "the Highland Historian," who is one hundred years and eight months old, was in indigent circumstances, she was graciously pleased to direct a cheque for £10 to be forwarded to the centenarian.

SANATORY IMPROVEMENT.

SANATORY IMPROVEMENT.—It is understood that a commission to inquire into the special means requisite for the sanatory improvement of the metropolis is about to be issued, consisting of Lord E. Somerset, Mr. Chadwick, Dr. R. Smith, Professor Owen, F.R.S., and Mr. L. Jones.

THE HEIR OF ABBOTSFORD.—From a War-office notification in the Edinburgh Gazette, it appears that Lieutenant Walter Scott Lockhart, of the 16th Lancers Dragoons, has been permitted to assume the name of Scott, in addition to that of Lockhart.

DEATH OF LADY FOLLETT.—Lady Follett, the relict of the late Sir William Webb Follett, formerly Attorney-General, died at Weybridge, on Thursday last.

CITY OF LONDON LITERARY AND SCIENTIFIC INSTITUTION.—The re-opening of this institution, which for the last two months has been partially closed for the purpose of enlarging and decorating the premises, was celebrated on Thursday evening by a meeting of the members. The theatre, which is capable of affording comfortable sitting accommodation to upwards of 800 persons, was thronged throughout by both sexes. At eight o'clock, George Grote, Esq., president of the institution, took the chair, and opened the proceedings by a luminous address, in which he explained the nature and object of the institution, and enforced its claims on public encouragement and support. A member of the elocution class then delivered a poetic effusion appropriate to the occasion, after which the meeting was agreeably entertained for some time by the members of the philosophical class, who exhibited some interesting experiments with the oxyhydrogen microscope. In the reading room, the company were provided with a musical treat. In the theatre the institution has been engaged to-day in giving a law courts, police court, &c.; while Te Aro accommodates the mercantile community, and comprises the Bank, Exchange, Custom House, &c.: it is situated at the head of the Bay, where vessels in port lie at anchor, which accounts for its selection for the purposes of business. Thorndon possesses an advantage over Te Aro, in being the nearest to the country districts. The present road to Kaiori commences at a valley at the back of Thorndon, and the route to the Hutt and to Rosenua, from Te Aro, lies directly across Thorndon Flat.

The View shows the Head of the Bay, as it is called in the colony, with the Merchants' Stores, &c. Commencing from the left side of the Picture, a rather wide thoroughfare, called Manners-street, may be observed, inclining upwards, from the lower corner of the Picture. The View also shows the houses, bonded stores, jetties, &c., at the head of the Bay; and Mount Victoria in the background. The Sketch is taken from Wellington Terrace, opposite Captain Sharpe's house.

The companion Engraving is a View on the Banks of the River Hutt, taken near the site of Hutt Bridge. This gives a good idea of the character of the rivers in New Zealand.

They are, generally, very much choked up with trees and drift-wood, the banks are mostly lined with native gardens, one of which appears on the right of the picture. The natives do not cut the entire trees down, but merely lop the branches off, and turn them round the trunks, whereby the trees are killed, and the ground is scarcely touched. After the fire has passed through the bush-clearing, they merely make a hole in the surface and drop a potato in, and it is left to spread as it best can. The soil of the valley of the Hutt is very rich and of great depth.

MELANCHOLY.—PAINTED BY CH. LANDELLE.

This exquisite Illustration of the "Goddess, sage and holy,—divinest Melancholy," is from a fine picture by Ch. Landelle, engraved in Paris, and to be had in London of Messrs. Gambart, Junin, and Co., Berners-street.

The painter has beautifully personified the characteristics, by our "very great poet," of her

> Whose saintly visage is too bright
> To hit the sense of human sight;
> And, therefore, to our weaker view,
> O'erlaid with black, staid Wisdom's hue.
> * * * * * *
> Pensive nun, devout and pure,
> Sober, steadfast, and demure,
> All in a robe of darkest grain,
> Flowing with majestic train,
> And sable stole of cypress lawn
> Over thy decent shoulders drawn.
> A starless night o'erhangs thy forehead pale:
> The moaning winds of Autumn's farewell hour
> Breathe gently on thy cheek and sable veil,
> With heavenly sympathy to thee, sweet flow'r—
> Thou Lily of the Soul! Fair Melancholy;
> Saint of the sage! and goddess of the bard!
> Plaud, that weepeth over human folly
> Tears, which a seraph might as treasure guard!
> Within thy spirit—pure and sacred shrine—
> Breathes, lives, and moves, the voice of the DIVINE.
> Is it the memory of buried love,
> That now weighs down the curtain of those eyes?
> And have the mournings of the widowed dove
> Poured unison of sorrow with thy sighs?
> Have they all perished—the fond, faithful ties,
> That twined, like honeysuckles, round the heart?
> And thou art gazing where the loved one lies,
> Coffer'd for ever in Death's dismal mart?
> More joy springs from the memory of the dead
> Than later love around us ever spread.
> Alas! e'en thus our LORD look'd o'er the hills
> Of Salem, prophesying their just doom.
> He saw the direful day when Kedron's rills
> Rippled with bloodshed, and Destruction's gloom
> Hung o'er the Temple. . . . Even in our late day,
> Well may thine altars bear the cypress bough,
> Pale Melancholy! for thy sceptre's away
> Waves over many a noble, Royal brow.
> Cradled by Woe, the Virtues hailed thy birth;
> And Heaven is nearest when remote from Earth.—L.

THE LAST SUPPER. BY LEONARDO DA VINCI.

This celebrated picture was nearly destroyed about fifty years after it was painted. Sir David Wilkie has thus touchingly recorded his visit to its shade:—"The Last Supper," of Leonardo da Vinci, drew my attention at Milan; but here Time has even been more unsparing than in his wont; a shadow is now all that remains of this once great work, and that so faint that even the substance of the original picture has become a question: whether fresco, tempera, or oil; but, to show the immortality of mind, when such a thing does exist in a picture, over the frail material in which it is embodied, this masterpiece, in its very ruin, has been revived, and seems destined to enjoy a wide posthumous existence in the well-known admirable engraving of Raphael Morghen, long after the wall upon which it was painted has crumbled into dust.

The German print of this noble work, familiar to most of our readers, is costly—the proofs bringing as much as ten guineas. This, and the high popularity of the picture, some time since, induced Mr Dick, of New York, to set about engraving the picture on steel, of the same size as the German print: the work was entrusted to Mr. Burt, under Mr. Dick's superintendence; but, some time before the engraving was completed, Mr. Dick lost his sight, and the afflicted gentleman is now in London. The plate has been finished under other superintendence; and Mr. Dick has brought with him some impressions, which show it to be a fine specimen of American skill in steel-plate engraving. The size is 36 inches by 17 inches, and the prints will be sold as low as one guinea each. The work has all the breadth and vigour of the German plate, especially in the draperies of the Apostles' robes, and, perhaps, more than its exquisiteness in the distant paysage. The features of the Saviour, too, are beautifully delicate.

> That countenance where grief and love
> Blent with ineffable benignity
> And deep unuttered majesty divine.

The love, scorn, fear, and grief in the countenances of the Eleven, are wonderfully rendered: and the artistic excellence of the folds of the table-cloth is preserved. The traitor, Judas, it will be recollected, has just clutched the money-bag, and overset the salt-cellar, an incident which has been sometimes thought to have given rise to the ill-omen of spilling salt.

The plate is, altogether, one of the finest "household prints" with which we are familiar; serving to keep in remembrance the prayer so beautifully rendered in the impassioned verse of the American poetess:—

> Thou, who didst taste
> Of man's infirmities, yet bar his sin;
> From false suspected soul, forsake us not
> In our temptations; but, as guests at feast
> That our Last Supper in the wild may lead
> To that immortal banquet by thy side,
> Where there is no betrayer. Mrs. Sigourney.

THE BOTTLE. IN EIGHT PLATES. BY GEORGE CRUIKSHANK. Published for the Author, by D. Bogue.

For a long series of years have the "reading public" been accustomed to regale themselves with the humours of George Cruikshank's genius; sometimes, it is true, in the questionable shape of party satire, but much oftener, and to a far higher purpose, in the broad laugh of his pencil at the follies and absurd conventionalities of social life. How many hearty bursts of merriment have our Artists' early facetiæ provoked—how many tables have they set on a roar! On the present occasion, however, he appears with a much higher aim in the walk of the "painting moralist;" with a representation of domestic tragedy, which tells its story in such unmistakeable terms that "all who run may read."

The Plates, or Scenes, are eight in number; each being so meritorious a contribution towards a great moral object, that we must describe the leading features. The sun is to show the horrors of Drunkenness in all their hideousness: and this is most forcibly effected, without a line of exaggeration, or a shade of too deep a dye

Plate I. The Bottle is brought in for the first time: the husband induces his wife "just to take a drop." Here the home wears the aspect of comfort, and all is neatness and good order. A view of the parish church hangs upon the wall, flanked by a dutch clock, a piece of furniture usually possessed by the well-to-do: and the portrait of the Sovereign embellishes the mantel piece. The speckboard is well stocked, and the fire blazes cheerfully; the two children are at play before it, and the kitten is sporting with its mother's ball. The husband is at work at the table: the dinner over, the husband is holding the fatal dram to his wife, the serving daughter looks on, and thus the wicked work begins.

We know not how long a space, in the phrase of some playwrights, is supposed to elapse between the acts; but, in Plate II., the Drunken Husband, discharged from his employment, sits, pipe-in mouth; whilst the wife is sending the eldest daughter with clothes to pawn, to supply the Bottle. Confusion has now displaced comfort: the cupboard is empty, the fire out, the fender upset, the floor carpetless, the half-starved cat has cleared the plates, and the little children gaze in wonder at their drunken father!

In Plate III., the poison has worked: an execution is sweeping off most of the furniture: the Bible, the picture of the church, the portrait of the Sovereign—the pensates of a dear English home—and its little pride, the tea-caddy—all are doomed; the broker is reading over his inventory, one of his men is removing the clock, another the drawers; a broken cripple, with a short pipe stuck in it, and a public-house pot, displaces the mantel-shelf. Meanwhile, the husband and wife—how changed from the first—sit consoling themselves with drinking gin, and the children look replningly at the full swoop of the execution.

The wretchedness is linked to imposture in Plate IV.: the whole family, unable to obtain employment, are driven to beg in the streets: here, the boy, shoeless and in rags, is receiving pence from the well-dressed passenger, to raise means to supply the Bottle; the haggard mother carries the half-naked child, and the ruined father has just left "the bottle department" of the gin-shop with a fresh supply of the poison.

The suffering thickens in Plate V.: "cold, misery, and want" have destroyed the youngest child, and the girl is crying as she removes the coffin-lid. The room is a sad scene of squalor and wretchedness: a box, a single chair, and a mattress, are almost the only furniture: a cloth fastened with forks serves as a window curtain, a bottle for a candlestick, and fire smokes upon the broken hearth-slab, beside which sits the shoeless vagabond of a son: the father and mother are seeking to console themselves with the Bottle; but, remorse has overtaken them, and the wretched mother weeps ere she lifts the deadly dram to her lips.

The abuse of the Bottle has risen to brutal violence in Plate VI.; there is a fearful quarrel, and the drunken husband is about to fell the frantic wife, while the ragged children rush imploringly to stay the feud, and a terrified lodger appears at the door. As accessories, there are the upset table and public-house pot; the bottle and glass upon the mantel shelf, in place of the emblems of good order; and the last "rag" has fallen from the upset chair, and is blazing on the hearth

"Deeper and deeper still" in Plate VII., the husband, furiously drunk, has killed his wife with the instrument of all their misery—the Bottle; the police have seized the murderer, who is frantic nigh into madness: the vagabond and almost shoeless son looks on, half-witted; the girl is weeping, and pointing to the fatal Bottle, broken, on the floor; while a group of neighbours, in sorrow and amazement, are beside the corpse of the wife; the doctor is in vain seeking for her pulse, and above him, in a mother's arms, sits a little child—an emblem of innocence in the sad scene of crime and guilt.

The last Plate VIII.—is, indeed, an appalling scene: in the Artist's words, "The Bottle has done its work"—it has destroyed the infant and the mother, it has brought the son and daughter to vice and to the streets, and has left the father a hopeless maniac. This is a chamber of horrors and terrific realities: the flash children have come to see their father in the madhouse; the girl is tricked out in gayest finery of vice; and the boy, flower in mouth, is a chief from head to foot—from the fancy hair to the conventional shoes—and a successful candidate for another knot besides that in his neckcloth. The maniac father is a portrait of terrible truth: the idiotic stare, the shrunken limbs, and the shivering frame, seated by the fire, which is enclosed by open bars, and denotes how the poor wreck of humanity is shut out from the world on every side: he knows not his children, whom his own criminal example has nipped in the bud of life, but forced into full blown sin. In the inner ward room are about two other inmates of the madhouse: one with glaring eyeballs, and erect hair, seated on the floor; the other staring idiotically through the window-bars, through which the light streams, but not to irradiate the hopeless group within! These are, without doubt, studies from actual life.

Such is the graphic tale of sadness and suffering, of crime and retribution, by which the Artist seeks to rouse the masses to their wickedness and its fearful consequences. As pictures, it is not hard to distil from them drops of moral truth—let us hope to mingle with tears of penitence wherever the lesson may overtake husband, wife, or child, in their career of sin! A celebrated nation of antiquity taught their youth to abhor drinking, by allowing them to drink to great excess, and thus causing them to see their own distorted features in a looking-glass. These Plates of "The Bottle" will better produce the same effect, by an ineffensive medium. They will, doubtless, be admired more for their moral design than artistic execution. The Plates are 13 by 8½ inches; and cheapness and extensive circulation being the prime objects, they could not reasonably be looked for. Their publication will effect incalculable good; and in the hope of contributing to their efficacy in moral improvement have we thus devoted an unusual space to the specification of their claims to public attention.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

FREEDOM OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT FROM ARREST.

AN ARGUMENT was heard at QUEEN'S BENCH Chambers, before Mr. Justice Williams, on Tuesday, which turned upon the extent of the privilege from arrest enjoyed by Members of Parliament. The case was that of Elizabeth Gouty v. T. S. Duncombe, Esq., M.P. A summons had been taken out on behalf of the defendant, calling upon the plaintiff to show cause why he should not be discharged out of the custody of the Sheriff of Yorkshire, on the ground that he is privileged from arrest, having been returned as M.P. for Finsbury. The summons set forth that the defendant had been elected M.P. for Finsbury in the month of July last, and that, pursuant to such election and return, he is, and at the time of arrest was, a Member of the House of Commons, and as such entitled to all the privileges of a Member of that House; that he is at present on a visit to Osgorve, near Hoyroughbridge, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, the residence of his father; and that, whilst on such a visit, he was arrested and taken on execution by George Acton, one of the officers of the Sheriff of Yorkshire, at the suit of the plaintiff, in virtue of a warrant bearing date the 1st of September inst., granted by the said Sheriff of Yorkshire, in pursuance of a writ of capias ad satisfaciendum issued in this cause; and that he was still in custody of said Sheriff. It appeared that the sum for which the defendant was arrested amounted to £3400.

Mr. Carlon, of the firm of Messrs Carlon and Haynes, appeared as attorney for the defendant. He stated that the defendant was returned M.P. for Finsbury on the 28th of July last, and that his arrest took place on the 2nd of September, Parliament being summoned to meet on the 21st inst. The latest case on the books relating to the subject was that of Lord Hinchley, which was decided in favour of the defendant by Mr. Baron Parke, with the full consent of the whole Court, who ordered his discharge, on the ground of his being a Member of Parliament at the time of arrest. This was a case exactly in point, and on the same ground he asked for the discharge of the defendant in the present case.

Mr. Wills, who appeared as counsel for the plaintiff, said that the case just cited would be a good authority for the defendant's discharge if he was entitled to the privilege of a Member of Parliament, but not, as in the present case, when he did not possess such a privilege. A Member of the House of Commons, he contended, had only been exempted from arrest on civil actions in order to allow him to come to Parliament. The question in this case then was, what time a Member should be allowed before Parliament met to enable him to come to London. The learned Counsel cited several authorities in support of his case. He said the only case in which this question had been pronounced on by the House of Commons was the case of Martin, in 1586. Mr. Martin, it appeared, was arrested twenty days before the meeting of Parliament, and the question was put to the House whether they would fix a limited time certain, within which a Member was to be free from arrest, or merely a convenient time, and the House answered, "a reasonable time." The case having been brought within twenty days within a convenient time, Mr. Martin was discharged. The inference from this was that a period beyond twenty days was a convenient time

Mr. Justice Williams: It appears by a letter that the House of Commons declined to say what was the limit, but merely said that twenty days was within the limit.

After some further argument on both sides, Mr Carlon maintained that the defendant's privilege must be counted from the day of his arrest to the 21st of September, and again from the 21st of September to the 12th of October, as he was entitled to forty days after every prorogation.

Mr Justice Williams remarked that the defendant was entitled to take a forty days' journey to come to Parliament. Now, supposing he set out on the 2nd of September (the day of his arrest), and arrived the night before the meeting of Parliament, on the 12th of October, that would be exactly forty days. He said, however, that, practically, it would be within 20 days, for Parliament would meet on the 21st, though it was only for the purpose of being prorogued still farther; and, therefore, the 12th of October must be held a second prorogation, and not as a continuation of the first. But, even if the plaintiff could have shown that it was beyond 20 days, he (Mr. Justice Williams) would have been reluctant to disturb the decisum of so great an authority as Judge Blackstone, who stated forty days as the period; and, therefore, he must order the defendant to be discharged.

An order for the defendant's discharge was given accordingly, his attorney consenting that no action should follow for false imprisonment.

VERY SUDDEN DEATH.—On Saturday Mr. Higgs held an inquest, at the Bedford Arms, Clapham-road, upon the body of William Pratt, aged 33, a labourer, who died in the following sudden manner:—On the previous Thursday afternoon the deceased was playing at skittles at the above house, and was in the act of throwing the ball when he suddenly exclaimed, "Oh, my head," and fell down insensible. He was carried home, and medical assistance was obtained, but he never rallied, and died the same evening. A verdict of "Died in a fit of apoplexy" was returned.

FLYING SHEETS FROM A TRAVELLING CONTRIBUTOR.

MAYENCE, Sept. 6

The last three or four days have offered "a heavy blow and a great discouragement" to tourists on the Rhine. Poor unfortunates! Although they do (some of them, at least) make themselves so supremely ridiculous, it is almost impossible not to feel pity for their forlorn condition, when the weather happens to turn out unfavourable. If the sun shine, all goes well for your thorough John Bull Rhine tourist; he can pace the deck of his steamer like a lord; or he can perambulate the quiet towns he stops at, astonishing, as he conceives, with his grand airs, the simpering natives, accustomed to condescension, politeness, and good breeding. But let it rain, and what becomes of our traveller? Understanding not the savoir vivre, he sits apart in the salon of his hotel, drinking bad wine at private prices, or cursing the waiter because he cannot make him a glass of English grog. Or, if several meet together, after a day's mutual staring and scrutiny has at last ended in a slight thaw, they form a knot among themselves, create more noise than ever the foreigners, laugh at everything they do not understand, abuse everything that does not please them, and suspect every one approaching them (who is not an Englishman) of being a rogue. Now, as I rather like to study men than things, and can console myself when the weather is cruel—not having seen sights which I find generally weary me if I do see them!—I sometimes amuse myself with observing the oddities of my countrymen, hoping thereby to instruct myself or avoid their errors, or profit by any good example I may meet with. I must say that, having been detained at Bologne a day or two, I have seen elsewhere on my way here, I have had some amusing specimens. At one place, for instance, I stumbled upon a party—first, the father of the family, a man whom a Lesch or a Hablot Brown might pencil as a permanent model. He was certainly a "heavy father," though not exactly in the stage sense of that phrase. He loomed on my vision like the incarnation of modern John Bullism, as thus—size, six feet by three; paunch, the dome of St. Paul's; face, red, and flouted; twinkling eyes; mouth, a formless orifice; and a large double chin, set round in a white cambric towel. The man did not look at all ill-natured, and yet there was an air of stolid selfishness about his countenance which was far from prepossessing. He had with him his wife, his daughter (a handsome, modelooking young lady, who appeared as if she would much rather be any where else), a young gentleman, and a tall, thin, and very sarcastic-looking old spectre, was the invalided; and a son, who was evidently the hopeful of the family. Not one of them could speak a word but English, and, moreover, they had brought with them a heavy load of prejudice, which, as I said before, was cruel, because it also worse than useless. I afterwards discovered, however, that young Master had been especially brought as interpreter to the party, because he had learned French.

It was at feeding time that I encountered this travelling menagerie, and it seemed that the paternal appetite was in strong force. Well, it was a capital season. The garçon had placed the dish, and, having taken up the carving knife, head round, and growled out, "What's that?" "Ous, Monsieur," answers the waiter; whereupon the head twists round towards Young Hopeful, who is asked to interpret. He looks puzzled, and, after a labor ously long process of extracting phrases in Camberwell French to the waiter, who gapes non-apprehension. The internal wrath vermilions the paternal visage; but, the appetite being exacting, this dish is taken on trust. Another and another still succeed, and, at each, the son discovers more and more clearly that he is maneuvring on a volcano. Curses both loud and deep indicate from dish to dish the coming storm. At last, the explosion! Some chef-d'œuvre of culinary science awaits our Englishman's mastication (who has a deliberate arrière pensée of frogs and horseflesh), offered by the still patient father. "Father" can bear it no longer. He flings down knife and fork, dashes his napkin on the table, turns to his trembling son, and cries, "What's the use, I should like to know, of my paying a ten-pun note extra every year, for you to larn French, if I'm to be starved or pisoned in this 'ere cursed country?" And then, on the son can muster forth his innocence, or mother and daughter soothe their irate protector, he turns his flaming visage to the astonished waiter, roaring forth, "I'm John ——, of So-and-so. Murray says all the waiters speak English on the Rhine. I pays for the best of everything, and I expect you'll understand me when I speak. Call the landlord!" And then he waits this up for ten minutes or more, swearing at his son, at whom he turned looks like those of Medusa, at the waiter, at the boots, at Mr. Winks, and, in a rambling fit—then swearing at the waiter—and so on, till he rose, and emphatically announced his determination of going back to England the very next morning! I fell in with another gentleman, of superior position, and whose daughter soothe their irate protector, he turns his flaming visage to the astonished waiter, roaring forth, "I'm John ——, of So-and-so. Murray says all the waiters speak English on the Rhine. I pays for the best of everything, and I expect you'll understand me when I speak. Call the landlord!" And then he kept

OUR MAGAZINE COLUMN FOR SEPTEMBER.

THE OLDEST MAN.

A correspondent sends us the following extract from the Register of the parish of Lanmaes, near Cowbridge, in Glamorganshire, and adds that "if late years it has attracted no close scrutiny of eminent antiquarians." — "Ivan Yorath buried on Saturday the xvii day of July anno dooi 1641, at anno regni regis vicesimo primo, anagno gratis circa 180. He was a Sowdiar in the Spanish Warres, and lived at Lanivet major, and he lived many yeares by fishing."—The Patriarch.

THE CLUB OF UGLY FACES.

This Club was instituted originally at Cambridge, and held its first dinner in Clare Hall, which, at the outset, it was feared would not be large enough to contain so numerous a body as would be fairly entitled to claim admission. The result, however, disappointed these very reasonable calculations. Few of those invited would allow that they had any right or title to a seat in the ugly assembly; and a very amusing account is given in the Spectator of the excuses put in and pleaded by the various recusants. How the powers of the Club proceeded with them is not said, the want of a president having brought the whole affair at a still-stand. A chaplain had, indeed, been provided, in the person of a merry fellow of King's College, who usually called Grub, from his ugly look, but no one would have thought of addressing him as such, or dreamt of his presidentship by superior ugliness. The affair, it is said, came to the ears of the Merry Monarch, then at Newcastle, and the whole scheme in so well laughed at humour, that he sent them a Royal Message, stating that "he could not be there himself, but he would send them a brace of bucks."—The Patriarch.

CLOSE OF THE BATTLE OF WATERLOO.

All day long, whilst the women were pressing ten miles away, the lines of the dauntless English infantry were receiving and repelling the furious charges of the French horsemen. Guns which were heard at Brussels were pouring on their ranks, and comrades falling, and the resolute survivors closing in. Towards evening, the attack of the French, repeated and restated so bravely, slackened in its fury. They had either lost heart or hope, or were drawing off preparing for a final onset. It came at last: the columns of the imperial Guard marched up the hill of St. Jean, at length and at once to sweep the English from the height which they had maintained all day, and spite of all: unsapped by the thunder of the artillery, which hurled death from the English line the dark rolling column pressed on and up the hill. It seemed almost to crest the eminence, when it began to waver and falter. Then it stopped, still facing the shot. Then at last the English troops roared from the post from which no enemy had been able to dislodge them, and the Guard turned and fled. No more firing was heard at Brussels—the pursuit rolled miles away. The darkness came down on the field and on the pursuit.—Vanity Fair.

ANGLING.

Mr. Hackle was not precipitate in his movements: for, with your anglers, it is a great point to elaborate everything as much as possible. He performed a great many intricate feats with his floats and caps, and, a lit shot and plummets; and spread everything out with great display at his side. Then he made several small stone dumplings, with a light crust of bran, clay, and gentles, which he distributed, here and there, in the water. After this, he took all his hooks out of their parchment envelopes, one after another, and, having broken off several that them all up again. Then, after plumbing his depth, which he did over every square inch within reach of his rod, he found he had too many shot, and took some off. Then he had not enough, and so weighted it again. Some one broke Next, his top-joint was the wrong one, and all his tackle had to be taken to pieces again. But as all this is a great part of the contemplative man's recreation, Mr. Hackle was rather entertained than otherwise. Albert Smith, in Bentley's Miscellany.

LITERARY CHARACTER OF JAMES I.

James I. was but a contemptible writer, and would have been scarcely worth his five pounds a week in these days, as the London correspondent of a country newspaper. His imagination would not have been vigorous enough to supply him with the "latest intelligence," which must always be in type at least two days before the date on which the facts it professes to impart are stated to have happened. As an industrious chronicler of early gossiperies, new carrots, gigantic cabbages, irruptions of ladybirds, and showers of frogs, he would have been useful in his way, or he might have undertaken that branch of periodical literature which embraces the interesting recollections or non-recollections rather—of the oldest inhabitant.—Comic History of England.

TAKING OF GUY FAWKES.

Some monster or punster in human form, declares he was called Fawkes or Forks, because he was ready to con-tinue in anything sanguinary. The atrocity of the assertion needs no comment. Poor Guido seems to have formed a most felon and most fatal attachment to the place, for nothing could keep him out of the cellar; though he knew he was almost certain of being, sawed, unceremoniously, over the coals, and he went back, at two in the morning, to the o.d spot with his habitual foolhardiness. He had no sooner opened the door than he was seized and, naturally, without his opinion being asked, by a party of soldiers. He made one desperate effort to make light of the whole business, by seeing fire to the train, but he had no box of Congreves at hand, and he observed, with a sigh of disappointment, that a gun which he had made in happier days, that he had at last found his match and lost his Lucifer.—Comic History of England.

LONDON OUT OF TOWN.

The strife of the season is over; the lime of court have cast forth their occasions; Parliament is not merely up, but dissolved; and the provinces yet stagger under the humours of a general election. London, the mighty Babylon, has become a wilderness of brick and mortar. As to the Globe, the Royal Exchange, everywhere as well without as within: That solitary member hovering on the upper step at the Athenæum, exhibits manifest tokens of bewilderment, and no wonder. Athene's halls are deserted, the chambers unoccupied and forlorn. Even the sage specimens to enter, far less to abide in them. The very library whereun she specially rejoiceth, has become, through the absence of its exce.lent custodier, Mr. Hall, comparatively useless; and the chiefest of the curiosities of Spring Gardens, Hall, comparatively useless; and the chiefest of the curiosities of Spring Gardens, son, perfect as it might be) is in utter confusion. The member appears to have attained, all at once, to an intuitive perception of these sad truths. See, he withdraws the front of his head, beaten advanced in the direction of the parallels. He stops, hesitates—turns round—and rushes, with accelerated pace, back again into the street. He flees, as it were for life, and at last succeeds in shutting himself out from observation in one of the dark alleys adjoining St. Martin's-le-strest. And so it is—or worse than this—at the Travelers', the Reform, the Carlton, and everywhere else. Poor fellow! we are sincerely sorry for that milatary-looking gentleman who stands at the door of the United Service, and the club breathes at ten o'clock, eaten in the midst of a hungry, yet talkative throng; the long lounge in the crowded saloon afterwards, with newspaper in hand; the stroll up Regent-street and down Bond-street, the hosier-shops and saddlers' windows alternately attract the gazer; the club-dinner, and then the play, with whatever accompaniments or adjuncts might follow thereupon. Instead of all this, he finds himself the solitary occupant of a palace; without a comrade to greet him; without "a soul to speak to;" and forced, as if he were still a subaltern, at an outstation in Ireland, to stand beating his well-polished boot with his cane, and to whistle an air which he has been quite weary to murder ever since he joined her Majesty's 129th Regiment of Horse Marines. With respect to White's and Brookes's, we can discover no trace in either of living thing, and the pavement beneath our feet, as we pass them slowly by, crack from the intensity of the sun's rays upon it. Is this a state of things which ought to be endured one moment longer than dire necessity shall determine?—Fraser's Magazine.

MR. AND MRS. DUNSEY'S DINNER GUESTS.

The proceedings commenced by Mr. Dombey, in a cravat of extraordinary height and stiffness, walking restlessly about the drawing-room until the hour appointed for dinner; pinching to which an Easterlia Director, of immense wealth, in a waistcoat apparently constructed in serviceable deal by some plain carpenter, but really engendered in the tailor's art, and composed of the material called nankeen, entered, and was received by Mr. Dombey alone. The next stage of the proceedings was Mr. Dombey's sending his compliments to Mrs. Dombey, with a correct statement of the time; and the next, the East India Director's taking precedence, in a conversational point of view, and, by dint of resolutely saying nothing to pick him up, staring at the fire until resene appeared, in the shape of Mrs. Skewton; whom the Director, as a peasant starts in life for the evening, mistook for Mrs. Dombey, and greeted as the lady of the house. Then arrived a Bank Director, reputed to be able to buy up anything—human Nature generally, if he should take it in his head to influence the money market in that direction. A man of wonderfully modest-spoken mien, and wonderfully few words, and mentioned his "little place" at Kingston-upon-Thames, and its just being barely equal to giving Dombey a bed and a chop, if he would come and visit it. Lastly, he said he was sure he was not the man who lived in his quiet way to trouble anyone himself to invite—but if Mrs. Skewton and her daughter, Mrs. Dombey, should ever find themselves in that direction, and would do him the honour to look at a little bit of a shrubbery they would find there, and a pony, little stone-shed or so, and a humble apology for a pinery, and two or three little atten.pts of that sort without any pretension, they would distinguish him very much. Carrying out his character, this gentleman was expensively dressed, in a wig of camb.ic frill, a neckcloth, big shoes, a coat that was too loose for him, and a pair of trousers that were too spare; and mention being made of the Opera by Mrs. Skewton, he said he very often went there, for he couldn't afford it. It seemed great joy to delight and exhilarate him to say so; and he beamed on his audience afterwards, with his hands in his pockets, and excessive satisfaction twinkling in his eyes.—From Dombey and Son, No. XII., admirably sustained, from the first to the last page.

BATHING

The country is the only place in which you can enjoy that pleasant calm which follows an early cold bath; when, comfortably dressed with the exception of the coat, you sit down to breakfast with a healthy appetite, and a mind at ease. Even in the best-appointed warm bath, the perilous fast of getting in is only exceeded by your slippery fest in getting out; and your only feeling, upon again coming into the air is one of mingling as to whether you ought not rather to be between blankets. So that, we repeat, a country plunge and its results can alone be classed as a luxury in bathing.—Christopher Tadpole.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The 12th of August gives the first blow to the London sporting season; September "goes in and finishes it." Grouse shooting and the heathery highlands are not things for the million but there's scarce a Cockney that relishes the smell of gunpowder who cannot compass a day's practice among the partridges.

People who call to mind Tattersall's as it is towards the latter end of May, when they come up to town to put their pretty things through an annual course of physic, whereof the barley dose forms a prominent item have no idea the sort of place Hyde Park Corner is just before Michaelmas. What a vacuum it was, for instance, on Monday last. In the slee lengths of Piccadilly, not encumbered nothing in the shape of equipage beyond an ancient family chariot trans-porting some pa.e invalid to the doctor's, behind a pair of Hounslow posters, steered by a venerable "boy," whose failure in accomplishing himself to stiff trot, proclaimed how little he had latterly been accustomed to equestrian exercise. Passing a-down the lane, there was no evidence of life; unless, indeed, by the force of a strong imagination you could conceive into such, a group consisting of a hungry-looking dog-fancier, with a brace of lean Scotch terriers, that strived to wag their tails with a appealing look, as they should say

We wish to — that somebody would buy us.

In the Room, the little there was, comprised merely the professional material: a score (so all that effect it) "rod, line, and fly-dem." In the yard, there was no advance on the ten guineas for which the dispenser of lots was offering a steed of aristocratic lineage—fallen—as the scions of gentle blood have before him—on evil days. In either, it was an affair of legs—of bad legs. Those in the Room were put in motion chiefly by the Leamington Stakes; those in the yard by the eloquence of the whipcord so emphatica.ly employed by—we must spare the name of the orator. The venue of the Leger speculation was changed to Warwickshire—apropos of Coventry—as the sequel will show in some cases. Well, shall we, too, speculate a trifle anent the doings which the coming week will give a local habitation to—and baptize a name in the North?

On Wednesday next, the Great St. Leger will be disposed of. According to the popular opinion, as expressed by those horsyglibbs called the Odds, that weight put on the shoulders of a racer ought to be a foregone conclusion. C.sack has been quoted at a price all but unexampled in the annals of turf—confidence it might be discourteous to say credulity. "The horse," says the proverb, "is not always to the swift"—set down, probably as old as the Olympic Games—if not actually founded on data derived from them.

We will test by it the result of the Leger for the last seven years—"seven" shall be our "main" for the nonce. Of the septet, composed of Launcelot, Satirist, Blue Bonnet, Nutwith, Faugh-a-Ballagh, The Baron, and Sir Tatton Sykes, how many saw the day with the prestige of having the shade of the Odds, that ring? Why did Cotherstone lose the Leger? Because the odds were on him; or why else? Was he not the best horse in the field? Can Cossack do better, similarly handicapped—that is to say, carrying a little gold more, in addition to the heat two-year-old of the season—up to the period of the racing year: may it not see the discomfiture of the best three-year-old also? Is Cossack the best? And this is dealing with the possibility of his failure on the merits. What a legion of chances are against him—utterly apart from that hypothesis.

The legitimate patrons of a great national sport will form the Jury in this inquiry. Many causes exist for watching the issue with deep interest. Racing has latterly enjoyed—there is no gainsaying it—"a bad pre-eminence." Should—like too many of its predecessors—the St Leger of 1847 be found wanting in the elements that ought to distinguish a passage of assault among gentlemen, the public voice will pronounce a verdict of dishonour against horse-racing without any hope of mercy. It has become the fashion to require honesty of purpose and practice even in politics; ex nuopre parvis componere; the same principle must henceforth apply to the Turf. Let us trust it may do so right honourably on the trial of Wednesday next, "en re Doncaster."

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—The see-saw game was continued with Lord Eglinton's naga, Van Tromp once more obtaining the call, and leaving off in good estimation. Planet has new a pulse, but had two or three resolute supporters. There are the only changes in the St. Leger, and on the other events the betting was too flat to call for observation.

CRICKET.—ELEVEN OF ENGLAND V. EIGHTEEN OF SHEFFIELD. The match was resumed on Tuesday morning, and was continued to its termination in the presence of some 6000 or 7000 spectators. The play went in one way, and in the result, England found themselves vanquished by seventeen wickets.

SIR C. NAPIER'S SQUADRON.—The official accounts of the few fire-weather trial sailings of Sir C. Napier's squadron give the first place to the 84-gun ship Vengeance, Captain Lushington, one of the improved Canopus class; and the second to the Queen, 110, Captain Sir Henry Leeke. On the 22d ult., Sir Charles Napier hauled down his flag on board the Queen, and on the next day he was to leave Lisbon for the cruising ground off Cape Finisterre. The Amphion, 36, Captain Williams, did not return to Spithead, because her screw machinery is to be taken from her to replace that of the Dragon steam frigate, Captain Hall, were ordered to return thither by the 1st of September. Captain William A. Herringham (1837) is spoken of as likely to be flag captain to Rear-Admiral Sir G. Napier, K.C.B., in command of the Channel fleet, to succeed Captain A. Milne in command of the St. Vincent, the latter gallant officer returning to his duties as flag captain to Sir C. Ogle, Bart., at Portsmouth.

THE SEAMAN CONDEMNED TO DEATH.—The sentence of death on John Connor, seaman of the Agincourt, has been commuted to two years imprisonment, with hard labour.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

A valuable mass of red iron ore has been discovered at Llanharry, near Cowbridge (Wales), on the property of the Rev. T. Cronow. The yield of ore is abundant, and the quality excellent.

A letter has been received by a clergyman in the neighbourhood of Birmingham, in which Lord John Russell has distinctly implied the intention of the Government to appoint a day of thanksgiving for the abundant harvest when the season is more favoured.

The keepers of matrimonial offices in Paris have started a journal under the alluring title of the Harem. It is to serve as a medium of communication between persons who want to get marr ed. It is, in fact, to be an advertising paper for would-be-wives and would-be-husbands.

The Sémaphore de Marseilles states that an extensive house at Genoa has stopped payment, in consequence of enormous losses in corn. The capital involved is stated to be five millions of francs. Many houses in Marseilles are creditors to a considerable amount.

On the 1st of August, when in lat. 35 deg., long. 71 deg., 45 min., the schooner John Howell, Captain William Russell, bound from New York to Florida, caught fire. Captain Allen, of the Pharsalia, of Boston, notwithstand a heavy sea, boarded her, and succeeded in saving the lives of the master, officers, and crew, some of the vessel's stores, sails, &c., and three bags of American gold coin, containing 15,000 dollars, which he landed in Liverpool. Shortly after taking them off the magazine exploded, blowing the vessel up.

Last Saturday the conducting pipes of the Electric Telegraph Company, opening the communication between the central station in Lothbury, now rapidly approaching completion, and all places south of the metropolis, were laid down in King William-street and Princes-street. This Company will open direct lines of communication from this station to fifty of the principal towns in England during the ensuing three months.

The American papers announce the death of Mr. Amos Phelps, the eminent Anti-slavery Advocate. He died at Roxbury, on the 20th July, in the 56th year of his age.

The personal property of the late Admiral Sir Byam Martin has been valued at £120,000; that of Admiral Stopford at £40,000.

The arrangements for enabling the public to prepay the postage on foreign letters by means of stamps, are nearly completed. One shilling stamps will only be issued for the present, and the Post-offices entitled to sell them will be only those in some of the principal towns in the kingdom, until further arrangements can be made. The foreign stamps will be about the size of the penny postage stamps; they will be of an octagonal shape, and the colour of them will be green.

Captain Williams, the Inspector of Prisons for the Midland District, will succeed to the inspectorship of the home district, vacated by the death of Mr. Russell. Captain O'Brien will move from the Scotch district to the midland; and the inspector appointed for the Scotch district is Captain Kincaid, who has for many years been Governor of Bridewell prison.

Mr. Cobden reached St. Petersburg on the 18th ult. A letter has been received from him, dated the 19th, from which it appears that he was then about to set out for Moscow, and that on his return he would visit the great fair of Novogorod. As the Yorkshire election took place on the 7th of August, he would, in all probability, receive at St. Petersburg the first intelligence of that event. Mr. Cobden is expected to return home about the first week in October.

The Skipton extension of the Leeds and Bradford Railway was opened last week. The line runs through a magnificent country, the route presenting a succession of beautiful landscapes, surpassed on few railways in this country. The distance from Keighley to Skipton (about eleven miles) was performed in exactly half an hour.

We are glad to find that the loss of lives from the wreck of the Caution, of Hull, mentioned last week, was by no means so great as was stated. The wreck of the vessel is confirmed, but the number of persons lost does not exceed seventy.

Several letters, addressed to her Majesty from Osborne, have been opened on their transit to Scotland, and a strict investigation is being made to detect the inquisitorial personage who has been prying into the Royal secrets.

According to the last official census of Prussia, it had an entire population of 15,850,000 souls, of whom 9,250,000 were Protestants, 5,800,000 were Catholics, 196,000 Jews, 14,500 Mennonites, and 80,000 Greeks. The Prussian army numbers 115,900 men, of whom 14,950 are of the Royal Guard.

LOBSTER FISHING.—DRAWN BY DUNCAN.

LOBSTER FISHING.

Mr. Duncan has chosen for the locality of this British Fishery, the harbour at Folkestone, where the fishermen in the foremost boat are taking up their creels, or lobster-pots. These creels, or cruives, are made of dry osier, and resemble basket-work. They are constructed on the same principle as the wire mouse-trap, but the aperture, instead of being on the side, is at the top. Within the creel, the bait, consisting of garbage, is fastened at the bottom, and the creel is then dropped in some favourable situation, stones of sufficient weight being fastened in the inside to sink it. A line is fastened to the creel, and at the upper end of the line is attached a cork, which floats on the surface. By this means, the place where the creel is sunk is known to the fishermen, who usually set several creels at one time. The bait is easily seen by the lobsters, which, entering the creel at the aperture, find, like a mouse in a wire-trap, that escape is hopeless; the difficulty of egress being increased by the entrance being overhead. Crabs, prawns, and shrimps, are frequently found captured in the same creel with lobsters. When the fishermen have sunk the whole of their creels, they have still some time left to proceed further out to sea for other fish before it is necessary to visit them. When a few hours have elapsed, the fishermen return to their creels, one of them rowing, and the other keeping a look-out for the floats, and taking out of the creels whatever has been captured. Sometimes, however, lobsters are taken by nets, baited with garbage; and, in some countries, by torch-light, with the aid of a wooden instrument, which acts like a forceps or a pair of tongs. The minimum size of lobsters offered for sale is fixed by 10 and 11 William III., c. 24, at eight inches from the tip of the nose to the end of the middle fin of the tail.

Lobsters are found in great abundance on our rocky coasts. The Scilly Isles and the Land's End abound with lobsters, as well as several places on the Scotch shores, particularly about Montrose, whence Pennant states the number brought annually, in well-boats, in his time, to have been 60,000 or 70,000. But the principal lobster fishery is on the coast of Norway; whence, it is believed, about a million lobsters are annually imported into London. Those of Heligoland are, however, esteemed the best; they are of a deeper black colour, and their flesh is firmer than those brought from Norway. The lobster is of ancient repute as food; for, Aristotle, in his "History of Animals," gives a most faithful and elaborate account of the species which is still an inhabitant of the Mediterranean.

The fecundity of the lobster is profuse, 12,444 eggs having been counted under the tail of one female lobster. "The process of changing the skin, which fishermen have observed to take place, is as follows:—At certain seasons, the shell of the lobster grows soft, the animal swells its body, the seams open, and the claws burst at the joints. When the shell has thus become loose upon the body, the animal makes a second effort, and, by a tremendous spasmodic motion, casts it off. In this state the liberated but defenceless fish retires into holes in the rock. The released body now suddenly pushes its growth. In about eight-and-forty hours, a fresh concretion of humour upon the surface, i. e., a new shell, is formed, adapted in every part to the increased dimensions of the animal."—Paley's Natural Theology, with Notes by Lord Brougham and Sir Charles Bell.

LOBSTER POTS.

The "Great Britain" Steamer.—The inspection of this noble ship has been brought to a close, and all the scientific men who have been engaged in the examination agree in the opinion that she is quite sound, and free from all material damage to her hull. The Liverpool Times says the bottom of the vessel is but slightly injured; the only dings of any consequence being one of about ten feet long, amid ships. The man on board say that this was caused by the working of the vessel during the heavy gales which she encountered in November last. This, however, will be easily repaired, and, with the exception of some few holes and loose rivets, is the only damage done to that part of the vessel—a fact which, considering the exposed situation in which she was stranded, reflects the utmost credit on all the hands connected with her. The upper works and cabins of this noble specimen of naval architecture, as may be anticipated, are much injured, as is the stern, outside stern-post, and all the after end of the vessel, which was more particularly exposed to the roll of the sea as she lay ashore in Dundrum. As yet nothing positive is known as to the intentions of the proprietors with respect to her further and final repairs. In the opinion of many, the great difficulty will be the engine; for it is well known that it has never yet fairly answered the expectations of its constructors. It has, however, been most minutely inspected, and it has been pronounced to be quite as good as ever it was. It was built to work 1000-horse power, but the general impression is, that even with the improved boilers, repaired last summer, it never worked more than 600-horse power, even at its best speed. In addition to this drawback, the indisputable inefficiency of the chain-belt, by which the screw was worked, must itself lead to serious alterations in the engine, if it should again be placed in her. It was a notorious fact, to all who ever crossed the Atlantic in her, that she had to be stopped nearly every day in order to adjust this complicated chain. In fact, we believe, if she had returned safely from her last trip, that two new cog wheels would have been substituted for it, by which it was anticipated that the screw could be more effectively worked.

CRANOE CHURCH.

The foundation-stone of this handsome Church was laid at Cranoe, near Uppingham, Rutland, on the 17th ult., with the usual ceremony upon such occasions, by the Rev. John Harwood Hill, A.B., Rector of Cranoe, in the presence of the Rev. W. Hombersley and Mr. Thomas Foster, the Churchwardens, and the numerous and respectable tenantry of the Earl of Cardigan.

The style of architecture is the Perpendicular of the fifteenth century; the design is by Mr. J. G. Bland, architect, of Dingley. The works are now rapidly progressing, under the superintendence of the eminent builders, Messrs. Thompson and Ruddle, of Peterborough.

The total cost of the whole works will be £1400, and the Church will be completed by Christmas.

The principal subscribers are the Queen Dowager, the Duke of Rutland, the Earls of Cardigan, Howe, Jardwicke, and Gainsborough; Countess of Chichester, Lord Curzon, Bishop of Peterborough, &c.

NEW CHURCH AT CRANOE

SCENE FROM "CYMBELINE," AT SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.

THE THEATRES.

SADLER'S WELLS.

We have engraved a scene from the very successful revival of "Cymbeline," at Sadler's Wells Theatre. It is the second scene of the fourth act—"Before the Cave," in which Belarius, Guaderius, Arviragus, and Imogene enter from the cave, and the heart-sick youth is tended by the hunters:—

> "So sick I am not:—yet I am not well:
> But not so citizen a wanton as
> To seem to die ere sick: so please you, leave me;
> Stick to your journal course: the breach of custom
> Is breach of all. I am ill; but your being by me
> Cannot amend me: Society is no comfort
> To one not sociable: I'm not very sick,
> Since I can reason of it. Pray you, trust me here,
> I'll rob none but myself; and let me die,
> Stealing so poorly."

The play has been repeated with increased effect, since our first notice of the revival.

ADELPHI.

Mr. Stirling Coyne's new extravaganza (brought out on Thursday night), the scene of which is laid at Stratford, of course, derives its temporary interest from the fact of the approaching sale of the Shakspearean house, but would, at any time, pass muster as a good-natured satire upon the notorious deviation of popular taste in other than a Shakspearean direction. The plot anticipates the event at the Auction Mart, and supposes that Mr. Wright, a splendid type of the genus "Gent," has, in order to obtain the celebrity which the giving "spreads," hallooing, extravagant dressing, and other efforts have failed to procure him, purchased the house at Stratford. He resolves (after the manner of divers as respectable enthusiasts) to pass the night in his new purchase, and goes to sleep in a huge box in the room in which the poet is said to have been born. Shakspeare appears, capitally personated by O. Smith, and summons around him his principal creations; and their dialogue, liberally intermixed with parodied songs, contains hits at everybody in any way connected with the legitimate or illegitimate drama. After half an hour's mirth, much relished by the house, Ariel warns off the apparitions, and the Gent, who has been an astonished partaker of the revel, disappears into his box, to be awakened anon in reples.

A kind of apotheosis of Shakspeare, with a pretty scene, and plenty of blue fire, ends the piece. Wright, who has the only part in the affair, played quietly and quaintly, and was encored in a parody, entitled "I'm a Gent." The extravaganza was applauded; and, as a pièce de circonstance, will answer its purpose.

The Marylebone Theatre has been well attended since our last. Sheridan Knowles's charming play of the "Hunchback" has been produced in an excellent manner, as regards scenery and appointments. The characters, from first to last, are well filled; Mrs. Warner's Julia, Miss Angell's Helen, Mr. Graham's Master Walter, and Mr. Vining's Clifford, being entitled to special commendation. The Observer critic, by the way, describes the locale of this theatre as "in the north-western suburb of the metropolis, on a portion of the estate once held by the Knights Hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem, in the centre of a district used in the days of Elizabeth as a 'Royal Chase,' and where, as late as the reign of the last George but one, footpads harboured, and highwaymen were frequent."

Astley's.—A stupendous novelty is announced for this theatre—a very fine male elephant, brought by Captain Stevens, in the ship Persia, from Ceylon.

The season for al fresco entertainments is drawing to a close. The Director's Benefit has been given at Vauxhall.—At the Surrey Zoological Gardens, an ingenious native of Alabama, U.S., has constructed a "magic aerial bridge" across the sheet of water at the back of the orchestra, the supports of which taper to one inch square, in the centre of the water-way; yet, upon the foot-tread laid on this, thirteen or fourteen persons cross at once in safety: the "magic" being the application of the longitudinal fibre of the wood, so that every portion supports an equal share of the strain.—At Cremorne Gardens, there was a night balloon ascent, with fireworks, on Monday; the aeronauts being Messrs. Gale, Coxwell, and Gonlston, who, after a pleasant journey, descended in safety, on Thornton Heath, near Croydon.

There have been Shakspearean Lectures given in various parts of the country; in some cases with the view of aiding the subscription for purchasing Shakspeare's House. At a performance, which had not this inducement, given in the Council Chamber, at Hertford, on Monday evening, there were but two persons present!

LIEUTENANT MUNRO.

We this week give a portrait of Lieutenant Munro, and with it some authentic particulars of his family and personal history, with respect to which the most erroneous statements have been published; in the different versions that have been given, Lieutenant Munro has been confounded with other persons, and represented as doing things of which he was not conscious. To correct these errors, he had, by the advice of his solicitor, drawn up a rough sketch of his father's services and his own career, which was to have been placed in the hands of Mr. Clarkson, the eminent Counsel, to be used in his defence, on the late trial; but the documents were not ready till too late, and, in fact, were not used. We have been favoured with a perusal of these documents, and are thus enabled to publish the only authentic details of the life of Lieut. Munro that has yet appeared. The first is a brief sketch of the military services of his father:—

Lieutenant John Munro went to the East Indies about 1785, in the 73d Regiment, which had been recently raised in Scotland by Lord Macleod, and was known as the Macleod Highlanders. The regiment was called, soon after its arrival at Madras, to the performance of very arduous duties in the field, and served in those campaigns under the command of Sir Eyre Coote, Sir Hector Munro, the Marquis Cornwallis, and Lord Harris. It took a very prominent part in the numerous battles, sieges, and operations directed against Hyder Ali, Tippoo Saib, and their allies, including the French, at subsequent periods of the war.

Lieut. John Munro was present in all the battles and sieges in which his regiment took part for ten years after its arrival in India, and distinguished himself during that period by many acts of the most devoted gallantry, which have been certified by the testimony of officers under whom he served, and are well known in the north of Scotland from the accounts given of them by many persons who knew him in India. Of his bravery, as shown whenever he had an opportunity, the following is an example. At the storming of Bangalore, when the assault was checked, and the officer who commanded it—a Lieut. Duncan—cut off from his men by several of the enemy, Lieutenant Munro singly cleared a way to Lieutenant Duncan's aid. The officer in command of the fort was killed, our troops were able to enter the breach, and the fortress was carried. Lieutenant Duncan made a very gratifying report of the services of Munro to the officer in command, and always acknowledged that he owed his life to him, and that his gallant conduct was of the greatest benefit as an example. Lieutenant Munro was afterwards known in his regiment by the name of the above fortress.

In the various battles, sieges, and other affairs with the enemy in which Lieut. Munro took part in India, he received several severe wounds; his lower front teeth were shot out; he lost the use of his left arm by a cannon shot; he was severely ruptured in his exertions to enter a breach, the scaling ladders being too short; he was shot in the shoulder and thigh; he received, besides, various other injuries by splinters from cannon shot; he was nearly blown up in action, by an explosion of powder, and had, besides, many extraordinary escapes from being killed in the other battles, sieges, and assaults in which he was engaged.

Lieutenant Munro was sent home after a service of ten years in India, his health severely injured from the effects of the very severe and long-continued fatigues he had undergone in a hot climate; the wound in his arm did not heal for a considerable time afterwards, and he was in a most precarious and shattered condition. He had received very ample testimonials of his gallant conduct in India, from the Marquis Cornwallis, and other officers under whom he had served there; and, upon his arrival in London, he presented them at the Horse Guards, and was soon after promoted by the Duke of York for his gallantry. From the serious nature of Lieutenant Munro's wounds he was unable to serve again in the field after his return from India, but he did duty, at various times, to the end of the, war, in garrisons in Great Britain, Ireland, and the Channel Islands.

Lieutenant John Munro married a few years after his return from India, and settled his family at Fain, in Ross-shire. He had a large family, of whom there are still living three sons and six daughters, and his widow.

The following is abridged from a paper also drawn up, for the purpose above mentioned, by Lieut. Munro himself:—

My attachment to the Army has existed from my boyhood, or even my childhood. My father was a magistrate in Ross-shire, for many years after he left or retired from the service, and he often had to give certificates to pensioners, to enable them to draw their pensions: those of them who had served with my father in India had a bed made for them in our house, when they came from a distance for their certificates, and they were in the habit of repeating to me upon these occasions, the accounts of the various battles, sieges, and skirmishes, in which they had been engaged, and particularly those in which my father had distinguished himself; and thus I became fond of the service.

My father encouraged my attachment to the army, and I was always destined in my youth, for that service. A General Officer, who was a most kind friend to my family, offered my father to get me appointed to an Ensigncy in his own regiment, but it was considered by him that I was too young at the time, and indeed I had not then left school. When I became old enough for the service, I could not obtain a commission, in consequence of the numbers of young officers that had been put upon half-pay on account of the peace. Many applications were made for me, but the answers were always the same, viz., that it was quite out of the question for some time. When I found that there was no hope of getting them into the army, I went out to the West Indies, but I still kept urging my friends to get me a commission. I also knew that they continued to endeavour to meet my views in that respect; and after I had been in Grenada between two and three years, I heard that there was to be an augmentation of some regiments to the strength of the army, and, for fear of losing a chance of getting appointed to one of them, I took a passage for England by the first opportunity that offered. Upon my arrival in London, I was greatly discouraged by learning that the regiments were completed to their establishments; but I soon made a personal application at the Horse Guards for an Ensigncy. I was very kindly received, the Duke of York acknowledging that I had claims on account of my father's services; but as I had not been noted when applications had been previously made for me, I was told, by Sir Herbert Taylor, that it would be at least two years before I could be appointed to a regiment; I was at the same time advised to return to Scotland to my friends until I got an Ensigncy; but I knew that I had put my father to more expense than he could well afford, with his limited income and large family, in fitting me out for the West Indies, and I would not upon any account add to his embarrassments. My friends in the West Indies also pressed me strongly, before leaving them, to return to them, and that my services should be attended to by them if I did not get a commission; but I declined doing either, and resolved, if I could obtain the sanction of the Duke of York, to enlist into one of the new regiments in the Household Brigade, for the purpose of learning my duty more intimately (as I imagine), and being thereby qualified to become a more useful officer than I might otherwise be. The Duke of York intimated his consent to my plan through Sir Herbert Taylor, and I was promised a commission at a favourable opportunity. I had the good fortune to enter one of the best regiments in the service, viz., the Royal Horse Guards; it was also commanded at the time by one of the kindest-hearted men I ever knew—the late Major-General Clement Hill. I had also a very kind Captain, Colonel William Lennox, who took a good deal of interest about me, and does so, I believe, to the present day. Still there was much to be gone through that very few people can form a correct idea of, unless they should happen to have adopted my mode of proceeding to obtain a commission; but I believe that very few have done so. However, I did my duty to the utmost of my ability, and I believe I gave satisfaction to those placed over me; at any rate, I know I tried to do so. Soon after I had learned my exercise, I was promoted to be a non-commissioned officer. I was selected at the recommendation of the Sergeant-Major, and continued to train men for my regiment for several years afterwards, during which time I was gradually rising in the usual way of rotation among the non-commissioned officers; and I also believe I then acquired the goodwill of all the regiment. I was considered qualified as to my knowledge of drill and military exercises by the opportunities time afforded me, and I lost no opportunity of improving my knowledge of the profession I had made choice of. When I had been about six years and a half in the Royal Horse Guards, an opportunity occurred for me obtaining the Adjutancy of the regiment, which my commanding officer was very anxious that I should succeed him in. I then obtained the Ensigncy that had been promised to me by the Duke of York, for my father's services, but I had to pay the difference of the value between an Ensign's commission in the line, which was worth £400, and a Cornet's commission in the Blues, which cost £1200. My father was struck with paralysis when he heard that I had lost my commission; and the fine old soldier's grey hairs were driven to the grave with sorrow by the misfortunes of his son; and my poor wife and mother have been nearly at times out of their senses by the misfortunes and ruin that have overtaken us.

MUSIC.

MUSICAL TOURS.—Mdlle. Lind is by this time delighting the amateurs in Scotland. Her last engagement is for two concerts in Norwich, at the end of this month, when she leaves England for Berlin. Grisi, Mario, and Tamburini, Hatton, with Lavenu as accompanist, sang at an evening concert on the 7th at Newcastle-on-Tyne, and on the 8th at Berwick-on-Tweed. On the 9th, they were to sing at an evening concert at Glasgow, and on the next evening at Edinburgh. On the 13th they will sing at Liverpool, on the 14th at Manchester, and on the 16th at a morning concert at Chester, terminating their tour. Grisi and Mario then depart for Paris, to begin the campaign at the Théâtre Italien, on the 1st of October. Tamburini goes to St. Petersburg, where he will remain until the opening of the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, in the spring. Mdlle. Alboni, Mdlle. Corbari, the bajo cantoo Rovère, with Mr. Lindsey Sloper, as pianist and accompanyist, have been very successful in their concerts at the principal towns in Ipswich, Bury St. Edmunds, Nottingham, and Sheffield, were brilliant attended. The Concert, by the Philharmonic Society, on Thursday week, was most fashionably patronised. On Friday morning they sang at Leicester, and on Saturday morning at Wakefield. Last Monday night, they gave a Concert in Derby. On Tuesday, an evening Concert; on Wednesday, at Leeds; on Thursday, at Newcastle-under-Lyne; last night (14th), at Carlisle; and this night, at Kendal. On the 13th and 14th, they join the Grisi-Mario party in Concerts at Liverpool and Manchester. On the 16th, they go to Shrewsbury; on the 17th, to Burmingham; and on the 18th the tour will be finished by a morning concert at Leamington. Rovère will then depart for Barcelona (Spain), where he will remain until he returns to the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, in March. Mdlle. Corbari joins the Italian troupe in Paris, returning with them to Covent Garden at Leamington. Mr. Wilson is singing in the south of England. The Distin family have been at St. Leonard's and Hastings. Mr. Willy has been giving Promenade Concerts in Rochester. Signor Zerulini has given a Concert at Tunbridge Wells. Mr. Lover, the Irish singer, and Sivori, the violinist, are still travelling in the United States, where Charles Horn, the composer, is about to return. Mr. Mauvers, the tenor, and his daughter, Miss Mauvers, with Signor A. Guglini, are also about to take a Transatlantic trip, in imitation of the Seguins.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.—The following artistes have signed engagements with Mr Bunn, for the season 1848:—Mdme. Grisi, Mdme. Persiani, Mdlle. Castellan, Mdlle. Alboni, Mdlle. Steffanoni, Mdlle. Corbari, and Mdme. Bosoni, Signori Mario, Salvi, and Lavia (tenors); Ron oni, Tamburini (barigones); Mariel, Tagliafico, Polonini, and Rovère (basses). Negociations are pending with other singers of not .

THE GLOUCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—Mr Arnott, the conductor, is actively engaged with the Committee of Management, in making preparations for this meeting of the three choirs. The principal vocalists will be:—Mdme. Caradori-Allan, Mdlle. Albini, Mrs. Weiss (late Miss Barrett, who is a native of Gloucester), Miss Dolby, a d the sisters Misses A. and M. Williams; Messrs. Lockey, T. Williams, Weiss, Herr Standigl, and facetious John Parry. There will be four sacred Morning Performances in the Cathedral, and three Evening Concerts, at the Shire Hall: a Ball, terminating the meeting on Friday evening. Mendelssohn's "Elijah" and Handel's "Messiah" will be the leading features of the sacred selection.

DRURY LANE THEATRE.—There have been divers statements as to the plans of M. Jullien for the operatic campaign; but, until the return of the composer from Milan, it will be impossible to give a correct list of the artistes engaged. Many names already announced will be found to be erroneous. Berlioz is certainly the musical Director and Conductor.

PRINCESS' THEATRE.—We believe it is now arranged that Mdme Thillon will sing at this theatre in November.

SURREY THEATRE.—Mr. Bunn is actively engaged in preparing for his forthcoming op. ratic campaign at this establishment.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—Like a prudent general, Mr. Lumley keeps his plans secret until they are ripe for execution; but the re-appearance of Mdlle. Lind has been officially announced—a fact enough to stamp the season 1848 with intense interest.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.

The opening of the Parisian Académie Royale has been announced for the 16th, but we learn that it is not likely to take place before the 13th or 15th. Halevy's "Juive" will be the opening work; in which Duprez, it is anticipated, will create a great sensation; his bepos of six months having restored his voice in a great measure. Halevy has composed a new pas de cinq, in which Mdlles. Dumilatre, Maria, Fleury, and Forster, are to dance. "Charles the Sixth," of Halevy, will be the next opera, in which Mdlle. Lutzenon will play Isabella of Bavaria, with a new air composed for her by Halevy. Barroilhet appears in "Charles the Sixth," "Robert le Diable," and the "Huguenots," of Meyerbeer, entirely remounted, are in preparation. Miss Birch is to make her début in Adelaide, in Rossini's "William Tell." Verdi's new opera is to be called "Jerusalem." It is by them based upon Donizetti's "Lombardi," adapted for the French singers. There is to be a divertissement in the third act in the seraglio, the music for which is to be set for the Sax-horns.

The interior of the house is white and gold, with crimson draperies, as at our Royal Italian Opera, Covent-Garden. The old drop scene, representing the presentation of the patent for the Grand Opera to Lulli, by Louis XIV. remains, but the ceiling, by M. Cicéri, is entirely clearing, as a subject, Orpheus presenting the celebrated musicians to the Gods of Olympus.

Meyerbeer has returned to Berlin in excellent health. Spontini, the composer, is in Paris.

Madame Viardot Garcia is at her country seat, near Paris. She is engaged at Berlin for three months, from January next. She is not engaged at Drury-Lane Theatre, as has been stated.

Mdlle. Steffanoni and the basso, Signor Marini, are engaged at the Pergola, in Florence, up to the period of their return to London in the spring.

Lablache and Tagliafico returned to Paris, for the Italian Opera season.

Wallace, the composer, is in Vienna; and Benedict in Stuttgardt. Balfe, after his tour with Mdlle. Lind, goes to Paris. Costa is about to make a tour in Germany.

MDLLE. ALBONI.—The success of this great contralto in the provinces has been tremendous. The most rapturous encores have attended her "Una voce" the Tyrolese air from "Rudy," "In questo semplice"—the Drinking Song, from "Lucrezia," "I segreto," &c. She sings at the Gloucester Festival on the 21st instant, and then leaves for Pesth, in Hungary; after which she goes to Italy, and returns for Covent Garden in April.

MR. AND MADAME OURY.—This violinist and his cara sposa, the celebrated pianiste, were expressly invited from Brighton to attend a musical party given by the Duke and Duchess of Somerset at their mansion in Park-lane, on Tuesday last, when the Prince and Princess Doria Pamphili (previous to their return to Rome), the Duchess of Inverness, and a select family circle, were entertained at dinner.

MADAME BISHOP.—This vocalist appeared at the Park Theatre in New York, on the 4th of August, in an English version of Donizetti's "Linda." She was well received, but the critics are divided as to her talents.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—The stoppage of another old established firm in the corn trade was announced this morning. The liabilities are stated at £100,000. During the present week, and fresh up to-day, the arrivals of English wheat have been on a very limited scale The attendance of both town and country buyers being good and most of the provincial markets a-ding higher, the demand for all kinds of wheat, of home produce, was to-day quick, in some instances, selected qualities sold at an advance of 1s per quarter. At the close of business a good clearance was effected. The imports of foreign wheat continue large Very fine parcels were held for more money, but the middling and inferior kinds were neglected, though offered at late rates Very few samples of English barley were on show Sales progressed slowly for a blanch, at Monday's figures. The malt trade was in a very inactive state, and prices had a downward tendency. Malt from foreign ports was more than supplied, yet, as the dealers are short of stores, the trade was firm at full currencies Beans, peas, Indian corn, and flour as last noticed

ARRIVALS.—English, wheat, 3480; barley, 4761; oats, 200 quarters. Irish wheat, ——; barley ——; oats, ——. Foreign wheat, 12,100; barley ——, oats, 36,710 Flour, 3,720 sacks and 1,964 barrels. Malt, 2570 quarters

MARK LANE.—Wheat, sales and prices of 44s to 52s duto, white 50s to 56s. North and midland, rod 44s to 48s; ditto white 52s 52s, 53s to 58s grinding barley 22s to 30s distilling 32s to 34s; malting ditto, 32s to 34s. Malt, fine 72s to 74s, fine pale, 68s to 70s, brown, 60s to 64s, Kingston and Ware, 68s to 70s. Chevalier, 68s to 72s. Tarbeans and pigeons white 37s to 39s; boilers, 34s to 36s; Tyneside and Cork black, 32s to 34s; grey peas, white 37s to 39s; maple, 34s to 36s; ditto, ditto, old, 40s to 42s, grey peas, 32s to 34s, rus, 42s to 43s; white, 42s to 47s, boilers, 45s to 50s, per quarter. Town-made flour, 38s to 40s; Suffolk, 36s to 38s Stockton, 34s; Yorkshire, 32s to 36s per 280 lbs. Foreign.—Barley, red wheat, —s to —s; white, —s to —s; barley, —s to —s; beans, —s to —s; oats, —s to —s. Foreign, red, —s to —s; extra, —s; white, —s to —s; extra, —s. Flour, —s to —s per barrel.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread, in the metropolis, are from 7½d to 8d; of household ditto, 6½d to 7d per 4lb loaf

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 36s 8d; barley, 30s 3d; oats, 25s 8d; rye, 32s 9d; beans, 35s 7d; peas, 34s 3d

The Six Weeks' Average.—Wheat, 46s 6d, barley, 40s 5d; oats, 32s 9d; rye, 42s 8d; beans, 45s 7d; peas, 44s 3d

THE.—The market has ruled very steady, since our last report, and prices are well supported in every description. The stock in bond continues to be reasonably moderate.

Sugar.—The best qualities of raw sugar are in good request, at full prices. In other kinds, consumptive demand is dull, and barely fully supported. Refined goods.—the supply of which is large.—are rather dull, at 54s to 56s 6d for brown, and 56s 6d to 58s 6d for fine and double refined.

Coffee.—Most descriptions move off slowly, but we can notice no actual decline in the quotations.

Rice.—Although the business done is by no means extensive, the importers are firm at the quotations given in our last. Sales to the trade have been moderate.

Provisions.—We have had to contend with a steady demand for Irish butter, at an advance in the quotations of 2s to 4s per cwt. Foreign qualities have ruled firm, and the deliveries this year have been upwards of 100,000 casks more than during the same period in 1846. Carlow and Waterford, 90s to 92s; Cork, Limerick, and Kinsale, 90s to 94s; Waterford, 90s to 94s, Cork, 84s to 88s. In bacon, sales rule dull at a decline of 2s per cwt. Prime mild cured pork is in good request, and has been supported steadily, at late prices. Mess, new, 70s to 72s; Waterford, 68s to 70s; Limerick, 67s to 69s; and Waterford, 66s to 68s per barrel. Dutch butter, 90s to 92s per cwt. Belgian, 84s to 86s. Fine Dorset, 100s to 104s, middling ditto, 94s to 96s per cwt. Hams, fine, 60s to 64s; middling ditto, 52s to 56s per cwt. Irish, 44s to 48s per cwt. Lard, fine, 48s per cwt. A few new hams and bacon of Waterford and Limerick curing arrived for prime sale. Bale and tierce middles are in limited request and the turn over The same may be said of lard. Fine land is quite as dear. In consequence of the Irish make of pork, we have very few to report.

Tallow.—The markets operate with considerable caution, and prices are not supported. P. A. C on the spot is almost nominal at 46s 6d; and, for the last three months, 45s 6d per cwt. The imports are large

Oils The market is tolerably firm, at full prices

Hops (Friday).—Several parcels of new hops have come to hand this week from Kent and Sussex, in improved condition. The enquiry for them is by no means active, and the prices have ruled unchanged to range from 40s to 5s or £8 per cwt. As picking is now becoming general, a large supply may be shortly expected here; but, judging from the plantation accounts, as a whole, we are led to the conclusion that the produce will not be a very large one The duty is ratled from £.85,000 to £.90,000 Old hops are in limited request, and the quantity of what is good and fine sells at prices not supported

Monthly Wool Sales.—Messrs. Perkins, Bell, and Co. to the 4th inst.—Kent ditto, 8d to 9d; Sussex ditto, 8d to 9d; East Kent, 10d to 11d per wt

Public Wool Sales.—Messrs. Cresswell, Weston, 21st inst., Hough Hall, 22nd inst., Brown's Deanery, 23d, Ingworth, 28th inst., and Hooper's, Hurtle, 29th inst.

Smithfield Cattle Market (Monday).—Most of the Scots, which arrive this week, having arrived in the course of the previous week, are of rather a superior quality, and sell readily at full prices. Other breeds are in moderate supply, and the trade is steady, at late rates. Prime Scots, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; second quality ditto, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; prime Downs, 4s 4d; and prime Herefords, Devons, and Shorthorns, 4s 2d per 8lb. The number of sheep on sale is moderate, and the demand is steady, at full prices. Prime Southdown wethers, 4s 8d to 4s 10d; prime ewes, 4s 6d to 4s 8d; prime Leicesters, 4s 4d to 4s 6d; prime half-breds, 4s 6d to 4s 8d; and prime Scots, 4s 4d per 8lb. Calves are in good supply, and the trade is steady, at full prices. Prime calves, 4s 6d to 4s 8d per 8lb. Pigs are in fair supply, and the demand is steady, at late rates. Prime bacon pigs, 3s 4d to 3s 6d per 8lb.

Newgate and Leadenhall (Friday).—Prime beef and mutton sold freely, at full prices. Other kinds of meat were in a very dull state, at a decline of 2d per 8lb on the quotations.—Middling beef, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; prime large ditto, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; prime small ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; large pork, 3s 8d to 4s 8d; middling ditto, 4s 0d to 4s 2d; prime ditto, 4s 4d to 4s 6d; veal, 3s 8d to 4s 10d; small pork, 4s 8d to 4s 10d; lamb, 6s 6d to 8s 10d.

ROBT. HERBERT.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

There is little new to be recorded with regard to the Money Market. Confidence is not restored, and the difficulty of obtaining accommodation is more the result of doubt, than the absence of capital. The only unfavourable list of failures last week, must be added the firms of Gemmell Brothers, of Glasgow; Sanders, Wetherall, and Co., of Stockton-on-Tees; and Booker and Son. The business of Thomas Burnell and Co. is resumed. Some draughts on foreign accounts alone have been refused.

James Morris, Esq., has been elected Governor of the Bank of England, and Henry James Prescott, Esq., Deputy-Governor.

The English Market on Monday was very inanimate, a fluctuation of one-eighth being the only variation of the day. Consols closed at 87⅞ to ⅛ for Money, and 87⅞ to ⅜ for the Account. Although little more firmness was perceptible on Tuesday; the tendency was evidently downwards, and the market closed almost ¼ per cent worse than on the preceding day. The Market on Wednesday was again flat, and although Consols remained for Account at 87⅞, buyers, after a slight rally, the closing price was only 87⅝. Prices on Thursday were a shade in advance at the opening, but fatness prevailed, and, at the close of business, quotations were again worse than on the previous day. No difference in the rate of discount was effected. At the following prices market for Redeemed 87⅛; New Three and a Quarter per Cents, 89; Bank Stock, 195; India Bonds, 2 to 3 dis. Exchequer Bills 4 to 7 premium for large, and 14 to 10 for small. Consols for Account, 87⅛

The only feature of interest in the Foreign Market during the week has been the fluctuations in Mexican, which, on Monday, advanced from 18½ to 19½. On Tuesday, a further improvement was made, and 20 was marked, but 19½ to ¾ was the closing price. This point was maintained on Wednesday, and on Thursday, 19½ to 20 was the current quotation. Transactions in the other Securities have been on the most limited scale. Spanish has been but little dealt in, the nominal closing price being as hitherto. Brazilian every day more apparent Prices rather improved on Thursday; but the following list is almost nominal from absence of transactions. Spanish Actives, 29½; Three per Cents, 30⅜ to 30½ Portuguese Four per Cents, 25¾; Brazilian, 90¾; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 55¾, Four per Cent Certificates, 86

The Share Market continues heavy, with a disinclination to deal. The following is the closing prices offered for the leading shares, as sales could not be made to any extent at the rates recorded: Caledonian, 31½; Eastern Counties, 1⅛; Dutto, York Extension, 8½; East Lincolnshire, 10½; Edinburgh and Glasgow, half Shares, 17½; Great Northern, 25; Ditto, London and York Exte sion, 1½; Great North of England, 220; Great Western, 107; Ditto, New, 87½, half Shares and Scrip, 101; Lancashire and Yorkshire Six Per Cents, 143; Leeds and Bradford, 143; Leeds & Bradf, 94½; Leeds and Thirsk, New, 2½; Preference, 6 per Cts, 2½; London and Blackwall, 5⅞; London, Brighton, and South Coast, 45½; Ditto, Consolidated Eighths, 16⅜, London and North Western Shares, 164 ½; Preference, 3 per Cent, Ditto, ditto, New, 10⅛; Ditto, Fifths, 13; Ditto 40 Shares M. and B. 65; London and South Western, 60½; Ditto, New, 25⅝, 34; Ditto, New, £40, 29⅝; Manchester, Buxton, and Mat, 4⅞; Midland, 16⅜; Ditto, New, 10⅜; Ditto, Bristol and Birmingham, 6 per Ct., 193; Newcastle and Berwick, 32; Ditto, New, 8; Northern Counties Union, 4; North British, 29; Do. Half Shares, 18½; Do. Thirds, 1½; North Staffordshire, 9½; Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton, 17; Reading, Gui ford, and Reigate, 8; Scottish Central, 27; Shrewsbury and Birmingham, Class A, 4½, Shropshire Union, 14; South-Eastern and Dover, 34½; Ditto No. 2, 13½; Do., 4, 8½; Wilts, Somerset, and Weymouth, 11; York and Newcastle, 35; Do. Extension, 14½; Do. Preference, 11; York and North Midland, Preference, 13½; Namur and Liege, 5½; Northern of France, 10½; Paris and Lyons, 3½; Paris and Rouen, 36½; Rouen and Havre, 22¼.

SATURDAY MORNING.—The Money Market was flat yesterday, and Consols were quoted somewhat lower than on Thursday. The opening price was 87⅜ to ½ for Account, and 87⅛ to ¼ for Money, but they receded to 87¼ for the Account, and 87 to ⅛ for Money. The other stocks were not active. The Three and a Quarter per Cents, 89; Bank Stock, 194½ to 7, India Bonds, 2 to 3 dis., Exchequer Bills, 4 to 7 premium. There was no alteration of importance to notice in the Foreign Market. Another failure is announced on the Corn Exchange, a highly respectable firm, whose suspension of payment has, it is said, been caused by the inability of others, with whom they were connected, to meet their engagements. The liabilities are about £120,000.

DEPARTURE OF PRINCE WALDEMAR OF PRUSSIA.—Prince Waldemar of Prussia, accompanied by Baron Lauer Munchusen and Count Groeben, has left England, on his return to Germany. The Prince embarked at Ramsgate yesterday, for Ostend. Prince Waldemar intends, on leaving Ostend, to go by way of Ghent and Antwerp to Coblentz, there to meet the King of Prussia. His Royal Highness, previous to quitting London, expressed his deep sense of the cordial reception he had met with while sojourning in this country.

THE PLAYERS;

OR, THE STAGE OF LIFE.

BY C. J. SEELE, ESQ.

"There is a complicated dramatic plot and a profound mystery in the novel, which are wrought through many successive and highly exciting scenes, and engage a considerable number of actors. These Mr Seele handles with the skill of an experienced artist, and the talent of a man of reading and keen observation. But, the distinguishing feature of the book is its pictures of the player's life."—Literary Gazette.

Orders by post executed within two hours of the receipt.—A large assortment of Oil and Candle Lamps, Chimney Glasses, of the newest patterns, always in stock

FOR EXPORTATION.—NIGHT LIGHTS.—The breakage and uncertain burning of rushlights render them useless. The dirt, smoke, and stink from oil, is very disagreeable. The inconvenience in not being able to move the common moreen after being fixed and [illegible] for the paper table fire, have been extremely dangerous articles, and should not be used. All these defects are remedied in CLARKE'S PATENT MORAIN PALM OIL and LAMP SUBSTANCE, which will not soften in the hottest climate, give more than the light of all matters with paper round them, can be carried without straightening the light, and have neither smell nor smoke. Persons burning night-lights should not use any other. The Lamps are made in japanned, gilt, and bronze metal, plain, coloured, and beautifully painted glass, and in papier mache. Each lamp, with moreen, 7s. per box, May be obtained wholesale and retail at the Patentee's Lamp Manufactory, 55, Albany-street, Regent's-park.

WHY has SEA-BATHING its Disagreeable Effect upon the Skin.—Sea Water contains a large proportion of Mineral Substances, also of a fatty, oily matter, the decomposition of the vegetable and animal bodies, bodies with which the sea abounds; it is this change from the open seasalt element to the human body, with all the mineral substances, disfigure and injure it, their presence will, in time, by pores the capillary circulation. It is, therefore, indispensable to the health of the body that it should be thoroughly cleaned after sea-bathing. Oils and greases for the purpose are worse than inoperative, and [illegible] non-evaporating cleansers are dangerous. The use of DR. CHURCHER'S PERSERVATIVE HAIR-WASH will be found the best agent. It instantly removes everything objectionable from both skin and hair. For Softening, Embellishing, and Restoring Beauty to the Hair, CHURCHER'S COMPOUND CREAM stands at the head of its class. It is a rich, fragrant preparation, and a great favourite with all who have used it. [illegible] may be had of all Perfumers and Chemists, and at the Proprietor's Establishment, [illegible] London. The WASH, in Bottles, at 2s. 6d. and 4s. 6d. each; the CREAM, in Boxes, at 2s. 6d. and 5s. each.

RESTORATIVE FOR THE HAIR.—Many a Gentleman [illegible] whose head was rapidly losing its natural ornament has, by the use of OLDRIDGE'S BALM OF COLUMBIA, recovered his locks, and finds them clustering on his manly brow and luxuriance, and many an elegant woman who was drooping at the diminution of her most valuable decoration, has, by applying this active restorative, regained a salutary vigour to her tresses, which now flow in their wavy and voluptuous [illegible] 2s. 6d., 6s., and 11s. per bottle; or [illegible] Balm, 1, Wellington-street, the second house from the Strand

TO LADIES.—On the drive, the ride, the promenade, or the equestrian-room, Ladies should ever be provided with ROWLAND'S KALYDOR, which will be found admirably refreshing to the complexion, dispelling the cloud of languor and relaxation, allaying all irritability and heat, and immediately affording the pleasing sensation attendant on restored elasticity and healthful state of the skin. As a preservative of the Hair, Rowland's Macassar Oil will be found alike efficacious, guarding it from [illegible]

 It is highly necessary on purchasing to see that the word "ROWLAND" precedes each of the above articles.

NEW PATENT OIL.—G. M. CLARKE begs respectfully to call the attention of the Nobility and Gentry to his New Patent Oil, called the PALM OIL LAMP OIL, prize 3s. per gallon. The Lamps formed for burning it are so fine that Sperm, at little more than half the price. It will burn in any lamp, is very pale, free from smell, and is the most extreme quality, and will not require half the size ring of any other, and warranted never to injure the lamps. Can be obtained only at the Patented Lamp and Candle Manufactory, 55, Albany-street, Regent's Park. Orders by post executed within two hours of the receipt.—A large assortment of Oil and Candle Lamps, Chimney Glasses, of the newest patterns, always in stock

FOR EXPORTATION.—NIGHT LIGHTS.—The breakage and uncertain burning of rushlights render them useless. The dirt, smoke, and stink from oil, is very disagreeable. The inconvenience in not being able to move the common moreen after being fixed and [illegible] for the paper table fire, have been extremely dangerous articles, and should not be used. All these defects are remedied in CLARKE'S PATENT MORAIN PALM OIL and LAMP SUBSTANCE, which will not soften in the hottest climate, give more than the light of all matters with paper round them, can be carried without straightening the light, and have neither smell nor smoke. Persons burning night-lights should not use any other. The Lamps are made in japanned, gilt, and bronze metal, plain, coloured, and beautifully painted glass, and in papier mache. Each lamp, with moreen, 7s. per box, May be obtained wholesale and retail at the Patentee's Lamp Manufactory, 55, Albany-street, Regent's-park.

WHY has SEA-BATHING its Disagreeable Effect upon the Skin.—Sea Water contains a large proportion of Mineral Substances, also of a fatty, oily matter, the decomposition of the vegetable and animal bodies, bodies with which the sea abounds; it is this change from the open seasalt element to the human body, with all the mineral substances, disfigure and injure it, their presence will, in time, by pores the capillary circulation. It is, therefore, indispensable to the health of the body that it should be thoroughly cleaned after sea-bathing. Oils and greases for the purpose are worse than inoperative, and [illegible] non-evaporating c

TESTIMONIAL TO MDLLE. JENNY LIND.

THIS superb Testimonial has been presented to Jenny Lind by Mr. Lumley, "as a tribute of respect for her genius and noble qualities, which have secured the enthusiastic admiration of England." The entablature which contains this inscription records Mdlle. Lind's arrival in England on the 17th of April, 1847, and her first appearance at Her Majesty's Theatre on the 4th of May, 1847.

The Testimonial is of pure silver, dead and bright, nearly three feet in height; the composition consists of a pillar, wreathed with laurel, at the foot of which are seated three draped figures, representing Tragedy, Comedy, and Music; standing on the pillar is a figure personifying Genius. The subject has been treated with great skill; and the figures are beautifully modelled. It has been manufactured by Messrs. Storr and Mortimer. "The cost of this Testimonial," says the Art Union, "has been considerable; it is a liberal gift; but it will be valued far beyond its actual worth, as one of many proofs received by the accomplished lady that her estimable character and high moral worth, as well as her lofty genius, have been appreciated in England. She will leave this country with feelings of more than ordinary respect and affection: her reception here has sunk deep into her heart—the more so, perhaps, because it far exceeded in warmth her expectations; and, although her present intention is not to appear again upon any stage, except that of Stockholm, we trust that the impressions made upon her mind and heart by the earnest cordiality of the English people, and the continued courtesy and liberality of the lessee of Her Majesty's Theatre, will induce her again to visit a country to which she expresses herself fervently and gratefully attached." We are happy to learn that, since the above was written, the engagement of Mdlle. Lind, for the next season, at Her Majesty's Theatre, has been definitively arranged.

THANKSGIVING FOR THE HARVEST

(A RECENT SCENE.)

The sun shines bright on Göttingen,
On forest, field, and stream;
The spire and tow'r and urban bow'r
Glow in the blended beam.
And 'tis the Sabbath's hallow'd morn,
Sacred to praise and prayer,
Which should divest the human breast
Of every mundane care.

The bells have rung their Sabbath song,
And the church portals wide
Are open all; but, sight t' appal—
Not a Christian soul inside!
In every church of every creed
No supplant may be seen;
But all looks like a city sack'd,
Or where the plague hath been.

Hark! upon Autumn's sultry wing
Is borne a choral strain,
Now high, now low; and it seems to flow
From the fields of waving grain.
Now pass we forth by the southern gate
And learn the cause of this,
On Sabbath morn, to reap the corn
Unholy work I wis.

But—there a sight enough to melt
A granite heart! Behold
In tearful gratitude have knelt
The city—young and old.
The priest and peasant, student, poer,
Give thanks to Him, who bade
The obedient field abundance yield,
In man's most vital aid.

A day hath been when on such plain,
Some hundred thousand men
Chanted Te Deums o'er the slain—
Acclaims were then!
But the Lord of Hosts is still the God
Of brother-love and peace;
And war is but a chastening rod,
Whose mission soon may cease.—L.

ANCIENT CARTHAGE.—The Journal des Débats announces the discovery, at Tunis, on the 14th ultimo, of an object most interesting to all artists and antiquarians. Some workmen employed to quarry stone near the inner harbour of ancient Carthage, discovered, about thirty feet underground, a colossal bust, in marble, representing a figure of Juno, so wonderfully well preserved as to have the appearance of having been sculptured only the day previous. As this object was discovered in the ground belonging to the Bey, the statue was claimed as his property. Many were the demands made upon his Highness, and from most influential quarters, for the statue, but the Bey refused all, and presented it to M. Delaporte, who has conducted the French Consulate during the last three years at Tunis.

SPLENDID TESTIMONIAL PRESENTED TO MDLLE. JENNY LIND.

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN INSTITUTE.—On Monday, a meeting of shareholders in this undertaking was held at the Institute, for the purpose of auditing the accounts, and submitting to the shareholders a statement of its affairs. It appears that the Institution was finally closed on the 24th of last June, after struggling to the fifth year of its existence. The total liabilities of the concern were stated at £1408 11s. 5d. The proceeds of the sale of the property amounted to £1661 18s. 8d., leaving, therefore a surplus for the shareholders of £253 7s. 1d. In addition, there has been repaid to the life members of the Institute the sum of £4454 9s. 9d., which was invested in Government securities in 1844, when Consols were 99¾, and sold out in 1847, at 89, at a loss of more than ten per cent.

THE MANSION OF A DUKE SEIZED BY SHERIFFS' OFFICERS.—It is stated that the myrmidons of the law forcibly took possession of the princely seat of a noble Duke, in a county long noted for the political influence he exercised, last week, and it is feared that the urgency of the demand made on his Grace will eventually lead to the dispersion of the finest collections of art and virtu possessed by a private individual in this country.

"THE GANGES" STEAMER.

THE Engraving represents one of a class of steam ships, designed and constructed by the Messrs. Robinson, engineers, of Poplar, for the navigation of the Ganges river.

The Benares, as well as the other vessels of the line, are made and fitted with engines on the dry land, at Messrs. Robinson's factory; the parts are then carefully marked and taken asunder, the engines taken down and packed, and the whole sent to Calcutta in an ordinary ship; on their arrival here, they are received by a branch of the firm, and put together with great facility, owing to the careful arrangements made for that purpose.

The main feature of this new line of steamers is their embracing the necessary freight and passenger accommodation in one vessel instead of two, one towing the other, as is the case with the old system, on which plan the fastest passage made has occupied eleven days from Calcutta to Rahmahal; while, the Benares has accomplished it in five. She is 200 feet long, 28 feet beam, draught 2 feet 9 inches, 400 tons burthen, and 120 horse power. The peculiarities of construction consist in the mode of strengthening the vessel in the direction of her length, by connecting the deck and keel together up the middle of the hold by a light wrought-iron diagonal framing, rivetted to the keel and the iron deck-beams; thus forming the whole into a connected mass or beam of the length of the vessel; in the engines being horizontal, and placed upon the deck, which is thus made subservient to stiffen the frames of the engines; in the engines being unconnected, and capable of instantly stopping or reversing one engine, independent of the other, thus giving the power of turning the vessel sharp round, or right round in her own length; and in the cabins being entirely above the main-deck, and thus forming a series of airy and pleasant apartments rather than cabins in the ordinary acceptation, and thus leaving the hold quite free for freight.

We select the following paragraph from one of the Indian papers of March, 1847, on the success of these vessels in the Ganges:—

The Benares, which corresponds in every respect with the Patna, has effected the voyage to Monghir, by way of the Soondurbuns, in less than seven days. It does not convey a full idea of her success to say that no other vessel has ever accomplished the trip in this time; no vessel has ever made any distant approach to such speed; fourteen days being the average passage by way of the Soondurbuns. The present season of the year, when the river is at the lowest ebb, presents by far the greatest difficulties to river navigation. What the Benares has done once, she can do again, under equally able management, and what one vessel has effected is not beyond the capacity of another of the same model. We may now, therefore, look for the realization of Mr. Robinson's boast that he would reach Mirzapore in the dry season in a fortnight, and in the rains in ten days.

ENGLAND AND ITALY.

LOOKING at the political movement visible in almost every nation in Europe, it is evident that the old repressive policy of which Austria has so long been the representative and support, is fast breaking up and going to decay. Time, that has already undone so much of the work of the Holy Alliance, threatens to destroy it altogether, and what was called the "Settlement of Europe" at the general peace, will, it is probable, assume new and more natural combinations. The parchment of treaties is but a weak bond of union between nations dissimilar in language and feelings; the Congress of Vienna parcelled out kingdoms and provinces to suit the cupidity or convenience of the Great Powers, the fitness of the rulers to the ruled was never considered, and the consequence has been their compulsory unions have, in some cases, been violently divorced; and others that have hitherto been maintained by fear, are now on the eve of changes, either of masters or of policy, perhaps of both.

Austria, backed by Russia, has been the great repressor of thought and action and political life, in its own dominions, and its Italian States. Prussia, with a sufficiently marked disposition to Absolutism, touches too closely on the political freedom of the West, and, through her Rhenish provinces, too nearly on France and Belgium, for her Government to play the despot with the boldness and unrelenting severity of Austria. With much that was arbitrary in her Constitution, the practice of her Ministers has been better than the theory of the system they administered, and within the past year the shadow of a representative body has arisen beside the Throne. But Austria is immoveable, and weighs down the energies of the millions she rules, with a yoke of lead; she permits no discussion of any kind that can possibly have a political bearing; she employs her immense army to form a cordon sanitaire on her frontiers against the entrance of foreign ideas; and, with three hundred thousand bayonets, trembles at the appearance of an octavo volume. By a great effort, she has overcome a dread of railroads, and their dangerous innovations, but still only gives them a very qualified approval; stagnation, quietude, and immoveability in every respect is the principle of the Austrian Government. Long and heavily has this system weighed on the quicker spirit and brighter intellect of its Italian subjects; but Italy, like Germany, is bound down beneath a network of small States, and divided by rival interests; and, with the governing powers completely under the influence of Austria, no improvement of any kind was possible. If by chance a Prince here and there conceived an idea involving any degree of change, he was threatened with more than the displeasure of the Court of Vienna; and up to the present time, Metternich has succeeded in forcing on the Italians that inaction which is the quietude of fear.

But even Ministers grow old, and it is said that the latter years of Metternich have witnessed a decay of his faculties, which has visibly affected his policy, perhaps it may arise from greater influence falling to unpractised or rasher spirits; but many observers have traced a want of caution and disregard of appearances in the measures of the Austrian Cabinet, of which former years present no example. The calm, cold astuteness of the Imperial policy are no more seen; quite as despotic as ever it is less skilful in gaining its purpose. The massacres of Galicia, for instance, disgusted Europe; the same wish to work by criminal instruments, and the blundering that betrays the vile purpose, can be traced in the attempt to excite a revolt and massacre in Rome on a late occasion. it signally failed. All the officials in the pay of Austria were compelled to fly for their lives, and the policy of Vienna was completely unmasked: it can deceive no more there. Even the seizure of Ferrara—though an exercise of the power for which she is most dreaded, her military strength—is but an imperfect measure, and is already half apologised for. There is a spirit rising in Italy that the Government of Vienna cannot comprehend; another Metternich, beginning his career, might seize its purport, guide, and direct it; but the Minister grown grey in the pursuit of one arbitrary, repressive policy, will continue it; and as there is no Government that acts so rigidly on precedent and tradition as Austria, it will, probably, be followed by Metternich's successors and under all it will fail.

What is it that Austria dreads? Internal reforms made, in his own States, by an independent Prince. There is no aggression on Austrian territory—no injury contemplated to Austrian interests. The Government of the Papal provinces—under Popes too subservient to Austria, or deficient in political capacity—had become a mass of abuses, under which the very people were degenerating and decaying. A strong head and a bold hand have undertaken to deal with this falling system, and infuse a little new life into it; and Austria, like a great coward, is forthwith terrified, lest by the good example it should be forced to the dreadful necessity of doing somewhat the same! To begin a disguised war, to seize citadels, and threaten further interference on such grounds, cuts from under the Austrian Government all support from the other States of Europe; even France, with all the leaning of the King to the policy of repression, cannot do otherwise than defend the Pontiff, though not so heartily as might be wished. England has thoroughly recognised the right of the independent States of Italy to originate internal reforms without foreign—which, of course, means Austrian—interference. France is jealous of the prominent part England takes in this movement, and half grudges our success while it cannot but admire and admire the boldness and generosity of Lord Palmerston's policy. Already its effects are apparent; the energies of Italy, no longer cramped for want of action, have found an outlet; the Roman Pontiff, heading the crusade against the dull stupidity of the Austrian rule, could, if pushed to extremities, evoke a spirit that might dismember the Austrian Empire. Pius the Ninth was a soldier before he was a priest; he would not scruple to unite the characters, and take the field, if need be, at the head of an army, as a temporal Prince. It would not be the first time the world has seen such a combination; how would Austria meet or deal with it; she has no precedent in her archives for it. The Cabinet of Vienna has gone on in security, never dreaming of a thing apparently so improbable as a reforming Pope; the conclave of Cardinals has not hitherto produced such, and Austria is at once puzzled and alarmed. To add to its astonishment, the minor States of Italy begin to "pluck up a spirit;" Sardinia will make railroads, and alter its tariff, and buy and sell, and import as it chooses, with no leave asked of Metternich. Was there ever such audacity? Nay, the very people of Lucca—that little nook of Bourbonism—have carried a revolution! Are bayonets and dungeons failing us? It would seem so.

In Spain, again, the narrow and crooked policy to which so much has been sacrificed, does not prosper; a Court, after all, is not a nation; and most elaborately planned intrigue is shattered before a popular movement. The French party cannot form a Government in Madrid, and, at this moment, there is a likelihood that all the work of Louis Philippe will be undone, and his child as effectually deprived of all prospect of sitting on the Spanish Throne, as if the influence and character of the French nation had not been sacrificed to secure him a remote chance of it. Can the French nation see itself deprived of moral and political influence, and shut out from the noblest opportunities of exerting it, for so poor a result as this? It has been blinded by its jealousy of England; mistook the temporary success of a Palace intrigue of the vilest kind for a national triumph, and it now stands self separated from active action in the cause of freedom. In Italy and Spain alike, England, without a "family to provide for," is reaping the advantage of giving a disinterested aid to the struggling liberties of other nations.

We trust that the agitation going on will not evoke any violence. In Italy, Austria will pause before she proceeds to that length; she holds more by fear than love; and it is amid confusion and tumults that revenge and war in Spain, that could France gain by hostilities? Has the nation not yet outgrown the possibility of being goaded into a war for the most petty and miserable of causes? What have the French people to gain by convulsing two nations, that a fair-haired boy may live in the Escurial? Is this petty and selfish object worth the slaughter of thousands of men, and the waste of millions of treasure? The Royal Family would gain—the people would pay all the cost. It is time men should reflect on these things, and weigh them properly. Nations are beginning to develop their resources, and apply them to purposes of which our fathers could not dream; war would stop all improvement, all progress—would destroy much that has been done. Nations are beginning to confer together on Freedom of Trade, on internal intercourse, on social ameliorations; Scientific Congresses bring together men from all countries, to give their contribution to the general knowledge; meetings are called in foreign capitals to discuss the most difficult problems of Government and economic science—like the Congress on Reformatory Punishments to be held this week at Brussels, in which the experience of one land may, perhaps, come to the assistance of another. All this is better than a doubt whether an army may not have given this or that city to the flames.

If Freedom require a bloody sacrifice in Italy, it will be paid: the object is a noble one, and justifies. If the intrigues of the French King in Spain give rise to a war, the memory of Louis Philippe will be for ever execrated.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, September 14.

Momentous as are the events abroad, and the state of affairs at home, I have but unimportant intelligence to impart as regards Spain, Greece, and Switzerland. The Débats, like the two other organs of our Cabinet, has been keeping, for the last few days, an obstinate silence, which is but too indicative of the hesitations and perplexities of our leaders. About Italy, its language is more ambiguous than formerly, with the same marked tendency to dwell on whatever may represent that peninsula as on the eve of a general republican movement. A few days ago, when announcing the occupation of Fesa by Abd-el-Kader, it was content to indulge in geographical descriptions of the city, and its antiquities. The only news that stole into its columns was borrowed from the Gazette de France; and whether or not the Débats was sincere in reprinting it, is rather a dubious question. However it may be, the report I was alluding to, is relative to 12,000 muskets which our Cabinet is said to have offered to the Sovereign Pontiff, with every kind of latitude for the payment. On another hand, the perusal of all our opposition papers is by no means a pleasant one. They do not even try to disguise the satisfaction they feel in witnessing the bitter disappointments of our Government, who, after alienating the sympathy of the country, in order to form the most unnatural alliances, are now losing the expected support they have bought at such a cost. With what anxiety the present crisis is viewed by our statesmen, may be guessed from the frequency of the Cabinet Councils, from the hasty return of our Ministers to town; and, I may add, probably, from the late visit to Paris of our Ambassador in London. The Duke de Broglie, who had come back to France under the pretext of presiding over the Council-General of his department, left again for England yesterday night. But before taking his departure, he had several interviews with the King, in which he is said to have discussed the most important questions, to cover his own personal responsibility under the difficult circumstances of the moment. On Saturday, a Council was held at St. Cloud, wherein it is reported that a decision was come to, of sending orders for a prompt intervention in Morocco, against Abd-el-Kader. That such a step will be taken, seems the more probable from the contents of the Algerine papers. We hear from the Mitidjah, that the recent victories of the Emir have caused a great fermentation among the tribes of the district, and that a Caid was lately arrested, who was the bearer of a most suspicious correspondence. For the last few days, Queen Christina has paid frequent visits to St. Cloud, where the Duke of Rianzares, parents of Queen Isabella, and Don Bernardez, were invited to attend. It was confidentially affirmed that the last despatches from Spain had greatly alarmed the Court, and that the Duke of Glucksberg was decidedly called back to France. According to other rumours, Count Bresson had been sent to Narvaez, in order to enable him to wage a desperate war against the present Ministry and Mr. Bulwer.

Now that public attention has been directed to the mysteries of the Cabinet, and they are evidently appalled by the general outcry, by the Reform banquets, the reports of our Prefects, and the most significant manifestations of the Council-General, which are now sitting in our Departments, and many of which are expressing vows for a parliamentary reform, an electoral reform, and a more attentive control of the conduct of all public functionaries. Another rebuke, equally severe, has been dealt upon our Cabinet by the Judges of the tribunal of the Seine. The Democratie Pacifique was brought before the Court upon the charge of having excited hatred and contempt of the King's Government, in its articles on the Pradier Tragedy; and it was acquitted by the Jury after five minutes de-liberation. Two days later, however, the Gazette de France had to meet a similar charge, before the same tribunal, and its responsible editor was sentenced to three months' imprisonment, and a fine of 2,000 francs.

With a view probably to give some satisfaction to public opinion, a half official rumour was lately circulated that the Ministry were decided upon bringing forth a bill of incapacities in the usual sense; that is to say, a bill incapacitating certain functionaries for the post of Deputy. But this is only a rumour, and all promises do not become realities. It is positive, nevertheless, that M. Guizot, for one, is far from engaging in any parliamentary reform; that the influence of the King, in propriâ personâ, can dispose of fifty votes in the Chamber, with which he completely lords it over his responsible Counsellors. But precisely because the fifty Deputies, in the personal service of his Majesty, have the power of making or unmaking majorities, it is not very likely that the Cabinet will succeed in passing any law that might materially lessen the influence of the Tuileries. Meanwhile it is given, as certain, that an ordonnance, raising M. Guizot to the Presidency of the Council, will appear in the course of the week; and it is stated besides, that Count Daru is to be appointed Minister of Public Works, and M. Muret de Bort Minister of Commerce and Agriculture.

On Saturday afternoon, at half-past two, the Duchess of Aumale was safely delivered of a male child, who is to take the title of Duke of Guise. On the same day, Paris was thrown into a state of some agitation by a report that the Duke of Nemours had been accidentally wounded while out shooting at Compiegne, and, albeit all the journals of the Government did not speak of the occurrence, the agitation in the streets was not the less longer to be quieted down. On Wednesday last, the Dukes of Nemours and Aumale, with the Prince of Joinville, were on a shooting expedition, and whilst one of their party (some papers say the Prince of Joinville himself) was cocking his gun, it went off inadvertently, and a small portion of the charge struck his elder brother in the head. Fortunately the wound was very slight, only one grain of small shot having entered the upper part of the left cheek, and the fear of Nemours would not require any examination at the time, for fear of alarming the Duchess, who was present. On the next morning, however, he was able to mount his horse, and yesterday he left Compiegne for St. Cloud.

On the 5th inst., the Ocean, steam corvette, anchored in the roadstead of Toulon, coming from Constantinople, with the Persian Ambassador, his son, his son-in-law, and suite, on board. Apartments are being prepared in the Palace of the Prefecture for the Ambassador, his Excellency Mirza Mehemet Ali Khan, whom it is intended to treat with great magnificence; his Excellency is a man of middle age, slightly bent, with more than one silver streak in his black hair.

Among the many other visitors of mark who are flocking to France from every quarter, I must mention three sons of Mehemet Ali, and the Prince of Syracuse, brother to the King of Naples.

Marshal the Duke de Reggio (Oudinot), Governor of the Invalides, died on Monday, at the age of eighty-one.

The health of Marshal Soult, who was almost despaired of, has greatly improved within the last few days.

Marshal Sebastiani still remains at his hotel, in the Rue Faubourg St. Honoré. After visiting the apartments in which his daughter was murdered, he decided that they shall be left in the same state as they were in after the crime, and that the doors and windows shall be walled up.

Of the persons arrested in consequence of the late disturbances in the Rue St. Honoré, one-fifth were ascertained to be foreigners; and a passport was delivered to each of them on their being set at liberty, with the rather severe order of quitting Paris in twenty hours.

According to a communication lately made to the Société Royale d'Horticulture, the potatoes in a great many of the Departments are again attacked with the disease. The attack, like those of 1845 and 46 has been almost sudden; the injury, however, cannot be so extensive as it was last year, for a considerable portion of the crop has been already dug up.

The mortal remains of Prince Louis Bonaparte, the late King of Holland, are expected to arrive at Marseilles in a few days; it is supposed they will be conveyed to Imol, where is the tomb of Queen Hortense.

Extraordinary accounts reach us from St. Lo, the native place of M. LeVerrier. It appears that the much celebrated astronomer payed a visit to his countrymen on the 7th inst., upon which occasion he had to play the part of his own ghost, assisting at an apotheosis of himself some hundred years after his death. The Municipal Council went in a body to pay him their respects; the band of the National Guard played under the windows of his house; and the said guard of the same National Guard was convoked to wait on him in full uniform.

At Valenciennes, great preparations are being made for an historical fête and carousel, which are to take place on the 23rd inst. The pageant will be splendid; the whole town will be metamorphosed into a sort of theatre, and all its inhabitants will turn actors to perform "a revival" of the triumphal entry of Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy, into the city, on the 1st of May 1473.

The seven years of sterility appear to be commencing for the drama. The only novelties of the last fortnight have been a melo-drama and three trifling vaudevillesons of which is an adaptation of the ballet of "Oral," namely, the faithful record of wonders, sorrows, and joys of a young Tartian lady, suddenly transplanted from her own island to its antipodes, Versailles. But, on Wednesday night, the Grand Opera reopened its gates, after remaining closed for two months; and this was, indeed, an artistical solemnity. The 140,000 francs granted by the Minister of Public Works, to pay for its repairs and decoration, have been turned to most marvellous account. The large painting of the cupola, executed in the style of the Plafond d'Hercule, at Versailles, is far above the level of the decorative art. It represents Orpheus presenting the celebrated Musicians to the Gods, on Mount Olympus. MM. Cambon and Rotault de Fleury, the artists of this vast composition, have shown more than cleverness in their imitation of the grandiloquent manner of Lebrun. The shields in front of the boxes are adorned with children playing on instruments, with wreaths and vases of flowers. On the whole, the decoration is, perhaps, somewhat over rich, but it is extremely harmonious. Duprez, who appeared again in "The Juive," has not recovered, indeed, his pristine powers, but he made so far what he had lost by surpassing himself as a vocalist. Mdlle. Dameron was much applauded in her part of Rachel, and M. Allsard, who sung "Eleazar," is, certainly, a magnificent basso-cantante.

SPAIN.

The Madrid letters state that the publication of the recent decree recalling Espartero, had caused wild rejoicings amongst the population of that capital. The name of Espartero, proclaimed through the streets by the public criers, revived many political recollections. The square of the Progress and the Puerta del Sol were thronged with people. When rode out to the Prado, her Majesty was saluted with loud acclamations. The cries of "Long live the Constitutional Queen," were mingled with those of "Viva Espartero," and "Viva the National Militia." Several friends of the ex-Regent had illuminated their houses.

The Duke de Frias arrived at Madrid on the 9th inst.

The new Ministry are by no means agreed upon the policy which ought to be pursued.

Advices from Catalonia to the 6th inst., continue to represent that province as in a formidable state of insurrection. Many of the towns, divided into companies, bands, sweep the country, and keep the villages under their absolute command. They levy taxes, the payment of which the local authorities have no means of resisting. Wan of funds alone prevents the insurgents from organising a much more able armed force. The rolls of the army actually enlisted in favour of the pretender amount to 9437 men, a number ready to take the field if funds were forthcoming to enable them to do so.

A Bayonne letter of the 9th instant, mentions that a sanguinary encounter had taken place at Targa, a small village in the north of Catalonia, in which a detachment of the Queen's troops had been routed and put to the sword by the insurgents.

PORTUGAL.

According to the accounts from Lisbon of the 9th Inst., the new Ministry is considered to be of a temporary character, and that Cabral will, with the Queen's sanction, soon take the head of the Government. These accounts add that the Queen has forgiven the present Cabinet, to get rid of the importunities of the three Ministers, and the obligations of the protocol; that as soon as the elections are made and the Cortes formed, she will have performed all her engagements to Lord Palmerston, and that she will follow out her own plan, and give the only man in whom she has full confidence the unbridled direction of affairs. Donna Maria calculates that England will not again interfere by force of arms, and that by cultivating a good understanding with the dominant party in Spain, she may oversave and keep down the Septembrista enemy.

The Oporto letters of the 6th inst. assert that the peace of the city had been totally well preserved, but success had been promoted by the defection of the 3rd Regiment of Artillery on the office of the Nacional newspaper, which have led to the temporary suspension of that journal, and the confinement of its editors and proprietors in the citadel.

The programme of the Lisbon Government had been well received at Oporto but the violence of the military, and the rigour exercised in pressing young men for the army, have alarmed the people, and these proceedings call for attention to overawe them at the ensuing elections for the municipalities and Cortes

It is stated, in regard to the attack upon the Nacional, that an artillery soldier went into the office of the paper, and he will pay for his crime, and that the row having arisen between him and the man at the counter, the soldier called some of his comrades, who entered the office, broke all they could lay hands upon, but were finally ejected by force from the premises. The charge that the editorial numbers, and a violent disturbance took place shots were fired from the office, two soldiers were severely wounded, the types and presses were destroyed; and, if the Garde Municipal had not been promptly called in, much more mischief and more mischief done. The case is now before the correctional police.

ITALY.

The Presse quotes a letter from Leghorn, of the 5th instant, stating that a grand manifestation took place the day before in that city, in commemoration of the institution of the Civic Guard by the Grand Duke of Tuscany. Upwards of 10,000 men, preceded by the bust of Pius IX. and Leopold II., decked out with the national colours, traversed the streets by the light of torches, and singing patriotic hymns. All the windows were illuminated and decorated with flags. On the 8th, the festivity of the Holy Virgin, another popular demonstration was to take place, in which the whole female population, dressed in white and adorned with the national colours—green, white, and red—were to participate.

"One fact, however," says the letter, "has cast a gloom over our joy. We have heard, with the deepest regret, that in Sicily, and particularly at Messina, the people had raised the standard of insurrection; blood had been shed: and at this moment a conflagration, which might have been easily effected, has become impossible. Events must now follow their course, and the cruel and obstinate Ministers of the King of Naples will have to account for the misfortunes which their blindness must inevitably bring on their country."

It appears from another letter, inserted in the Presse, that "the people of Messina had risen en masse, and obtained, at first some advantages, but that the troops, having received reinforcements, regained possession of the posts they had lost, and compelled the people to retire."

The flying-sheet of the Corriere Anconese of the 5th, says: "The Ercolano steamer brings word that the people and Pizzo are in the hands of the people; and that they have taken possession of the Bank at the first-mentioned place."

The Leghorn correspondent of the Semaphore de Marseilles writes, on the 5th inst., that the Grand Duke of Tuscany had solemnly received M. Corboli Bussi, the Extraordinary Legate sent by the Pope. Their first interview lasted two hours, after which the Grand Duke immediately convoked a Cabinet Council, of which he repaired with his Prime Minister, Conneiller Cempini.

The Grand Duke of Tuscany has issued an important proclamation, establishing a Civic or National Guard.

The Gazetta Piemontese states that Rossini is acting as Captain of the National Guard of Bologna, and displays extraordinary energy in that capacity. The same Journal announces that the famous Bertone of Pantera has been arrested at Fano.

The Florence Gazette contains an account of some disturbances which took place at Arezzo on the 4th, in consequence of the high price of corn. Upwards of three hundred persons assembled, and attacked some bakers' shops. A civic guard was provisionally organised in a few hours, and by their exertions tranquillity was restored. Twelve of the ringleaders were arrested.

Additional accounts from Messina represent the insurrection there to have been of a very serious character; the people, having risen, seized on the principal guard-houses, and then proceeded to attack the citadel; but the artillery being made to play on them, they were obliged to withdraw. The loss in the various conflicts that took place appears to have been about equally divided between the troops and the people. It seems to be about thirty persons killed and one hundred wounded. The insurgents have withdrawn to the hills which surround the town. At Catana and Syracuse, the fermentation is reported to be at its height, but Palermo, with an amount of enthusiasm to describe which the Journal des Débats declares it to be impossible to find words. Even at Lucca, where the Duke and the Prince had for a moment been unpopular, the tide of opinion had changed, because of the concessions made by the former, and the people cried out, "The Duke Charles Louis, king or Italy, for ever!"

At Genoa, more calmness, but not less enthusiasm, was displayed.

TURKEY AND GREECE

Our last advices from Athens represent that the insurrection was not at an end, and from Constantinople we hear of a note addressed by the Porte to the five great Powers, announcing the necessity in which the Turkish Government felt itself to act coercively towards Greece. The first movement in this respect was an order to the two Consuls and the two consular agents whom the Turkish Government had established in Greece to retire. The Journal des Debats complains of the favour shown to General Grivas by the British Consul at Prevesa.

The fervent correspondence of the Presse corroborates the rumour that the difference between Turkey and Greece was assuming daily a more grave aspect. At a recent general meeting of the Divan it had been resolved that the exequatur should be refused to the Greek Consuls, till the Greek vessels should be forbidden to carry on the coasting trade in the Turkish harbours. Both measures were to be executed in the course of a month from the date of the notification. Much discontent was felt with the exigencies of Turkey.

The Semaphore de Marseilles, of the 9th inst., adds that on the 23rd ult., the Porte recalled all the Ottoman Consuls from Greece.

THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO.

The Cambria has arrived at Liverpool, with New York papers to the 31st of August.

There is still nothing decisive from Mexico. The latest intelligence from Puebla is contained in unofficial accounts to the 6th of August. In these it is asserted that General Santa Anna was preparing to attack Twiggs, was positively to take up the line of march for the capital next day. All the reinforcements under General Pillalbert, Worth, and Pearce had joined General Scott, and would swell his numbers to 14,000 or 15,000 men. From this about one-third would have to be deducted for the necessary garrisons and for the sick and disabled; so that the effective force would not exceed 10,000 men.

The train which left Vera Cruz on the evening of the 6th of August was attacked about twenty-four miles from Vera Cruz. Indeed, the attacks commenced shortly after leaving that city. Many other severe guerilla affairs had occurred; and the attacks of these bodies were daily becoming more serious.

It was reported that they had destroyed a part of the National Bridge, and created defensive works. A decisive action was expected at this point. The Sun of Anahuac sets down the number of guerillas at 4000. The health of Vera Cruz is more favourable.

Late accounts from Yucatan state that a plot for the slaughter of the inhabitants had been discovered, but not before a number of inhabitants had been massacred in several villages. All white and mulatto men, with the women and children, were murdered at Tepich. Party difficulties had been set aside, and the Yucatecoes were uniting to resist the insurgents.

The new iron steamer, Guadalquiver, Captain Hoskins, arrived at New York on the 29th ult, after a run of 11 days and 4 hours from Liverpool. On the day of her arrival at New York a serious fire was discovered on board, the flames of which were not subdued till the cabin was nearly destroyed. It was supposed that the steerage had been wilfully set fire to, and a negro was arrested on suspicion of having some agency in the disaster.

The new ship Manilook, Captain Christianso), which sailed from New York for Liverpool on the 2nd inst., was totally lost at sea. On the 15th, in lat. 38, long. 97, while lying to, a sudden gust of wind struck the ship, which shifted the cargo, threw her on her beam-ends, and burst open the hatches. After cutting away the masts and lightening her, the water was full 20 feet deep. It was then found that thirty-five steerage passengers and seven seamen were washed overboard and drowned. The survivors were taken off the wreck on the 18th, by the brig Ocean Bride, from Pictou, and safely landed at New York on the 26th ult. The Manilook was a fine new ship, of 850 tons, and had on board a full cargo of flour, provisions, &c. The vessel and cargo were worth 80,000 dollars.

From New York the commercial advices are of great importance. The advices from London had cast a cloud over the bill market; none but the most established names would sell. Cotton goods were having the control of the market, had elevated the rate to 108. Second names would scarcely sell.

The Boston journals contain an account of a frightful collision at sea, which caused the loss of many hundred and several lives. The ship Shenanego, which arrived at Boston on the 16th August, from Liverpool, reports that on Monday morning, the 9th August, at one o'clock, in lat. 44 25, longitude 58 30, the weather thick and foggy, she fell in with the Swedish barque Idana, from Hamburg for New York, with 206 persons on board. The Idana sank in about half an hour. Immediately after the collision the Shenango's boats were put off, and with one boat load saved the crew, in all 34 persons only. One hundred and seventy-two persons, including the master, Captain Ernest Andress Moberg, were lost. 1500 dollars were subscribed at Boston in a couple of days for the relief of the sufferers.

PERSIA.

News of some importance from Tabreez has been received to as late a date as the 7th of August. The internal affairs of Persia are in a most deplorable state. Khorassan is in open rebellion, and Kerman and Shiraz both show symptoms of following the example. In the first-named country the rebels have already 25,000 troops prepared to take the field which the Shah may send against them; what the latter may eventually amount to it is difficult to foretell, if indeed any force will be sent, for the regiments destined for the expedition have mutinied, declaring that they will not proceed until their pay are settled—a very difficult affair, seeing that some of them have ten and twelve years pay due to them, and that the treasury is exhausted. The troops have become so clamorous that the Prime Minister (who may be nonentitled the brother of the Minister) day not show himself in public. There has been a serious disturbance in the town of Zingian.

THE ALLEGED DESECRATION OF THE DEAD AT ELIM CHAPEL.—In consequence of the reports recently circulated concerning the alleged desecration of the dead, in the vaults of Elim Chapel, Fetter-lane, by the removal of the bodies in carts, and their subsequent distribution for dissection, the coroner Sir James Duke, accompanied by Charles Pearson, Esq., M.P., City Solicitor, the parish authorities, with Mr. Comfort, the foreman, and other members of the inquest, attended on Monday to inspect those vaults. The entrance to the chapel in Fetter-lane and the passages leading to Elim Chapel were crowded with the friends and relatives of the deceased buried in the vaults. Mr. Frisken admitted that, before the Weavers got possession of the premises, the disgraceful practices had been committed in the vaults, but since they held the chapel no burials had taken place. The removals of human remains that had subsequently taken place were made through the direction of the Commissioners for the dead whose scattered and exposed bones were covered with earth.—Mr. Comfort, who said that he had witnessed at least 300 burials in the vaults, asked whether it was true that the coffins had been taken to the highlands for firewood? Mr. Frisken said that the trustees did no such thing.—Mr. Fowler: But are not the trustees aware that the gravedigger chopped up the coffins in the open ground, and gave the wood to be burnt?—Mr. Frisken: Well, I believe that the old man gave away coffins.—Mr. Colke wished to be informed whether several feet of the earth close to St. Dunstan's graveyard had been removed, and for what purpose?—Mr. Frisken replied that the earth had been removed to the depth of several feet, to cover the bones that were scattered about. He admitted that formerly disgraceful scenes had taken place in Elim Chapel vaults, but denied that they had been re-enacted during the last few years. There had been, at one time, heaped together in one corner, at least three waggon-loads of the ends, tops, and bottoms, of coffins.—Mr. Comfort: The people in the neighbourhood, on hearing the coffin-wood, informed him that the smell from the wood greatly injured their health.—The Inquest Jury afterwards proceeded to examine the vaults, which presented a most revolting spectacle. A large pit had been recently excavated to the depth of several feet, whence a vast number of human remains had been removed, and, on the right hand side, was an accumulation to the height of several feet, of human bodies and broken coffins, while opposite was piled together heaps of old broken coffins. The Jury and several other gentlemen having expressed their disapprobation of the state of the vaults, Sir James Duke, after most minutely examined every portion of the vaults, said that the present proprietors were not to blame for the confused manner in which the dead were heaped together. On the contrary, they proceeded in a manner the most humane and decent, and the alterations which they were making were necessarily imposed upon them, and were done with every possible respect for the dead. Still, he called upon them to lose no time in committing the remains to the ground with every respect, and to the living security from disease.—Dr. Farquhar assured the worthy alderman and the Jury quest that since he had visited the vaults during the previous week, many of the abominations which he had at that time witnessed were removed.—Mr. Pearson, in answer to questions from Sir James Duke and others, said that on two previous occasions similar complaints had been made against Elim Chapel, once fourteen and again seven years ago. But he was confident that the present would be the last. Thence no they had witnessed proved that burials should only be permitted in consecrated ground.—Sir James Duke having again pledged the trustees to lose no time in properly securing the vaults against further sacrilegious intrusion, the inquiry concluded, and the angry crowd assembled in the chapel were induced to depart peaceably.

EPITOME OF NEWS.—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

Mr. Henry Deane Grady, an eminent Irish barrister, died on Wednesday (last week), at Stillorgan, Ireland, at the advanced age of ninety years. He enjoyed a pension of £2000 a year, as ex-Counsel to the Excise, for the last twenty years

According to the German papers there has been an extensive potato blight in Poland.

Since the Act came into operation abolishing the limit of letters to 16 ounces weight, some strange-looking packages have found their way to the post-offices. At Darlington, amongst other things, a leg of mutton and a basket of grapes, have been sent per post. We fancy the mutton would "come in" rather dear, after paying postage at the rate of 2d. an ounce

A steam communication has been opened between Hull and Gluckstadt, an important port of the Elbe. On Tuesday (last week) an iron vessel, the Director, propelled by the Archimedean screw, commanded by Captain Rawlinson, arrived at Hull on her first return passage with a full cargo of cattle, fruit and vegetables, including a large quantity of potatoes and onions

Letters from Trieste of the 2nd inst. announce that the insurrection in Negropont was at an end. Its chief, General Criticlis, wounded by a cannon-ball, was carried off the field in a dying state, and embarked at Coumy in a schooner. The steamer Otho was pursuing her.

Letters from Malta announce that the English screw-steamer Nautilus had put back late on the 30th August, for Alexandria, from which port she had got about 100 miles, on her way to Malta and Liverpool, in consequence of having caught fire; and, notwithstanding great exertions used, the whole of the cargo in the after part of the vessel is so injured as to amount to a total loss. Her masts, yards, bulwarks, decks, and rigging, are nearly entirely destroyed, the cabin completely so. The Pacha of Egypt has given permission for her repairs to be effected in the Government arsenal.

By her Majesty's ship Pilot, Commander G. K. Wilson, we have accounts from the Cape of Good Hope to the 30th July. There is no news of further hostilities with the Kaffirs since the defeat of the British troops between Burn's-Hill and Fort Hare, on the 19th of June; but there was a report that the Boers near Port Natal were preparing to rise against the British Government Sir Henry Pottinger was upon the frontier

One of the persons employed by the Southampton postmaster to take the Isle of Wight mails from the steamer to the office has been suspended He says he found a letter addressed to her Majesty from Osborne open on board the steamer. How the mail bag, the pouch in it, and the letter all came open, some think the lad must know. Of the four letters reported to have been received in Scotland, that had been opened and resealed, nothing is known at present.

Letters from Munich of the 3rd inst., state that the patent of nobility granted to Lola Montes has created a very disagreeable sensation among the higher class of nobility there. Several noble families have left Munich, declaring their intention if was not returning to the town. Among these families are those of Arco, Schenborn, and Bassenheim, considered as the most ancient and the most illustrious of Bavaria.

A circular advocating a suspension of railway works, and proposing a meeting of delegates in London from the boards of direction of the various leading companies, to consider the subject, has been issued by the Committee of the Liverpool Stock-Exchange. This step has been adopted in consequence of "the enormous sums which the Railway Companies are still attempting simultaneously to raise from their proprietors and the public."

From an official document it appears that the revising barristers, who have just commenced their labours, are considered as stipendiary judges. They are paid £210 per annum, amounting to £14,700 a-year.

A line of electric telegraph is in active preparation along the railway from Vienna to Prague. As soon as it is completed, every locomotive engine is to be furnished with a small electric apparatus, by aid of which and by that of a wire, which can, at pleasure, be put into communication with that of the railway, the train can announce to every station, far or near, the events it may have learnt on the road.

Letters from Odessa of the 22nd ult., mention that the cholera had almost entirely subsided at Tedka, and had lost much of its intensity at Taganrog. On the other hand it had manifested itself at Rostoff, Mariaupolis, and other towns of Southern Russia. At Rostoff it less than three weeks, it had swept off 3000 persons out of a population of about 8000.

It is thought there will be but few petitions presented at the commencement of next session, complaining of undue returns of honourable members, as a general opinion prevails that the next Parliament will be one of short duration. Mr. Anderson and Mr. Talbot have resolved in future not to attend Committees on Election Petitions.

Tom Thumb's Secretary has furnished one of the American papers with a statement of his receipts in Europe, which are said to have amounted to £100,000 sterling.

On Wednesday (last week) the venerable mansion at Whittington, in Derbyshire, known in 1638 as "The Cock and Pynot," came to the hammer, anticipating the sale of Shakspeare's house by one little week. It was in this house that the conference was held which resulted in the glorious Revolution, and it has been called since then the Revolution House. The sum obtained was £725, the purchaser is the ironmonger and innkeeper named Woodhouse, who has long tenanted the premises

On the 1st the section of the Central Railway of Hungary, comprised between Pesth and Szolnok, was opened by the Archduke Stephen, Governor of Hungaon. The salt works of the Government are at Szolnok, and they alone will secure a large traffic to the line.

The Guernsey Star states that in the matter of the recent election of a first of the Royal Court, Lieutenant-Governor Napier has received an answer from the Home Secretary entirely unfavourable to his Excellency's pretensions.

It is rumoured that a company is to be formed for purchasing the Great Britain, and placing her on the Liverpool and New Orleans trade. She still remains on the gridiron in the Prince's Basin, Liverpool.

The City of Pesth, in Hungary, has just contracted a loan with the House of MM. Rothschild, of Vienna, to the amount of 2,000,000 of florins, which sum is to be exclusively expended in the creation of schools and other establishments of public instruction.

Dr. Wiseman has received from Rome the appointment of Vicar Apostolic of London, temporarily, till the intended arrangements are complete.

From an estimate made by a farmer in the Island of Sanday, who has kept a note of the loss of property by shipwrecks for the last 20 years, it appears that not less than a quarter of a million of pounds sterling has been sacrificed in this manner during that period on that island alone.

The Belgian Government is making preparations to celebrate the anniversaries of September on a grand scale this year, chiefly by assembling the army for a brilliant military fête, which will take place in the environs of Brussels.

A hawker of fish, residing in the Basse-Ville, at Lyons, a few days back cut his wife's throat. Being arrested shortly after, he avowed his guilt, declaring that Dukes acted in the same way as he had done.

An engineer in Glasgow has effected an invention by which vessels on rivers and canals can be propelled at about the same speed as steamcarriages on railways, and at about half the cost.

The Keymer and Newhaven Branches of the South Coast Railway have been inspected by Captain Simmonds, for the Government Railway Board, and the Branches will, we understand, be opened for traffic on the 1st October.

The Lords of the Admiralty have ordered the force-pumps now in use in Woolwich Dockyard, for testing steam-engine boilers, to be sent to Mr. T. F. Smith, owner of the half-penny boats, to enable him to test the boilers of the bi-fated steam-boat, the Orlocky.

It is stated, in accounts from Smyrna of the 27th ult., that it was "quite distressing to notice the stagnation prevailing in all departments of business, especially at a period when there was ordinarily considerable activity, owing to the progress of the fruit season."

There is in the warehouses of the St. Katharine's Docks a rather curious importion, by a vessel from Bussorah, viz., a considerable number of bricks, about thirteen inches square, each impressed with hieroglyphic characters, no doubt setting forth the name of the maker and date of the manufacture. Some of them are represented as having formed a portion of the walls of Babylon.

The Bank of France, it is said, will commence issuing its 200f. notes about the end of the present month.

Of the recent arrivals of grain, of various kinds, from the continental states of Europe, during a period of six days, there were no less than 57 vessels at the port of London alone from the Russian ports, which were, with one or two exceptions, in which other Russian productions formed a trifling portion of the cargo, entirely laden with grain, the growth of Russia.

Mr. Heinke, of Great Portland-street, has invented a signal, the object of which is to afford a means of communication between the guard and the engine-driver, nothing of the kind being at present in use, in the event of any unforeseen circumstance occurring which requires the immediate stoppage or retardation of the train.

The Journal de Honfleur announces the failure of M. Bourdel Eude, banker, of that town. His liabilities are supposed to be about £120,000.

The sales of grain in the provincial markets are increasing. Last week, those of wheat amounted to 66,240 quarters.

The number of passengers between England and Boulogne during the week ending the 12th inst, was 2765. This number is less than that of the preceding week by 103, and less than that of the corresponding week of last year by 96. The total number during the same week between England and Calais was 353.

The Allgemeine Preussische Zeirung of the 8th inst. confirms the report of the conclusion of a treaty between Russia and the Holy See. The Russian Plenipotentiary, M. Von Bludow, having accomplished his commission, has returned to St. Petersburg.

FINE ARTS.

SCOTLAND DELINEATED. Parts III. and IV. Hogarth.

To Part III. of this splendid national work, Mr. Leitch has contributed two Plates —Prentice Pillar, Roslin Chapel, and Craigleith. Roslin will be remembered as one of the finest Gothic piles of the fifteenth century: the Pillar is a most elaborately decorated work, the execution of which is a tragic episode; the builder, as the story goes, went to Rome, to study models for the rich details of the sculpture; when he returned, he found this exquisite column, which his apprentice had finished in his absence: filled with envy and rage, the master seized one of the working-tools, and dashed out the youth's brains! Besides the wreathed shaft, the capital and base are exquisitely sculptured; a beautiful frieze, and a window, with considerable antique richness about its form and moulding, are also shown in this view. Craigleith, the celebrated stone-quarry, forms the foreground of Mr Leitch's other Plate, which is mainly remarkable for its pleasing view of Edinburgh, in the distance—its stately spires and lofty monuments its castled height, with Arthur's Seat and Salisbury Crags, form a noble background to the picture. Mr. Cattermole's Plate Front of the West Bow, Edinburgh—is in the Artist's richly picturesque manner, showing us a very striking portion of the old city: the lights are exquisitely artistic. Melrose Abbey, from the east, and Falkland Palace (the Grand Gateway), are by Mr. Roberts: in the former, the rich tracery of this fine specimen of pure Gothic is admirably shown by a judicious back-light; and in the noble front of Falkland, with its massive corbelled embrasures, and cupola-crowned towers, is very effective: we are happy to learn that this stately palace was lately restored in nearly its original beauty, by the late Mr. Bruce. Mr. Stanfield has contributed Edinburgh, from the finest point—the Frith of Forth: in front of the picture, we have the busy waves, the flaking craft, and vessels at anchor; farther off, the shipping at Granton and Leith; backed by Edinburgh, and the bold heights of Arthur's Seat; and the Pentland and Lammermuir Hills in the far-off distance. This is, altogether, a charming scene

Part IV. contains Benmore and Edinburgh from the Mound, by Leitch. Benmore, "The Great Hill," 4000 feet high, sketched from Strathfillan, is a magnificent specimen of Highland scenery. The view of Edinburgh shows Regent Bridge, a part of the new city, with the pseudo-classic ruins on the Calton, which, by the way, it is proposed to turn to some useful account. Mr. Roberts gives us another view of Melrose, from the south, in which the fine old pile, being much nearer the eye, the rich tracery, and sculptured flowers, and foliage, are seen to advantage. The transept window, and its many-niched gables, is a marvel of enrichment. All are enshrined in Scott's "Lay of the Last Minstrel." Mr. Harding's Plate is a fine view of Holyrood, from the south-eastern side of the Calton Hill; the uniformity of which is relieved by a foreground of cottage-roofs. Mr Nash has contributed an interior of Glasgow Cathedral, with figures, showing the resistance to the threatened demolition of the edifice after the Reformation. The band of despoilers, with their weapons, form a very spirited group, and the architectural portion of the picture is characteristic of the fine masonry of the Cathedral. Last in our enumeration, though, perhaps, first in merit, is Mr. Cattermole's "Glamis Castle," one of the finest Scottish baronial mansions, the earliest record of which is 1194, when Malcolm II. was murdered here, the identical room being shown to the visitor. Mr. Cattermole shows us the chateau, with its bristling roof and clustering turrets, flanked with picturesque timber-trees, and peopled by cleverly costumed figures all combining to form a delightful picture.

Mr. Lawson's letter-press concludes the history of Edinburgh Castle, and then deals with Holyrood, and the Old City: it is sparklingly written throughout; the narrative flowing well, and enriched but not impeded by genealogical and antiquarian research, of high value. Indeed, we rarely find the "history" in illustrative works, so copious and satisfactory

Reverting to the Lithographs, all cleverly drawn by Harding—what perfection have our artists reached in the process, since its introduction into England, some five-and twenty years since. Nothing could be more inspiring than the first attempts in this country—their failure was ridiculous. At the present day, however, our Royal Academicians draw for transfer to stone, and the art does ample justice to their finest compositions; as may be witnessed in the superb productions before us.

SIR WALTER SCOTT'S MONUMENT AT EDINBURGH. Published by A. J. DICK, New York.

An ably-executed view of the Scott Memorial, by the Artist, whose engraving of "The Last Supper" we noticed a week since. The print of the Monument, published in Edinburgh, measures 20 by 13½ inches; whereas, the New York engraving before us is 26 by 20 inches. The fame of Scott is co-extensive on both sides of the Atlantic, and the interest of this plate will be in proportion. The view is from the south side of Princes-street, with the Old City in the distance. The embossing foliage gives a fine effect to the architecture. It is, indeed, a noble work only 17 feet short of the height of the London Monument its canopied niches; its multitudinous pinnacles; and its exquisite arches; form a picturesque, pyramidal mass, of commanding beauty. Beneath is seated the effigies of the Magician whose wand has enraptured thousands and tens of thousands of readers throughout the known world. The Monumentitself, too, is the work of a self-taught genius, unhappily cut off from the world's prosperity. More of the vacant niches, by the way, are about to be filled; Mr. Park, the sculptor, having a commission for this purpose.

SKETCHES AT KILLARNEY AND GLENGARIFF. By CHARLES NEWPORT BOLTON, ESQ., A.B. Lithographed by G Rowe.

This work is published for the benefit of the Distressed Irish, and is inscribed to the Marchioness of Waterford, "whose care for the suffering Poor, during a Season of Pestilence and Famine, has endeared her to a warm-hearted People." We are happy to find the benevolent object supported by the Queen, Prince Albert, and the Duchess of Kent, and some 120 subscribers of the highest rank and respectability. The Lithographs, 13 in number, are artistically executed and printed in tint; they include two views of Mucross Abbey, the Eagle's Nest, the Torc Cascade, Ross Castle, and Glengariff—all lions of the Irish Lake district; and such of our readers as have a taste for the picturesque, may indulge it by the purchase of these Sketches, at the same time that they "enjoy the luxury of doing good."

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

GEORGE WITHAM, ESQ., OF LARTINGTON HALL, CO. YORK

This lamented gentleman, a Magistrate and Deputy-Lieutenant for the Counties of York and Durham, and formerly Captain in the 83th Light Infantry, died at his seat, Lartington Hall, on the 8th instant, in his 42nd year. He was son of the late Henry Silvertop, Esq, who assumed the surname of Witham, in consequence of his marriage with Eliza, niece and heiress of William Witham, Esq., of Cliffe; and was thus descended from one of the oldest families in the North of England, originally settled in Lincolnshire, and named from the River Witham, in that county

Captain Witham has died unmarried, leaving one surviving brother, the Rev. Thomas Edward Witham, a priest of the Church of Rome; and three sisters, Catherine, wife of Henry Eaglefield; Emma Seraphina, of William Dunn, Esq.; and Winifred, of Gerard Salvin, Esq., of Croxdale.

SILAS WRIGHT.

SILAS WRIGHT, senator of the United States, died suddenly at his residence, in St. Lawrence County, a short time since, aged 52. He had filled various public offices, and was, for a period, Governor of the State of New York. He was, in truth, no ordinary man, and exercised a controlling influence with the Democratic party, whose candidate he would have been at the next election for the Presidency of the United States. His death, at this moment, is, therefore, an important event; and may, in its consequences, affect the future policy, foreign and domestic, of America. It will be found no easy matter for the dominant party to fill the void the death of Silas Wright has created. In another point of view, he is a national loss. He favoured the Wilmot Proviso, and, had he lived, would, doubtless, have contributed to the settlement of the Slavery question.

LADY JANE PEEL.

LADY JANE PEEL we announced the decease of this estimable lady, the wife of the Right Hon. William Yates Peel, and daughter of Stephen, late Earl of Mountcashell. Her Ladyship was born 17th September, 1796, and married 17th June, 1819. She leaves a very large family to mourn her loss.

The noble house of Mountcashell deduces its descent from Thomas de Moore, one of the Knights who accompanied the Conqueror to England, and who survived the decisive Battle of Hastings, in which he had a principal command. About the mille of the fourteenth century, the ancestors of the present Earl were seated in the West of England; and in the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign they purchased an estate near Larden, county Salop, whence, for nearly a century, they were designated the Mores of "Shropshire." In the time of James I. Richard Moore, Esq., emigrated to Ireland; and his son Stephen, purchasing the estate of Kilworth, county Cork, became ancestor of the Moores, of Kilworth, now Earls of Mountcashell.

THE PRINCESS OF HOHENZOLLERN-HECHINGEN.

THE Catholic princedom of Hohenzollern-Hechingen lies in Suabia, one of the circles of the Germanic Confederation. The reigning Princess Eugenia, whose death we record, was the second daughter of the famous Eugene Beauharnois, Duke of Leuchtenberg, by his wife Augusta, daughter of Maximilian, late King of Bavaria. The Princess Eugenia was born the 23rd December, 1808, and was married the 22nd May, 1826, to Frederick William Hermann Constantine, reigning Prince of Hohenzollern-Hechingen, and Duke of Sagan, by whom she had no issue. Her Serene Highness died on the 1st inst.

SHAKESPEARE AND STRATFORD-UPON-AVON.

[THE extraordinary interest manifested throughout the country by the announcement of the sale of Shakespere's House, at Stratford-upon-Avon, assured us that we should gratify our Readers in presenting to them a Series of New and Original Pictures of the Localities in and around Stratford, which are associated with our immortal Poet. The present Number of our Journal will show how far we have succeeded in this object. The Pictures have been drawn upon the spot, by Mr. E. Duncan; and the accompanying descriptive Memoir is authenticated by a careful investigation of various sources of valuable information, placed at the disposal of the Author and Artist, during their recent visit to Stratford.]

STRATFORD-UPON-AVON.

Where his first infant lays sweet Shakespeare sung,
Where the last accents falter'd on his tongue.

The pleasant and memorable town of Stratford, to which the genius of one man has given immortality, is situated on a gentle ascent from the river Avon, in the county of Warwick, and takes its name, according to Dugdale, from having been the ford or passage over the water upon the great street or road leading from Henley-in-Arden towards London. Stratford is traceable by name to a very early period. Three hundred years before the Norman invasion we find St. Egwin, the third Bishop of Worcester, and founder of the magnificent Abbey of Evesham, exchanged a monastery at Fladbury, in Worcestershire, for the Stratford monastery, then in possession of Athelard, a Viceroy over the Mercians. (See Fleming's Chartulier.)

The convent appears to have been founded shortly after the conversion of the Saxons to Christianity, but the earlier records of its history are imperfect. St. Egwin could have presided but a few years before he was exalted to the Episcopal chair, and by whom he was succeeded as Superior in the Stratford Convent, is unknown. When, upwards of a century later, it was annexed to the Bishopric of Worcester, Berthulph, the 19th King of the Mercians, confirmed it by his charter, granted at Tamworth, and still preserved, with many additional privileges, to Heaberd, the tenth Bishop of that diocese; and when Offa, King of the Mercians, in 758, gave Shottery Meadow, in this parish, to the Church of Worcester, he gave also three farms at Nuthurst, in the Woodland; two of which, Wirifred, Bishop of Worcester, in the year ~~~, granted to Eanwulf, for forty marks of gold, to hold during his life, and the lives of any other three that he should leave them to; and after their deaths to go to the Monastery of Stratford. This is the last grant extant; and when or by whom the Convent was subsequently dissolved, there is no certain information obtainable. It is conjectured, however, that the Monks were expelled from Stratford by Elfer, a powerful Earl of Mercia, who had conceived an inveterate hatred against them; and that, by his influence and authority, secular canons were placed in their stead throughout all the convents in this province.

Meanwhile, the town of Stratford, which, from a few inhabitants, probably dependant wholly upon the Monastery, began to assume a more flourishing aspect, was kept in possession by the Bishops of Worcester, and was retained by their successors long after the Conquest.

In the Domesday Book of the Conqueror, compiled between 1081 and 1086, it is rated at fourteen hides and a half, and was then possessed by Wolstan, the twenty-fifth Bishop of Worcester. At that period, as the accompanying extract shows, there was a church (on the site, Leland supposes, of the ancient monastery), a mill yielding ten shillings per annum and a thousand eels; the value of the whole manor amounting to £25, no inconsiderable revenue in those days.

In the seventh year of Richard the First, a charter, dated January, 25, 1197, was granted to John de Constantius, for the holding a market on the Thursday in every week, which remains to the present time, the day, but not having been changed to Friday. This John de Constantius, by his own deed, referring to King Richard's charter, settled upon his burgesses of Stratford the inheritance of their burgages, reserving to himself for all services the annual payment of 12d.; to each of these burgages he allotted a stipulated quantity of land, making them free of toll for ever, and excommunicating all persons who should infringe upon their privileges. These rights were confirmed by succeeding prelates, and charters obtained for fairs to be held at appointed periods, all of which tended to the prosperity and importance of the town.

In the 45th of Edward the Third, Wolstan, Bishop of Worcester, granted to John de Peto, junior, a lease of the manor of Stratford for life, at the yearly rent of £60; and in the third of Edward the Sixth, we find that Nicholas Heath exchanged it with John Dudley, Earl of Warwick, for certain lands in Worcestershire. In 1596, the manor was possessed by Edward Greville, Esq., from whose executors it went to James the First, and Charles the Second conveyed it to Charles, Earl of Dorset and Middlesex, in whose family it still remains.

The spot selected by our Artist for his View of the Town, is a commanding eminence not far from Stratford, on the left-hand side of the high road to Warwick. Ascending the uplands here, a panorama of remarkable richness and variety is spread before you. Hill and dale in graceful undulations—luxuriantly wooded parks—the winding Avon, tracked by the fringe of willows on its banks—the peaceful town, with its venerable church—and, afar off, the grandly-towering outline of the Malverns—form, altogether, a landscape essentially English, and such as is rarely to be found in any other country than our own. But, rich and pleasant as the prospect is, it takes its crowning glory from the mighty genius whose dust reposes at our feet. It is his genial spirit which pervades and sanctifies the scene; and every spot on which the eye can rest claims some association with his life. We tread the very ground that he has trod a thousand times, and feel, as he had felt———— that the heaven's breath

Smells wooingly here

For these heights at Welcombe, so immediately in the vicinity of his home, would have peculiar charms for Shakespere in his youth. They must have been his frequent haunt at early morn—

Full many a glorious morning have I seen
Flatter the mountain tops with sovereign eye,
Kissing with golden face the meadows green
Gilding pale streams with heavenly alchemy.

And looking hence at day-break on the distant hills, his young imagination may have shadowed forth those exquisite descriptions of the morning light which have become to everyone like household pictures.

A little way off, to the right, we can almost trace the spot, where, quiet and sequestered, in the fields of Shottery, stands the homestead of his early love. More distant, on the other hand, embosomed amid majestic elms and antique oaks, we catch a glimpse of Charlecote, the ancient seat of the Lucys. Immediately beneath us is the dwelling of his youth, in Henley-street, and near to it stands the Chapel of the Guild, marking at once the locality of his school, and the home of his choice, "New Place."

A few paces further still, and the eye rests contemplatively on that "Last scene of all," the venerable church—his everlasting mansion—the tranquil depository of his sacred ashes, till

The cloud-capped towers, the gorgeous palaces,
The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
Yea, all which it inherit—shall dissolve,
And, like an insubstantial pageant, faded,
Leave not a rack behind.

THE HOUSE IN HENLEY-STREET, WHERE SHAKESPERE IS REPUTED TO HAVE BEEN BORN.

THE report, a short time since, that this memorable edifice was "in the market," and about to be subjected to public competition, awakened a natural curiosity in many to know how far the tradition which ascribes to it the honour of being the birth-place of the Poet, is borne out by the records of the time. We are not of those who attach much import to the question, whether this, in reality, is the tenement wherein he first drew breath? As has been well remarked, if it were not the birth-place of the child, it was, unquestionably, the nurturing place of the Poet, which is of infinitely more consequence, and surely sufficient to entitle it to respect and preservation from the nation at large.

The strongest corroborative support of the received tradition is part of a court-roll, dated 1553, lately published by the Rev. Joseph Hunter, in his "New Illustrations, &c., of the Life of Shakespeare," in which the Poet's father, John Shakespere, is mentioned in immediate connection with Henley-street. This is certainly a most important document; and, we should think, the earliest mention of the name which can be found among the ancient records of the town. An examination of the Minutes of the Common Hall, Pleas of the Court of Record, Rent-Roll of the Lands, &c., belonging to the Corporation of Stratford, Proceedings of the Court-Leet, and Accounts of the Chamberlains of the Borough, although not uninteresting as showing the class of men who formed the "worshipful society" of the place, affords but very meagre information concerning John Shakespere.

The town was then, according to the charter of Edward VI., June 26th, 1553 (granted only eight days befors his death), under the jurisdiction of a Bailiffe, fourteen Aldermen, and fourteen Burgesses. The first High Bailiff nominated under the new incorporation, 1553, was "Thomas Gilbert." Mr. Gilbert was a dyer; and, it is not improbable that John Shakespere's second son, "Gilbert," was named after him. For 1554 William Whately was chosen. He is found to have been elected High Alderman in 1559; and, in the same year, licensed to keep a tavern, and to retail wines, &c. In 1555 we have "John Burbage," who is conjectured to have been related to the James and Richard Burbage, whom we find, thirty-four years afterwards, co-sharers with our Poet, in the Playhouse, at Blackfriars. In this year occurs the first recorded list of the Capital Burgesses.

In 1556 Ralph Cawdrey is Chief Bailiffe. He was a butcher, and we find him chosen Chief Alderman in 1570.

In 1557 Francis Harbage (a skinner) is elected Head Bailiffe. The first set of by-laws extant are dated Michaelmas Day in this year, and appear in the Council-book "A."

In 1558 we have Robert Perrot (a brewer); and, eleven years after, on the 7th of Sept. 1569, we find him "Fyned 20d., by order of the Hall, for non-attendance at Common Council."

In 1559 Adrian Quiney is enrolled First Bailiffe. Mr. Quiney was a grocer, served as Constable in 1554, and was elected Capital Alderman, 1562. A descendant of his, Thomas Quiney, married the Poet's second daughter, Judith Shakespere, 10th February, 1615-16.

In 1560 Robert Sadler is the First Bailiff. He was a baker, and was chosen Capital Alderman in 1562.

In 1561 Lewis ap Williams, ironmonger and afterwards fishmonger, appears as First Bailiff. He was Chamberlain in 1558, and Chief Alderman, 1564.

In 1562 the High Bailiff is Humphrey Plymley, a mercer. He served as Constable 1558, and was first Chamberlain in 1559.

In 1563, George Whately, woollen draper, is High Bailiff. He figures as "Bridgewarden" in 1545, and again in 1547, and as Capital Alderman, 1566 (A second code of by-Laws are recorded in the Council Book (A) this year).

In 1564, Richard Hill appears as High Bailiff. Mr. Hill was a woollen draper. In 1557 he is chosen ale-taster (a regulator of the measures and the quality of the beer), and in 1558 is elected second Chamberlain.

He died Dec. 17, 1593, and has a long inscription to his memory at the south end of the transept, in Stratford Church.

Passing over the intermediate names, we reach the most important, "John Shakespeare," who is recorded as High Bailiff in 1568, and obtains a grant of arms from the Herald's College in the same year.

Prior to this, we discover that in a civil action on the 17th of June, 1555, he is described as a glover. "Johnn Shakyspere de Stretford, in coun. Warwic., glover." On April 30, 1556, he was one of the Jury of the Court-Leet. In 1557 he is summoned on a Jury in a civil action, and sworn ale-taster. In the latter end of 1557 or early in 1558 he was elected a Capital Burgess; in 1558 and 1559 was chosen Constable. Oct. 6th, 1559, was sworn affeeror (there were four affeerors chosen annually who had the power of decreeing summary punishment for offences not mentioned by statute), and again in May, 1561. In 1561 and 1562 was Chamberlain; in 1563, Second Chamberlain. On July the 4th, 1565, was chosen Alderman. The next entry is that above, recording his service as High Bailiff in 1568; and then no further records connect him with the Municipal duties for some years; the last occurred on Sep. 6th, 1586, and sets forth that "William Smith and Richard Courte are chosen to be Aldermen in the place of John Wheler and John Shaxspere, for that Mr. Wheler doth desyer to be put out of the Companye, and Mr. Shaxspere doth not come to the halles when they be warned, nor hath not done of long time."

From 1556 to 1571, a space of 15 years, we are thus in some measure enabled to trace the progress of John Shakespere in what may be termed his public life. During this period, we find him proceeding through the accustomed course of Municipal honours till he attains the highest dignity the Corporation could bestow. It is reasonable to infer that at this time he possessed the respect and esteem of his townsmen, and was a thriving and responsible man. This is corroborated too by the scanty particulars of his private history which have been preserved. In 1556 he was addmitted at the Court-Leet to two copyhold estates in Sn[illegible]hord. The following is a translation of the entry upon the Court-roll.

Stratford-upon-Avon. View of Frank-pledge, with the Court and Session of the Peace held of the same, on the second day of October, in the year of the reign of William and Mary, by the grace of God, &c., the third and fourth.

Item. They present that George Turner has alienated to John Shakespere and his heirs one tenement, with a garden, and croft with their appurtenances, in Greenhill-street, held of the Lord, and delivered according to the roll, for the rent from thence to the Lord of xixpence per annum; and the said John in the aforesaid Court did fealty for the same.

Item. That Edward West has alienated to him the aforesaid John Shakespere, one tenement, with a garden adjacent, in Henley-street, for the rent from thence to the Lord of xixpence per annum, and suit of Court, and the said John in the aforesaid Court did fealty.

In 1557 or 1558, he had wooed and won the descendant of one of the oldest and highest families in the county, MARY ARDEN, of Wilmecote, the mother of the Poet, and by this marriage became possessed of the property in Wilmecote called Asbies, consisting of about sixty acres of arable and pasture land, and a house. "A small fortune," as Mr. Knight remarks, "for a descendant of the Lord of forty-seven manors;* but it was enough for happiness."

It is at this period, 1558, that the Register of Stratford commences and turning to the entry of baptisms in that year, we find the baptism of "Joan, daughter to John Shakespere," on the 15th of Sept. Four years afterwards, on the 28rd of Decr., 1562, Margaret daughter to John Shakespere, is baptised. (These daughters both died young.) We then come to the most important entry in this or any other register in the world:—

1564, April 26. Gulielmus filius Johannes Shakspeare.

These few syllables attest the baptism of "William, the son of John Shakespere," but, strange to say, no record has been found to stamp the day, the hour, the moment, when this immortal Son was given to the world. In this, as in almost every other circumstance of importance in the history of the Poet, our only authority is tradition, which asserts that he was born upon St. George's Day, the 23rd of April, three days before the entry of his baptism.

The subsequent entries in the register give the Poet three brothers and two more sisters, viz.:—

Gilbert, the son of John Shakespere, baptized 13th of Oct., 1566.
Joan, daughter of John Shakespere, baptized April 15th, 1569.
Richard, son of Master John Shakespere, baptized March 11th, 1574.
Anne, daughter of Master John Shakespere, baptized Sept. 28th, 1578; and Edward, son of Master John Shakespere, baptized May the 3rd, 1580.

Of these eight children which constituted the family of Shakespere's father, five only—William, Gilbert, Joan, Richard, and Edmund—reached maturity.

Rowe gives to John Shakespere "ten children in all"—an error Malone has satisfactorily accounted for, by showing that, to make the confusion which involves the family history of the Poet worse confounded, the register and the books of the Corporation present another "John Shakespere" and family resident in Stratford at the period. This other Dramio appears to have been in very humble circumstances: he is mentioned as a "shoemaker," and sometimes as a "corvisor." The first entry concerning him occurs in the registry of his marriage to Margery Roberts, in 1584.

In 1570 we find John Shakespere, the Poet's father, in occupation of a meadow of fourteen acres, with appurtenances, called Ingon, about a mile and a half from Warwick, at a yearly rent of eight pounds, equivalent to about forty pounds in the present day.

Four years afterwards, in 1574, he purchases the two freehold houses in Henley-street, with gardens and orchards, of which houses, the tenement represented as the birth-place of William Shakespere is a portion.

These facts throw little or no light upon the controverted point, whether Shakespere was born in this tenement or not. As Mr. Knight observes, "William Shakespere might have been born at either of his father's copyhold houses in Greenhill-street, or in Henley-street; he might have been born at Ingon: or his father might have occupied one of the two freehold houses in Henley-street at the time of the birth of his eldest son; "—but they tend to show the Poet's father, up to his purchase of the freehold houses in Henley-street, actively and profitably engaged in agricultural pursuits—a grazier, probably—a wool-comber, and incidentally even a butcher; in all of which, according to the state of society at that time, there is nothing incompatible with the station of a landed proprietor, or "gentleman farmer," as he appears to have been.

They enable us also to form some idea of the sort of habitation which the respectable family of such a man would be likely to occupy in the early part of Elizabeth's reign, and thence to understand the ravages which time and culpable neglect have made in the traditionary house of William Shakespere's birth.

It is difficult, and perhaps superfluous, in this place to trace the future fortunes of the elder Shakespere. We think the evidence adduced by Malone to prove the temporary decadence of the family, is stronger than anything yet offered on the other side; and are willing to believe that the embarrassment of the father was one of the leading causes which diverted the son's mind from rustic pursuits, and determined him to that course of action for which Nature had designed him, and which ultimately led to his surpassing greatness and renown. The subsequent restoration of the aged man (the prototype, mayhap, of brave old Adam) to a sphere of comfort and respectability, and the attainment of his right to use a "shield of arms," who can doubt to have been the filial works of his illustrious son?

Upon the death of John Shakspere, the freehold houses in Henley-street descended to his heir at law, the Poet; but he is not supposed to have resided in them afterwards, as some years before he had purchased a spacious mansion, called New Place, which he is always understood to have occupied to his death.

In the last testament of the Poet, March the 25th, 1616, he devises to his "sister Joan," for her life only, the house, with the appurtenances, in Stratford, wherein she dwelt, under the yearly rent of twelve pence. His sister Joan, whose marriage name was Hart, was residing there in 1637, and she probably continued there till the period of her death, in 1646. Her house is supposed to have comprised the part now shown as the Poet's birth-place, and the tenement adjoining it on the western side; the other house having been known as the Maidenhead inn, in 1642. In a subsequent part of his will, Shakespere bequeaths, amongst the bulk of his property, "two houses in Henley-street to his eldest daughter, Susanna Hall, with remainder to her male issue."

Whilst this property remained in the possession of Shakespere's immediate descendants, it was several times made subservient to family arrangements. By a deed of the 27th of May 1639, and a fine and recovery (Trinity and Michaelmas Term, 15th Charles I.), Mrs. Susanna Hall, Shakespere's eldest daughter, with Thomas Nash, Esq., and Elizabeth his wife (Mrs. Hall's only child) confirmed this and our Bard's other estates to Mrs. Hall for her life, and afterwards settled them upon Mr. and Mrs Nash, and her issue; but, in the event of her leaving no family, then upon Mr. Nash. As, however, Mr. Nash died, 4th April, 1647, without issue, a re settlement of the property was immediately adopted, to prevent its falling to the heir of Mr. Nash, who had by his will of the 26th of August, 1642, devised his reversionary interest in the principal part of Shakespere's estates to his cousin, Edward Nash By a subsequent settlement, therefore, of the 2d of June, 1647, and by another fine and recovery (Easter and Michaelmas Terms, 23d of Charles I.), Shakespere's natal place, and his other estates, were again limited to the Bard's descendants, restoring to Mrs. Nash the ultimate power over the property.*

Mrs. Nash married a second time to Sir John Barnard, and by her will of the 29th of January, 1669, left both houses, namely, "the inn called the Maidenhead, and the adjoining house and barn," to her kinsmen, Thomas and George Hart, the grandsons of Shakespere's "sister Joan."

Thomas Hart, dying without issue, his brother George succeeded to the property, which continued in possession of his descendants till the beginning of the present century, when it was sold out of the family by the widow and children of John Hart (sixth descendant in a direct line of Shakespere's sister), in 1806, to Mr. Thomas Court. But the premises, originally extensive, have been gradually diminished. John Shakespere, in 1597, sold a small plot of land to George Badger, which was added to what was afterwards called the Swan Inn. Shakespere Hart, in 1746, disposed of another part of the yard or garden in 1771. Thomas Hart sold four tenements, between Shakespere's birth-place and what is now the White Lion Inn; and ultimately the house in which Mrs. Hart, the Poet's sister, lived so long, was divided into two tenements, one of which, at the end of the last century, was opened as a butcher's shop, with the attractive inscription—

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE WAS BORN IN THIS HOUSE.
N.B. A HORSE AND TAKED CART TO LET.

These mutations and subsequent neglect have, of course, completely changed the aspect of the building. Of what it was in 1574, no notion can be gathered from what it is in 1847. There is something, indeed, most painful in the contrast of its present wretchedness, and our idea of its condition as the comfortable home of Shakespere's parents. The low, crazy frontage—the crippled hatch—the filthy remnant of a butcher's shamble, with its ghastly hook—on the outside; and the squalid forlornness of the rooms within, convey together such a sense of utter desolation as merges all those feelings of respect and awe which such a relic should inspire. Let us hope the result of Thursday's sale has saved this interesting property from further desecration, and that for the credit of the nation a sufficient fund may speedily be raised to restore, "as far as possible, under the direction and advice of competent authority, such portions of it as may, from time to time, have been removed or altered * * * and transmit it to future ages with every mark of honour and veneration."

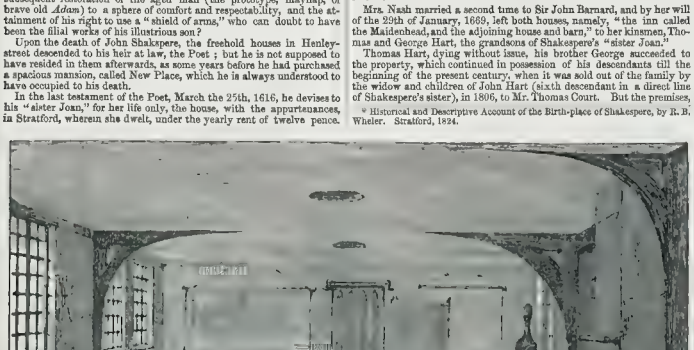
ROOM IN THE HOUSE IN HENLEY-STREET.

Mounting the step at the doorway, you enter at once into a dirty and dilapidated room, whilom the butcher's shop. This place has no windows, and is utterly divested of furniture. Its broken pavement and the naked walls strike an irrepressible chill upon the imagination, and you hasten on to the sort of kitchen in the rear, a small dark room, unfurnished, and having nothing noticeable but the ample chimney nooks of the olden time. In the window, facing the fire-place, a piece of stained glass, bearing the arms of the Merchants of the Staple, was formerly inserted, and was thought to confirm the tradition of Shakespere's father having dealt in wool. There is good reason for believing, however, that it formed a portion of one of the chapel windows, and was brought from thence by one of the Harts, when employed to repair them. A few years since, too, there existed in the northern wall of this room, a mutilated plaister representation, in relievo, of the battle between David and Goliah, originally surrounded by an inscription—

Goliah comes with sword and speare,
And David with a sling:
Although Goliah rage and sweare,
Down David doth him bring.
SAMUEL, XVII. A.D., 1606.

Over the butcher's shop, and approached by a narrow timber staircase in the kitchen, is the celebrated chamber where Shakespere is said to have been born. This apartment has been so often and so accurately described, that any detailed account of it must be superfluous. The ceiling is low, and the walls denuded of the oaken wainscoting or hangings of tapestry with which, in the Poet's time, they would have been covered, have a cold and cheerless aspect.

"The garrulous old lady with a frosty red face" (so pleasantly described by Washington Irving), who formerly reigned supreme exhibitor of the house, has long since vacated her throne; she claimed to be a lineal descendant of the Poet, and was famous for an inexhaustible supply of relics for the visitors of easy faith. In a fit of resentment, on the day before her abdication, she whitewashed the walls of the bed-room, and obliterated the thousands of pencil autographs with which they were disfigured. The service was not appreciated; for her successor, with an assiduity more remarkable than discreet, has been at the pains to remove the plaster, and bring again to light these multitudinous mementos of vanity and ill-taste.



THE GRAMMAR SCHOOL-ROOM, AT STRATFORD.

SHAKESPERE'S SCHOOL AT STRATFORD.

Immediately adjoining the Chapel of the Holy Cross, or Guild Chapel, as it is usually called, stands the ancient stack of buildings which comprise the Guild Hall and the Grammar School. Nothing can be more unpretending than the appearance of this quaint old structure.

The Hall is a long narrow room, on a level with the street, divided, in latter times, by a wainscot partition in the middle, but formerly without any division; there is a smaller chamber leading out of the Hall, which was used by the Corporation on Council and other great days, and here the municipal records, manuscripts, &c., are deposited. Above, of the same form and dimensions, is the ancient School-room, separated into two chambers in modern days, and having now a low flat plaster ceiling, in place of the old arched roof.

The Guild Hall was built under the direction of Robert de Stratford, in 1269, and was appropriated to the use of the fraternity of the Holy Cross. The Grammar School, founded by Thomas Jolyffe, a native of Stratford, in the reign of Henry VI., is an institution open to all boys resident in the Borough, of seven years of age, and able to read. This curious old place has a special hold upon our affection and respect.—It was undoubtedly the school of Shakespere.

"We assume, without any hesitation," says Mr. Knight, "that William Shakespere did receive in every just sense of the word, the education of a scholar; and, as such education was to be had at his own door, we also assume that he was brought up at the Free Grammar School in his own town. * * * * To the Grammar School, then, with some preparation, we hold that William Shakespere goes, in the year 1571. His father is, at this time, Chief Alderman of his town; he is a gentleman now of repute and authority; he is Master John Shakspere; and, assuredly, the worthy curate of the neighbouring village of Luddington, Thomas Hunt, who was also the schoolmaster, would have received his new scholar with some kindness. As his 'shining morning face' just passed out of the main street into that old court, through which the upper room of learning was to be reached, a new life would be opening upon him. The humble minister of religion who was his first instructor, has left no memorials of his talents or acquirements; and in a few years another master came after him, Thomas Jenkins, also unknown to fame. All praise and honour be to them! for it is impossible to imagine that the teachers of William Shakespere were evil instructors—giving the boy husks instead of wholesome aliment. They could not have been harsh and perverse instructors, for such spoil the gentlest natures, and his was always a gentle. 'My gentle Shakspere' he called by a rough but noble spirit—one in whom was all honesty and genial friendship under a rude exterior. His wondrous abilities could not be spoiled even by ignorant instructors." But other teachers were occasionally to be found within these walls, whose influence upon the ductile mind of such a boy was more potent, possibly, than that of any masters in the school. Among the old accounts of the Chamberlains of the borough, are many items paid from the Corporation to the leading players of the time.

In 1569, when the father of Shakespere was High Bailiff, there is a payment of nine shillings to the Queen's players. (It is worth observing that the taste for these rical representations seems to have increased with years; since we find, by a recent examination of the muniments, that, in 1586, the Queen's players were paid twenty shillings.)

In 1573, the Earl of Leicester's players received six shillings and eightpence. In 1574, Lord Warwick's players received seventeen shillings, and the Earl of Worcester's players five shillings and sevenpence. In 1577, my Lord of Leicester's players received fifteen shillings, and Lord Worcester's players three and fourpence.

Other payments of a similar kind occur in the records, showing that theatrical exhibitions were not unusual at Stratford at this period. The old Hall of the Guild on such occasions was the theatre; and here, without a doubt, the future Poet often sat gazing in delight and wonderment at those quaint moralities and pageants on which he more than any helped to build the superstructure of the English drama.

CHARLECOTE—THE SEAT OF THE LUCYS.

DUGDALE gives, with great minuteness, the history of Charlecote, or Carlecote, as it is written in Domesday Book. Previous to the Conquest it was in possession of one Saxi, but afterwards became the property of the Earl of Mellent, and from him descended, doubtless, to Henry de Newburgh, Earl of Warwick, whose son Roger, in the 23rd of Henry I., gave half a hide of land, lying in Carlecote, with the tithes of the whole lordship and two mills, to his newly-founded Collegiate Church of Warwick. He also enfeoffed Thurstestane de Montfort of large possessions in this county. The son of Thurlestane, with Alice de Harecourt, widow of Robert de Montfort, his elder brother, gave all the village of Carlecote to Walter, the son of Thurlestane de Montfort; and grant was confirmed to him and to his heirs by letters patent from Richard I., with divers immunities and privileges thereto—all of which were ratified by King John, in the fifth of his reign. From this Walter de Carlecote, who was a knight, by his wife Cecily, descended William, who assumed the name of Lucy—this being, perhaps, heir to some branch of that family. From him was descended Thomas Lucy, by whom the present mansion was erected in 1558, and who received the honour of knighthood in 1593. The House stands on a slight elevation above the river Avon, and forms three sides of a quadrangle, the fourth being formed by a handsome central gate-house, which, with octangular turrets and oriel window, constitutes an interesting portion of the façade; and, as seen in the accompanying Engraving, backed by the mansion, presents a striking and picturesque appearance.

The tradition which associates this structure with the youthful transgression of Shakespere, is so deeply rooted, and, to our mind, so strongly confirmed by the allusions and peculiarities of Master Justice Shallow, that it seems treason to pocsy to disbelieve, or even doubt it. We have firm faith in every title of the story, in so far as the Poet himself was concerned. This gay young gentleman of his peasant neighbour, was just the sort of freak to stimulate a bold and unchecked genius such as his. Rowe relates the story thus:—"He had, by a misfortune common enough to young fellows, fallen in to ill company, and amongst them, some that made a practice of robbing a park that belonged to Sir Thomas Lucy,(a) of Charlecote, near Stratford. For this he was prosecuted by that gentleman, as he thought, somewhat too severely; and, in order to revenge that ill usage, he made a ballad upon him; and though this—probably the first essay of his poetry—be lost, yet it is said to have been so very bitter, that it redoubled the prosecution against him to that degree, that he was obliged to leave his business and family in Warwickshire for some time, and shelter himself in London." (The Poem is not lost; but is so well known, as not to require repetition here. It has been attempted to discredit the story of Rowe, by asserting that the Justice had no deer at the time; but Mr. Collier, from papers in the possession of the Earl of Ellesmere, has clearly proved that he had deer at the time of Shakespere's residence at Stratford. Again, the unmistakable allusions of Justice Shallow, in the "Merry Wives of Windsor," to the "dozen white luces" are denied to have reference to Sir Thomas Lucy, because his coat of arms contained "three white luces" only. But, on referring to Dugdale, it will be seen that he gives two coats of arms; one to the monument of Thomas Lucy, son of Sir William Lucy, in which are quartered, in four several divisions, twelve little fishes, three in each division. In the scene itself mark the nice distinction made between these very coats—the old and the new coat, and Master Slender's "right to quarter."—(See "Merry Wives of Windsor," Act 1, sc. 1.)

In an after part of the scene, we have the specification of the offences which we may suppose the Poet to have committed, and probably his own ill-considered and imprudent answer to the charge.

But, it is in the second part of "Henry IV.," that the portrait of the Justice appears at full length; and here the vanity and feebleмindedness of the country magnate is hit off to perfection.—(See Act V. sc. 1.)

In this play the imbecile peculiarities of the Justice are so nicely discriminated, and so much pains taken to render them remarkable to the audience during the progress of the action, as well as afterwards in the lengthy soliloquies of Falstaff,(b) that it seems hardly possible to mistake the animus of the poet, and his intention, so foreign to his usual practice, to give a character which was individual, and not a species

Our visit to Charlecote was at an unpropitious time; the family was absent, and we were prevented from making a closer examination, as we could have wished, the interior of the building; but Washington Irving's exquisite description of the antique Hall renders us familiar with all its most attractive features:—

(a) It should be Justice Lucy, as he was not knighted till long after Shakespere left Stratford.

(b) In one of these there is an attempt to fix the satire upon the Lord of Charlecote, which we don't remember to have been pointed out: it is the passage—"If the young dace be a bait for the old pike, I see no reason in the law of nature but I may snap at him."—Act III., Scene II.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 1847.

How comes it that in this country, where we lay such stress upon the absolute necessity of a" sound scriptural education," we so often miss the true spirit of the Gospel in the conduct of that most important of our national institutions—the Poor Law Administration? If we were unacquainted with the earnestness and the frequency with which the duty of that charity which relieves the wants of the body, and aims at soothing the asperities of life, as well as of that higher charity which relates to the interior motives and secret feelings of the soul, is inculcated in the Book of Life, a ready explanation of the evil would present itself.

Mere human benevolence is so circumscribed in its objects and limits, that the relief or aid which it yields is, at best, but a stunted and dwarf production. Here would be a satisfactory, or at least a very probable solution of the matter, and the remedy of a religious education, based upon Scripture, for the rising generation would immediately suggest itself, so that higher and more ennobling incentives to action might be instilled in the young minds of the future people and rulers of the country. But no such cutting of the knot is permitted us. We have no such source of hope left remaining to us. It cannot be said that the maxims and doctrines of the Bible are but little known to Englishmen. It would be a lible upon us to say so; and we would indignantly repel such an assertion as a false and calumnious charge.

Is it not most anomalous, then, that in that one great National Institution we have mentioned, the very basis and essence of which is the spirit of Charity—the Charity of the Gospel—we have so repeatedly to deplore the active presence of unchristian oppression? Is it that, in the structure and constitution of that Institution, which has been ostensibly organised amongst us for the better and more systematic relief of the needy, the naked, the hungry, and the thirsty, the main-spring of the work is of any unchristian a nature, that, in its operation, religious principle seems lost sight of altogether, and the only effect fully produced is the demoralization and hardening of the hearts of the dispensers of relief? Whatever the cause, certain it is that the charitable aid or support accorded under the Poor Law is not of that quality which "blesseth him that gives and him that takes;" and that its grand result seems to be to pervert the feelings. The necessity of a remedy, then, cannot be too often or too strongly urged upon the Legislature; and if the advocacy of it can be strengthened by directing public attention to such cases as the following, we shall not fail to expose such barbarous cruelty.

A pauper named Whitfield, blind, paralytic, affected with disease of the heart and liver, and an inmate of the infirm ward of St. Pancras Workhouse, thus describes his case, which had already attracted some notice in a letter to the Times —

> My mother, who is an inmate of the Aged Pilgrims' Society, at Camberwell, in her 80th year, partially blind, and who has lately dislocated one of her ancles, being desirous that I should visit her for a short time, as I always derived much benefit from the change of air, I applied to Mr. Eaton, the present master, for leave of absence for three days, but was positively refused unless I discharged myself. * * * I appealed to the Board of Guardians, but with no better success. I pleaded my afflicted state, and that, during the many years I had been in this house, not the slightest charge had ever been brought against me for any misconduct, but all failed to raise their sympathy in my behalf. They would not relent, and insisted that I must discharge myself. This I declined to do, knowing that a rule had lately been laid down that, should any parson return to the house in less than one month from the date of their discharge they would be charged out of their charity for three months.

Can anything be more monstrous than the circumstances here related? We, to whose lot has fallen a greater or less share of the abundance of this world, undertake, either in order that we may be freed from the nuisance of mendicancy, or say from some better motive, to found an asylum for those less fortunate members of the community who, from whatever cause, such as great bodily infirmity, as in the present instance, are incapacitated from providing for their own sustenance; but, let one of those afflicted creatures show the least indication of free-will, even if it but aim solely at the slightest personal comfort, no matter how rational or inexpensive, or how indifferent and neutral as regards the asylum it may happen to be, and that moment he is made to feel, in the most oppressive manner, that he and all like him have no right to any indulgence—and that they ought to be thankful they are allowed to exist.

A PARAGRAPH in our last number announces that "a School of Art for Artists and Amateurs has been formed by the Incorporated Society of British Artists;" and that, "the arrangements having been all completed, it will be open to its members in the early part of next month: the School to be principally supported by subscriptions and donations." This is a desideratum fulfilled. It has long been a source of painful surprise to us that all London could not furnish a single place of instruction, where young artists of talent and moderate means could, without submitting to a ruinous expenditure, apply themselves, under the guidance of competent masters, to the study of practical improvement in whatever branch of the art they may have chosen for their profession. The superiority, not merely of Paris, but of many provincial towns in Belgium, France, and Germany, over "the Great Metropolis," in this respect, is humiliatingly conspicuous.

For one class of students in art there is no means whatever of obtaining professional instruction, except by the payment of exorbitant fees to such artists as are willing to undertake the office of teacher—a privilege denied to female students. For, that branch of the School of Design in Somerset House, which is appropriated to young ladies, has hitherto, from whatever cause, served only to draw out and indicate, without developing, the vast amount of unquestionable artistic talents which exists among the more youthful members of the sex of the present day. We trust that the British Artists will not, in their School, neglect to establish a chair for a Lady-Professor of Painting in Oils as well as in Water Colours.

THE WEATHER.

The cold weather which had prevailed from the beginning of this month till the end of last week, suddenly changed to warm weather at the beginning of this week, and the average temperature of the first four days of this week was above the average of the season, and the remaining days were about that average. Friday, the average temperature was the most in excess, and day by day after wards the temperature declined; the sky has been alternately clear and cloudy; some rain has fallen at different times, and the wind has been principally from the S.W. The following are some particulars of each day:—

Friday, the sky was mostly covered by cloud till noon, consisting of cirro-stratus, cirro-cumulus and scud; after noon it was chiefly clear, there being only a few detached clouds scattered about the sky; the direction of the wind was S.S.W.; the day was warm, its average temperature being 61½°, being an accession of 6° of heat as compared with the temperature of the preceding day. Saturday, the sky was overcast till noon, and principally cloudless after noon; the direction of the wind was S.W.; the average temperature of the day was 59½°. Sunday, the sky was very nearly wholly covered by cloud throughout the day; the direction of the wind was S.W.; the average temperature of the day was 58°. Monday, the sky was overcast throughout the day; rain began to fall at the close of the afternoon, and continued during the remainder of the day; the direction of the wind was N. and W.; the average temperature of the day was 58°. Tuesday, the sky was generally clear, before 10h. A.M.; it was about three fourths covered by cloud between 11h. A.M. and 5h. P.M.; a little rain fell in the evening; flashes of lightning were also occasionally visible, the night was cloudless; the direction of the wind was S.W.; the average temperature of the day was 58°. Wednesday, the sky was for the most part covered by circo-stratus and scud; rain was falling after 10h. P.M.; the direction of the wind was S.W., and the mean temperature of the day was 54; the night was rough and stormy. Thursday the sky was very variable in its appearance, being, within a very short time, both overcast and cloudless, and these transitions were frequent. A gale of wind from the W.S.W. was blowing during the greater part of the day; at times, heavily. The average temperature or the day was 58°½, and that of the week was 58°.

The extreme thermometrical readings of each day were:—

The benefice is of the annual value of £1000, and is in the gift of the Queen.

POSTSCRIPT.

HER MAJESTY'S RETURN TO ENGLAND.

Her Majesty was to leave Ardverekie with the Royal children, at two o'clock yesterday afternoon, and was expected to arrive at Fort William about six o'clock. Her Majesty was to embark either in the Royal yacht or the Fairy, but the officers did not expect that a distance further than Inverness or Oban could be accomplished the same evening. This (Saturday) morning the Royal party proceed to the Crinan Canal, and will move through, the artificial water in the Royal barge, upon the occasion of the removal. In the meantime, the Black Eagle and Undine steamer will have proceeded round the mull of Kintyre to await the arrival of the Royal party at Lochgilphead, on the other side of the Canal, from which the Black Eagle will convey them as far as Campbeltown, in Argyleshire, where anchor will be cast for the night. Although her Majesty is not desirous of moving on Sunday, the officers are of opinion that, in order to reach Fleetwood in a favourable tide, the remainder of the journey must be accomplished during that day. An official notification has been received at Fleetwood that the Queen will arrive at that port at six o'clock, that being the hour of flood tide, and the authorities are making all the preparations for the Royal Consort remaining on board all night. On Monday morning, at eight o'clock, her Majesty will land, and proceed direct to London by special train. Her Majesty is expected to arrive about seven o'clock on Monday, and the Queen will proceed immediately by the South-Western line to Southampton, and reach the Isle of Wight the same evening.

Death of Rear-Admiral Robert Bloye, C.B., and Mrs. Bloye.—Rear-Admiral Bloye, and his wife, Mrs. Bloye, died at their residence, King's-terrace, Southsea, on Tuesday night last. The gallant officer had been long in a declining state of health, and his death in the advanced age of 78 years might have been expected, but Mrs. Bloye had been in tolerable health Such, however, was the shock to her, that, on the announcement of her husband's death, she fell prostrate, and did not rally again. Medical assistance was at hand, but in the course of four hours she ceased to exist: her age was 76.

Shakespere and the Court of Common Council.—At a Court of Common Council, on Thursday, Mr. Thomas White submitted a motion, that the Court should contribute in aid of the subscription for the purchase of Shakespere's house. Mr. Anderton opposed the motion, and moved, as an amendment, that it should not be put. He said, he had an unconquerable objection to Shakespere as any man; but, as there seemed to be a doubt about the house where Shakespere re-ded, they might be called upon to buy up every house where he had lived. On a division, the amendment was carried, by a majority of — to —, against giving the proposal for a subscription. Sir Peter Laurie gave notice of a motion that a sum of money be subscribed by the Court towards the erection of a suitable testimonial to Shakespere, in honour of William, the Conqueror, and not of Shakespere. (Hear, hear.) He had lately returned from Scotland, where he had seen with admiration a great monument to the memory of Sir Walter Scott. From that moment he determined to submit a motion to the Corporation on the subject of raising a monument to the greatest man that ever lived, and he knew that he should obtain the eager assistance of every man who knew anything at all about the poet of England.

Serious Accident on the Manchester and Leeds Railway.—The Sun of last night contains the following account of a serious accident which happened to the express train leaving Hull for London at one o'clock on Thursday, when between Hebden-bridge and North Dean stations. It appeared to pass over something on the line, which caused the carriages to jump, and the last, a first-class carriage, and one of Dunbiad wheels broken, and they travelled in that state for several miles, without the passengers being able to give the least information to the guard. There were, fortunately, only four persons in the carriage, two of whom, we regret to say, were killed; a third had his arm broken, and, being otherwise very much hurt, was left behind, and the fourth expected every moment to be his last, for his hat was completely broken to pieces on his head, and his life was only saved by clinging to the seat of the carriage till it stopped.

Accident at the Hadleigh Railway Station.—On Thursday evening, there was a serious accident at the Hadleigh Railway Station. It appears that at the time mentioned for leaving the station at one o'clock on Thursday, when between Hebden-bridge and North Dean stations. It appeared to pass over something on the line, which caused the carriages to jump, and the last, a first-class carriage, had

After prowling about for some time, I at length found my way to a lateral portal, which was the every-day entrance to the mansion. I was courteously received by a worthy old housekeeper, who, with the civility and communicativeness of her order, showed me the interior of the house. The greater part has undergone alterations, and been adapted to modern tastes and modes of living. There is a fine old oaken staircase; and the great hall, that noble feature in an ancient manor-house, still retains much of the appearance it must have had in the days of Shakspere. The ceiling is arched and lofty; and at one end is a gallery, in which stands an organ (since removed). The weapons and trophies of the chase, which formerly adorned the hall of a country gentleman, have made way for family portraits. There is a wide hospitable fire-place, calculated for an ample old-fashioned wood fire, formerly the rallying place of winter festivity. On the opposite side of the hall is the huge Gothic bow-window, with stone shafts, which looks out upon the court-yard. Here are emblazoned in stained glass the armorial bearings of the Lucy family for many generations, some being dated in 1558. I was delighted to discover in the quarterings the three white luces, by which the character of Sir Thomas Lucy was first identified with that of Justice Shallow. They are first mentioned in the first scene of the "Merry Wives of Windsor," where the Justice is in a rage with Falstaff for having "beaten his men, killed his deer, and broken into his lodge." The poet had no doubt the offences of himself and his comrades in mind at the time, and we may suppose the family pride and vindictive threats of the pursuant Shallow to be a caricature of the pompous indignation of Sir Thomas.

"I regretted to find that the ancient furniture of the Hall had disappeared; for I had hoped to find the stately elbow-chair of carved oak, in which the country squire of former days was wont to sway the sceptre of empire over his rural domains, and in which it might be presumed the redoubted Sir Thomas sat enthroned in awful state when the recreant Shakspere was brought before him. As I like to deck out pictures for my entertainment, I pleased myself with the idea that this very Hall had been the scene of the unlucky Bard's examination on the morning after his captivity in the lodge. I fancied to myself the rural potentate, surrounded by his body-guard of butler, pages, and blue-coated serving-men, with their badges; while the luckless culprit was brought in, be-drooped and chapfallen, in the custody of gamekeepers, huntsmen, and whippers-in, and followed by a rabble rout of country clowns. I fancied bright faces of curious housemaids, peeping from the half-opened doors; while from the gallery the fair daughters of the knight leaned gracefully forward, eyeing the youthful prisoner with that pity "that dwells in womanhood." Who would have thought that this poor varlet, thus trembling before the brief authority of a country squire, and the sport of rustic boors, was soon to become the delight of princes; the theme of all tongues and ages; the dictator to the human mind; and was to confer immortality on his oppressor by a caricature and a lampoon!

south aisle, opposite the door, and nearly under the second arch of the nave from the west, was removed to the residence of Thomas Paine then parish-clerk, who died in 1747. Here it remained till 1823, having, since its removal from the Church, been applied to the ignoble purpose of a water cistern; when Captain Saunders, an enthusiastic venerator of the Bard, obtained possession of it, and placed it in his garden. Subsequent to its removal from the Church it must have sustained considerable injury, although, from the cavities made for receiving an iron hoop or brace, it appears to have suffered more severely from the destructive hand of fanaticism at the period of the Civil Wars, when several other ornaments of the Church were mutilated or demolished. It is conjectured that this Font was originally put up in the reign of Edward III., when John de Stratford, Archbishop of Canterbury, erected the south aisle in which it was situated; but, this mutilated relic derives its greatest interest from the probability, if not the certainty, of having been the Font wherein Shakespere and his family were baptised.

Upon the lamented death of Captain Saunders, the old Font remained in his garden where it still is in the possession of a Mr. Heritage, STRATFORD CHURCH AND THE RIVER AVON.

Even divested of the abounding interest which association with the name of Shakespere gives to them, there is something eminently striking and picturesque in the appearance of the Church and river from the neighbouring meadows. The Avon, which, from its source at Naseby, winds like a silver thread through fertile valleys and rich groves in peacefulness and beauty, at this point takes a broader sweep, and proudly swells, as conscious of the tutelary genius of the spot. The Church, too, here, encircled by its lofty elms, and standing on the river's brink, has a grand and venerable aspect:

Here the Bard divine
Whose sacred dust yon high arch'd aisles inclose,
Where the tall windows rise in stately rows
Above the embowering shade,
Here first at Fancy's fairy-circled shrine
Of da ses pie' his infant offering made;
Here playful yet, in stripling years mature,
Fram'd of thy reeds a shrill and artless pipe.

The Church of Stratford was formerly a Rectory in the patronage of the Bishops of Worcester in whose diocese it stands until the 10th of

SITE OF "NEW PLACE," AND THE GUILD CHAPEL, FROM SHAKESPERE'S GARDEN, AT STRATFORD.

Edward III., at which time it was purchased of Simon Montacute, then Bishop, by John de Stratford, and presented by him to the Chantry which he had previously founded in the Chapel of St. Thomas the Martyr, adjoining the south aisle of the Church, which aisle he had rebuilt at his own expense. The Chantry consisted of five priests, of which the Warden and Sub Warden were appointed, while the others were elected and removed at the Warden's pleasure. For the maintenance of these priests, John de Stratford settled the manor of Inge or Ingon to their use; and in the 7th of Edward III., he added to their revenues the yearly rent, issuing out of certain lands in Stratford, and being shortly after advanced to the Archbishopric of Canterbury, he granted the patronage in the 18th of Edward III. to Bishop Montacute and his successors for ever, and appropriated the advowson of the Church to it.

In the year 1353, Ralph de Stratford, Bishop of London, and nephew of the Archbishop of that name, a large ecclesiastical manner of state, afterwards called the College, adjoining the western side of the churchyard, as a residence for the Priests.

To the workmen engaged in this building, consisting of ten carpenters and ten masons, with their servants, special protection was granted by the King's letters patent, until the edifice should be finished. In the first year of Henry V., as a public matter, with many additional privileges, was granted to the Priests; and at some period in the reign of that Monarch a new part to the north was erected, called Warwick, for it had Peaty, afterwards Bishop of Chichester, was appointed Warden, in the first year of Henry VI. (1423), by the style of "Dean of the College Church." Thomas Balsa., D.D., who was appointed Dean in the year built the fabric as one of the Canons of its new estate, and died in 1491, was succeeded by Ralph Collingwode, D.D. and Dean of Lichfield, who, being desirous of giving full effect to the work began by his predecessor, instituted, with the assent of Sylvester Gygles, then Bishop of Worcester, four boy choristers, nominated and admitted by the Warden, to be daily assisting in the celebration of Divine service in the Church, and for whose maintenance he conveyed to the foundation certain lands in Stratford, Drayton, and Binton, all in Warwickshire. Shortly after the College had been thus completed and endowed, the celebrated Valor Ecclesiasticus was made in the 26th year of Henry VIII., in which the revenues of its lands and tithes were certified to amount to £53 13s. 4d. At the dissolution of the College, in the 37th of Henry VIII. (1545), another survey was taken, and their yearly value was certified at nearly the same amount. The Church was then erected into a vicarage, and it continued in the gift of the successive Bishops of Worcester, as lords of the manor of Stratford, until the third year of Edward VI., when Nicholas Heath, at that time Bishop, sold it to John Dudley, Earl of Warwick, afterwards Duke of Northumberland, upon whose attainder, by Queen Mary, it came to the Crown, and was presented to by the successive lords of the manor.

The Church is a cruciform structure, consisting of a nave and side aisles, a transept or cross aisle, and a chancel or choir, with a tower rising from the centre of the cross. The precise period of its erection has not been recorded. Leland conjectures that it occupied the site of the ancient monastery, and supposes it to have been rebuilt by Archbishop Stratford. Camden, in his "Britannia," explicitly affirms that it was erected by that prelate, but Dugdale says the south aisle only was built by him, and refers it, though erroneously, to the time of the Confessor.

Abutting against the north wall formerly stood the Charnel House—

> An ancient receptacle,
> Where, for these many hundred years, the bones of the buried had been deposited. It was a plain building, thirty feet long and fifteen wide, being the height of the church, and had a very appropriate of being the most ancient part of the church. Above it was a room, supposed to be the bedchamber appointed for the use of the four choristers, the ascent to which was by a flight of stone steps; and the general appearance of the building afforded some reason to believe that it was part of the church in being at the time of Edward the Confessor.

The Tower, which has a very antique appearance, is built in the early Norman Gothic style, upon four pointed arches, supported by massy clustered pillars, and contains a bell. The Tower originally stood a lumber steeple, covered with lead, and measuring in height about forty two feet, but which, requiring frequent repairs, the parishioners in 1763 obtained a faculty from the Bishop of Worcester to remove it, and erect a new one of Warwick stone in its place.

NEW PLACE.

The old Tower of the Guild Chapel is again before us, the boundary of two distant and far different epochs in the Poet's life. His early schoolboy days were passed beneath its shade; and, making it the sea-mark of his utmost sail, he returns to it again in after life, to find a tranquil home. But what a wondrous change was wrought meanwhile! A few years only have elapsed since he departed from his native place,

> Sick in the world's regard, wretched and low.

He returns to it prosperous and renowned—

> Soul of the age;
> The applause, delight, the wonder of our stage.

Of the exact date of his leaving Stratford, we are as ill informed as of the precise time of his return. We believe, however, that, whether drawn from it, as Rowe asserts, by the severity of Sir Thomas Lucy, or by the altered circumstances of his family, or induced to leave by the players who occasionally exhibited in the town, he quitted soon after his marriage. The absurd tradition of his gaining a subsistence, on his arrival in London, by holding horses at the playhouse door, is soon disposed of, since it is now well known that, till his own retirement of the drama, those who would be likely to ride on horseback did not visit the theatres at all.

Old Aubrey, in his Minutes of Lives, 1680, tells us: "This William' being inclined naturally to poetry and acting, came to London about eighteen, and was an actor at one of the play-houses, and did act excedingly well." But this is opposed, in some measure, to other evidence. The Registry of Stratford records the baptism of his daughter Susanna, on the 26th of May, 1583. This entry implies the residence of his wife in the parish of Stratford; and it seems most reasonable to suppose he too lived there at this time, especially as two years afterwards the same Register records the baptism of his twin son and daughter to William Shakespere. At this time, while three months under age, he is the father of three children; and it is at this period that he most probably quitted his native place for London. Alluding to the deer-stealing tradition, Rowe informs us: "It is at this time, and upon this accident, that he is said to have made his first acquaintance in the playhouse. He was received into the company then in being, at first in a very mean rank; but his admirable wit, and the natural turn of it to the stage, soon distinguished him, if not as an extraordinary actor, yet as an excellent writer."

We quite agree with Mr. Knight, in thinking it not improbable that even before leaving Stratford, Shakespere had attempted some play or plays, which had become known to the London player. If Thomas Greene and Richard Burbage were, as has been represented, from his town or county, he would have a passport to their favour, and would probably be personally known to them; and it is not unlikely that from some attitude he may have shown himself to possess in the adaptation of subjects for the stage or in the production of some early play of his own, they may have invited him to join their company.

His "Venus and Adonis" was first printed in 1593, and, in the dedication to Lord Southampton, he speaks of it as the "first heir of his invention." Now, if we are to understand this literally, and to suppose it written immediately before publication, it is impossible to reconcile the fact with the generally accepted dates of his earlier plays, and the various allusions to them and his works which are found in productions of an anterior date. There is an allusion, by Nashe to "Humfrey," as early as 1589, and this may have been to the first imperfect sketch of Shakespere's "Hamlet." In Spenser also, we find a striking passage, which has generally been considered to apply to Shakespeare. It is in a poem, entitled "The Tears of the Muses," which was first published in 1591. Lamenting the decline of the drama at that period, Thalia says:—

> And he the man whom Nature self had made
> To mock herself, and truth to imitate,
> With kindly counter under mimic state,
> Our pleasant Willy, ah! is dead of late;
> With whom all joy and merriment
> Is also dreaded, and in dolour drent.

Now this would appear to be unquestionably applicable to Shakespere; but, if he were only known as a writer from the time his poem of "Venus and Adonis" appeared (1593) it is of course impossible.

Time, perhaps, may enable us to reconcile these discrepancies; in the meanwhile, we cannot resist the impression that his first dramatic efforts arose on earlier than those of Marlowe, Stukeley, Drake, and the other talented writers of the day assigned to them.

Mr. Knight has shown that, in 1589, when Shakespere was only 25, he was a joint proprietor in the Blackfriars Theatre, with a fourth of the other proprietors below him in the list. Was this position attained by his skill as an actor? It is not probable, as he never achieved much reputation in that line. It is far more likely that he advanced to a proprietorship in the theatre by the exercise of his incomparable powers as a writer.

Of the plays produced before the close of the sixteenth century (Mr. Knight remarks) we would assign several, not fewer than nine, including the doubtful plays, to the period of Shakespere's residence in London.

In the year 1596, he lost his only son, who was buried at Stratford. Shakespere, at this time, must have been resident in London about twelve years. It is not probable that all this long period was passed in the Metropolis. Aubrey says, "He was wont to go to his native country every year," and we believe the tradition. It was the home of his family, and of his affection also; for in 1597, while still resident in London, he bought the house in Stratford, built by Sir Hugh Clopton, in the reign of Henry VII., and known as the "Great House." It was then, the principal mansion of the town—"a fair house," according to Dugdale, "built of brick and timber." This was "New Place."

The London residence of Shakespere at this time is understood to have been in Southwark, near the Bear Garden, and there he appears to have lived till the early part of the seventeenth century. In 1608, we find his townsman, Richard Quiney, writing to him for a loan of thirty pounds.* (The original letter, bequeathed by Captain Saunders to Mr. Wheler, is now in the possession of the latter.) Two years after this, the Stratford Register records the burial of his father. In 1605 we find the Poet adding to his property at Stratford, by the purchase of 107 acres of land of John and William Coombe.

The counterpart of the conveyance (in the possession of Mr. Wheler) contains an acknowledgment of possession being given to Robert Shakespere to the use of William. At the time these brothers were—Gilbert, who perhaps resided in the affairs in Stratford, Richard, and Edmund. Gilbert, at Richard both died, and were buried at Stratford. Edmund appears to have followed the Poet to London, where he died in 1607.

In 1603, in the first year of James the First, the proprietors of the Blackfriars and Globe Theatres obtained the grant of a patent. The names stand on this patent in the following order:—Laurence Fletcher, William Shakespere, Richard Burbage, Augustus Phillips, John Hemmings, Henry Condell, William Sly, Robert Armyn, Richard Cowley.

In 1603, we have additional evidence of Shakespere's investing his gains in the acquisition of property at his native place, as this year he purchased a messuage at Stratford, with barns, gardens, and orchards, of one Hercules Underhill, for the sum of sixty pounds. On the 24th of July, 1605, a conveyance is made for Joseph Heland, Esq., to William Shakespere, gentleman, of a moiety of a lease of the tithes of Stratford, and the purchase money amounts to four hundred and forty pounds. At this period, there can be little doubt of his retirement to Stratford, still retaining his interest in the theatre, and writing for it. To the first half of the period between 1603 and his death, Mr. Knight assigns "Lear," "Macbeth," "Cymbeline," and "The Winter's Tale;" and adds to this most glorious legacy, as the production of the latter half, "Troilus and Cressida," "Henry VIII.," "Coriolanus," "Julius Cæsar," and "Antony and Cleopatra." "Eleven of the noblest productions of the human intellect," remarks Mr. Knight, "so varied in their character: the deepest passion—the profoundest philosophy—the wildest romance—the most comprehensive history: what a glorious labour to fill the mind of Shakespeare! The life of the man who had left his native fields twenty years before, to seek for advancement in doubtful and perilous paths—in a profession denounced by some and despised by others, and he returns wealthy and honoured to the bosom of those who are dearest to him—his wife and daughters, his sisters and brothers."

In 1607, Susanna, the eldest daughter of the Poet, married Dr. Hall, an eminent physician, of Stratford. In 1608, his grandchild Elizabeth was born. In the same year, his mother died. And on the 23rd of April, 1616—the same day of the same month on which he was born—the parish register of Stratford tells us died William Shakespere, aged 53. A short life, reckoned by the ordinary computation of weeks, and months, and years; but, looked at rightly, in connexion with its fruits, a world's age!

The subsequent history of New Place is one for indignation and regret. By his will, dated March 25th, 1616, the Poet gave New Place, and the lands in the parish which he had of John and William Coombe, to his daughter, Mrs. Hall, for her life, and then to his granddaughter, Elizabeth, afterwards Lady Barnard. The latter dying without issue, in 1669, New Place, with the land before mentioned, was sold by the surviving trustee to Sir Edward Walker, Knt., whose only child, Barbara, married Sir John Clopton, Knt., who, by her means, became heir to Sir Edward's estates. Sir John Clopton, by deed, gave New Place to his younger son, Sir Hugh Clopton, Knt., namesake to that Sir Hugh who originally built the mansion. This gentleman resided in New Place during the latter part of his life, and in 1742 entertained Macklin, Garrick, and Delany, under Shakespere's celebrated Mulberry Tree. Upon the death of Sir Hugh, this interesting house was sold to the Rev. Francis Gastrell, in 1753, and by him shortly afterwards was totally destroyed.

Malone's version of this inexplicable conduct is as follows:—

> The Rev. Mr. Gastrell, a man of large fortune, resided in it but a few years, in consequence of a disagreement with the inhabitants. Every house in that town that is let or valued at more than forty shillings a year, is assessed by the overseers according to its worth, and the ability of the occupier to pay a monthly rate towards the maintenance of the poor. As Mr. Gastrell resided part of the year at Lichfield, he thought that was assessed too high in the sum of £20 per annum, and refused to pay the sum assessed. Stratford is by no means a rich town, and the inhabitants, therefore, did not choose to submit to a reduction in the assessment, as they justly considered that that would increase the sum to be assessed against and paid by them. Mr. Gastrell, therefore, pulled down the house, sold the materials, and left the town. Wishing, as it would seem, to be revenged on the inhabitants, he had some time before cut down Shakespere's Mulberry Tree, to which there was a tradition that he planted with his own hands, and which was therefore regarded by many persons with a degree of veneration. He assessed against and soon afterwards pulled it down, sold the materials, and left the town. Wishing, as it would seem, to be revenged on the inhabitants, he had some time before cut down Shakespere's Mulberry Tree, to which there was a tradition that he planted with his own hands, and which was therefore regarded by many persons with a degree of veneration. He assessed against and soon afterwards pulled it down, sold the materials, and left the town. Wishing, as it would seem, to be revenged on the inhabitants, he had some time before cut down Shakespere's Mulberry Tree, to which there was a tradition that he planted with his own hands, and which was therefore regarded by many persons with a degree of veneration.

The Mulberry Tree was cut down in 1756, and sold for firewood. The greater part was purchased by Mr. Thomas Sharp, of Stratford, who had it converted to his own premises, and turned to advantage by making into boxes, goblets, and toys of various kinds.

The site of New Place was afterwards added to the garden of the adjoining house, which, in 1775, was sold by Mrs. Jane Gastrell to W. Hunt, Esq., from whose eldest son it was subsequently purchased in 1790, by Charles Henry Hunt, Esq. At the present time it is in the occupancy of Mr. Rice, who is actually alive to the interest which it brings to its memorable place, and wishes to afford to any visiter the gratification of seeing it. He accompanying engraving is from a sketch taken from the very spot on which the celebrated Mulberry Tree of Shakespere stood.

* TO MY LOVING GOOD FRIEND AND COUNTRYMAN, MR WILLIAM SHAKSPERE

> Loving countryman I am to let you need a friend, craving your help with thirty pounds upon Mr Bushell and my security, or Mr Mytton with me. Mr Rossiter is not come to London as yet, or I doubt not of procuring it. You shall friend me much by being me out of this trouble. I thank God, and praise be to Him, I have no other care of it. Assure yourself I am now towards the Court, in hope to get money, for else I could not have been absent from home at this time. I will not hold you long, but trust you shall not be the payer of it. The Lord watch over you and bless you. Haste. Ever thankful, I rest your loving friend and countryman, if need be, Abraham Sturley.
> I am sorry I have not been able to find out Master Lambert yet, but will be the payer myself. My time bids me to hasten to an end, and so I commit this to your care, and hope of your help. I fear I shall not be back this night from the Court. Haste. The Lord be with you and with us all. Amen. From the Bell in Carter Lane, the 25th of October, 1598. Yours in all kindness,

REPRESENTATION OF STOCKPORT.—Anticipating that Mr. Cobden will elect to sit for the West Riding of Yorkshire, the electors of Stockport have presented a requisition to Mr. Alderman Kershaw, the defeated candidate in the late contest, to offer himself again. The requisition having a much greater number of signatures affixed to it than that presented before, and upon which Mr. Kershaw was induced to be put in nomination, he has resolved to be willing to accept the invitation. The number of signatures attached was upwards of 600

FLYING SHEETS FROM A TRAVELLING CONTRIBUTOR.

CONSTANCE, Sept. 12.

The route by which I have passed in coming from the place from which my last letter was dated, to this delightful spot, has been so often and so well described, that it would be absurd in me to repeat the observations which are, in all probability, those of every one of the hundreds of travellers who pass from the Rhine to the Switzerland. As I propose to penetrate into the interior of Germany, in districts which have not been so well described, I will reserve myself for occasions when more amusement and novelty may be afforded to your readers, and proceed at once to what I promise I made in my last communication, to supply some observations on the present state of the Düsseldorf School of Painting, as one more useful to the student, when we come to study the works of the artists who, that school, at Munich and other places, and to compare their progress with that of other German artists.

To imitate a German habit, I will begin at the beginning. Well, the Academy of Düsseldorf was found d by the Prince Elector of the Palatinate, Charles Theodore of Bavaria. The first capital school of painting in Germany. When the French Revolution threatened to overwhelm the arts, by the peculiarly French mode of the conquerors of fostering them, this celebrated gallery was removed to Munich "for safety." The treaties over, the good people of Düsseldorf reclaimed the pictures from the King of Bavaria; but that Monarch's idea of "safety" had not turned out to be different. He refused to restore them; and the pictures now form the best part of the magnificent collection at Munich. While Düsseldorf continued under the French, the school of painting was insignificant. Cornelius, the artist who had lived in that place deserted, and among them the celebrated engraver, Longhi, now known in England by many works. His engraving of "the Cid at bay" at Madrid, by Raphael Mengs, is one of the best specimens of his graving. But when the Rhine Province became a part of the Prussian dominions, the school was re-established under Peter Cornelius. Under him the Academy soon regained some position. What was done was chiefly due to him, as the other Professors, Mosler, Theiotz, Schäffer, Wintergrast, were not men who could materially aid him. But the school, under Cornelius, turned out one pupil who was destined to take a high place. I refer to Wilhelm Kaulbach, well known in England, and, among other fine things, by his illustrations to "Reinecke Fuchs." We shall have occasion, as we pass through Germany, to admire his productions. He does not aim at colours, but at ideas; and is, perhaps, the greatest poet-artist that modern times has produced. Cornelius left Düsseldorf, and went to Frankfort. Schadow's excessive preference for religious subjects, and a peculiar mode of treating them, also contributed to this result. Of those who left, the most distinguished are, Alfred Rethel, a young artist, about thirty years old, of great talent, the painter of the frescoes in the grand saloon of the Hotel de Ville, at Aix-la-Chapelle; embracing all the great events in the life of Charlemagne. He is a native of Aix-la-Chapelle. There also Funker, a good artist and Becker (called the German Robert), who is now Professor at the Town Institution, at Frankfort. The effect of the system pursued by Schadow has been rather to repress than to develop talent, as we shall see by the case where any species of fascination prevails. But on the other hand, the school, under his management, produced, or rather contained, some good painters, but they were chiefly those who went with him. Among them may also be mentioned Lessing, the painter of the grand picture, "John Huss before the Council of Constance," and who is also distinguished as a landscape painter. There are also Bendemann, son of a banker at Berlin, and Director of the Academy at Dresden; Hubner, also a Professor at Dresden; Sohker, an historical painter; Sohn, of whom I have spoken as a great painter, and who especially excels in his female figures, and Hildebrandt, of whom I shall have occasion to speak on entering one of the galleries. He was the last to paint the interior of the young Princes in the West, and accidentally, was for the slippery he required for his models, to the wonderful beauty of a person in Düsseldorf whose family are said to be descended from one who was compelled to fly from England for a supposed participation in the Assassination plot. So much for the higher rank of the art in connection with Düsseldorf. The peculiar tendency of the spirit which seems to have engrossed an unfavourable influence over the pupils, more especially as regards colour. But in 1839, an event, itself of not much importance, changed the aspect of things. An Art-Union was established at Bonn, and to the exhibition of the pictures all the schools of Europe were admitted. The competition at once showed the deficiency of the new Düsseldorf school, more especially in colour. It will, perhaps, be long before a great national impulse is given to the exhibitions as continued since, it is open at the present time at Cologne; and is well worth a visit from the traveller interested in the arts, as it contains a few very good pictures.

Among the painters of miscellaneous subjects may be mentioned Aschenbach, a landscape painter, who has executed some scenes in Norway of remarkable power; Schirmmer, Lean, Hilgers, and Scheuren (water colour), all good landscape painters. Then amongst the painters de genre there is Hasenclever, a most original artist, who has executed illustrations to a comic epic of truly national character, called "Tartuffe," which they are full of the richest humour. There is also Schrudden, who is a professor at Dusseldorf, and who is distinguished by his scenes from Shakespeare, where Sir John Falstaff is introduced, and also for his illustrations to "Don Quixote."

It is right to give special mention to Preyer, the first fruit and flower painter in the first rank. He is extremely clever; but one of the oddest looking beings imaginable, being actually a living picture of his artistic peculiarity and character. There is an excellent portrait of him now exhibiting in the exposition at Cologne.

In sculpture, the Dusseldorf School has produced nothing deserving the slightest notice; but in Engraving there are one or two artists of high talent and standing. The first name is that of Keller, who is now engraving one of Raphael's finest pictures, "Christ and the Doctors." It will be one of the largest engravings for sale, the largest engraving that has yet been made in Germany. Another engraver, Steffensack, has also done many very good things, some of which are already known in England.

Among the painters who were originally at Dusseldorf, but have left it for the reasons stated, are, Lentze (an American), Kamphausen, and Niessen. I was much struck with one or two of the latter's pictures at Cologne, deposing that as much evident talent as did he could be seen in a garish imitation of Titian. On expressing my regret in a well-informed quarter, I was assured that the young artist had never seen a picture of Titian, or even a copy. I need scarcely say that the imitation (as I thought it) was longo intervallo, but there was so much unconscious talent in the portraits, and more especially such a fine idea of colour, that I am the more surprised at the result.

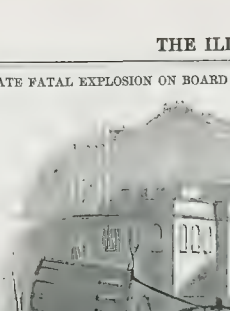
From the foregoing brief sketch, all will be seen that the Dusseldorf School, even as it is, is not to be lightly passed over. It is certainly rising, although its schools and processes do not develop such great results as those of Munich. But of the pupils it is scarcely possible to find there must be an enormous mass of mediocrity; but, much of the evil is to be attributed to the system pursued, which warps talent where it does not repress its development. Even the best of the artists who came with Schadow from Berlin have been over-praised into carelessness and bad taste. They are surrounded by false imagination without true power. The most talent is displayed by the landscape painters, and the painters de genre, on whom, no doubt, the high historical school look down. It is to every Englishman's interest that all art, as soon as possible, should develop as well. We shall meet with some of their works when we get to Munich; but, in the meantime, those of your readers who are interested in art will not object to receive this short summary of the present state of the Dusseldorf School.

THE THEATRES.

The lull in the theatrical world still continues; unless, to use another novel phrase, it has been disturbed by "the sound of preparation." The re-coloration of DRURY LANE is proceeding, so that the theatre will be ready for opening, with its memorable CONCERTS, on the 1st of October. The embellishments will be in gold and white, and will, we hope, add to the already astonishing magnificence of the SURREY. Of the LYCEUM we hear little, except that Mr MATTHEWS is making an extravaganza for the opening night. SADLER'S WELLS and the MARYLEBONE Theatre continue to be well attended. At the latter, the "School for Scandal" was produced on Thursday evening. The pièce de resistance, on the bill of Shakspere's House, at the ADELPHI, will have a run, probably, stimulated by the Auction on Thursday. The HAYMARKET opera are to assemble in the early part of the 25th, preparatory to commencing the season on the 2nd. The last opera-season has taken place at the SURREY GARDENS, and the VAUXHALL Dahlia Show has been a great success.

The latest, however, will be found in our Correspondent's letter. Another Correspondent writes "the last new chevaux de bataille at the Garrick

THE LATE FATAL EXPLOSION ON BOARD THE "CRICKET."



THE "CRICKET" STEAMED, AFTER THE LATE EXPLOSION.

THE adjourned inquest on the bodies of the unfortunate persons killed by the recent explosion on board the Cricket steamer, was resumed before Mr Bedford, at St. Martin's Workhouse, on Tuesday.

Mr. M. Chambers, Q.C., attended on behalf of the proprietors of the boat; Mr. James on behalf of the Messrs Crake, the constructors of the vessel and machinery; Mr. M'Intyre on the part of the relatives of the deceased John Buckley.

Jacket Edwards, of No. 6, Perseverance place, Ratcliffe highway, stoker, was sworn. He said that in the latter end of June, 1846, he joined the Cricket steamer as stoker. Remained in her for about six weeks. In the beginning of April in the present year he joined her again, and remained for about a month. That was the last time he was employed in her. Occasionally he drove the engine a journey or two in the absence of the engineer. Cannot state the last time when he done so, but he drove the engine on both occasions. He has been accustomed to engine-driving, but not generally. During the time Mr. Kent was there, everything was correct. Was informed that the engine was a high pressure engine. Was told so by Mr. Kent, the engineer of the boat. Mr. Kent had repeatedly cautioned him against meddling in any way with the engine in his absence, as it was a high pressure engine. Never saw anything happen to the machinery or boiler while Kent remained, or until Clarke succeeded him. Thomas Clarke succeeded Kent as engine driver in the beginning of April last. After Clarke had been there some few days, the boat began to lose her speed very much. Cannot account for that, unless that there was a great escape of steam from the trunnions. That was through Clarke's neglect. The escape of steam was a great deal more than previously. Would account for it by the packing not being properly attended to by Clarke. There were frequent complaints made by the captain of the decrease of speed. Spoke captain spoke to witness repeatedly about it. At that time Clarke tied down both the safety valves. He did so by tying a piece of spun-yarn from the lever of the valves outside the weight, which was then brought down in front of the boiler and attached to two spike nails drove in the beam. The string was so tight that, when fastened down, it was impossible for the valves to act. Saw the valves in that condition almost continually for upwards of a fortnight. Occasionally the valves were let loose on the boat coming alongside of the pier, but never when under way. Has frequently let them go on coming alongside the pier when Clarke's back was turned. Clarke always made them fast again the moment he heard the steam going off, and would rebuke witness for letting them go. Witness frequently spoke to him about it. Told him that he had better mind what he was about, or that something would occur. Said to him on one occasion, "My life is as sweet as yours, and though you are Sodbardy I am not;" and Clarke at once replied, "My life is as sweet as yours: mind your own business." The engines would often get hot. Never saw them get hot except when the valves were tied down, or before Clarke came on board. Never saw them get hot at other times, except when the boat had been waiting for four or five hours alongside of a pier in foggy weather, with the steam up. The engines would get so hot when the valves were tied down, that they would not condense the steam. Witness spoke to the captain repeatedly about it. On one occasion the captain asked him what he thought would happen, and witness said the probable consequence would be, that every one on board would be blown up and killed. One Friday, when Clarke was called on board the Bee, an engineer, named Buttress, came down in his place, and on seeing the valves tied down, he ran over with both his hands stretched out, and unloosed both of them. On the Sunday in April, two of Clarke's friends came on board, and brought gin with them. Witness brought another pint of gin down for them, and Clarke became intoxicated. Witness left off steam and slackened the firm, and went above. He heard the steam stop blowing off, and, on going down, saw the valves tied. Spoke to Clarke about it, and went and untied the valves. Clarke made them fast again, and told witness to mind his own business. There were 400 persons on board at the time, the boat being alongside the Adelphi-pier. Witness shortly after heard a noise in the boiler, as if the plates were stretching, or giving, and again spoke to Clarke, but without effect, and then went and spoke to the captain of the danger. There was a steam gange on board. Their usual force of going was forty degrees; but, when the valves were tied down, the mercury would rise to 44 degrees, and then the mercury would get mixed with water and steam, and become confused, so that no one could tell at what height the gange was. Never heard what pressure the engine was intended to bear, but, no doubt, that fact was made known to the engineer. Has seen the gange rise as far as 90 pounds on the square inch, the safety valves would rise up and let the steam blow off, unless a pressure were put upon them.

To the Jury: I am not certain whether I ever saw the valves rise at 36lbs. I have nothing more to add, except that I have seen Clarke place a fire-bar, weighing about 14lbs across the levers of the valves, and he would then regulate the pressure by moving that backwards and forwards. When he brought it nearer the end of the lever there was more pressure. This was done when the valves were tied. There was no ill-will between me and Clarke, except that we often had words about the tying down of the valves. Clarke would say, "Mind your own business: I must make the boat go, and the only way to do that is to keep the steam on." When I complained to the captain he told the superintendent. On the Saturday after the occurrence that I have spoken of on Sunday, I was discharged. I went to Mr. Smith to know the cause of my being discharged. Mr. Smith said it was in consequence of the oration I made on the Sunday before. I said I thought I ought to be remunerated instead of blamed for that, and he said that in consequence of the loud tone in which I spoke to the captain, a great many persons had left the boat. What I said to the captain on the Sunday was, "If you allow these practices to be carried on by Clarke, sooner or later you will have an accident."

Cross-examined: I was on board three vessels since April last, and discharged from all, but I have characters from all of them. I was first on board the Rapid, and discharged on account of asking the captain for money when from home. I was discharged from the Mountaineer because all hands on board quarrelled with the chief mate about working at night. I was also on board the Rapid, but it was only because I was employed temporarily during the illness of the engineer, and I was discharged when he recovered. I was not discharged from the Bee in consequence of a quarrel with Mr. Poletti. I was about three weeks on board the Cricket with Clarke. The passengers could see the strings on the valves from the deck. Clarke commenced first by tying the larboard valve, as it was fewer than the other; but finding that not enough, he tied the other. There were 400 persons on board at the time, the boat being alongside the Adelphi-pier. Witness shortly after heard a noise in the boiler, as if the plates were stretching, or giving, and again spoke to Clarke, but without effect, and then went and spoke to the captain of the danger. The passengers could see the strings on the valves from the deck. Clarke commenced first by tying the larboard valve, as it was fewer than the other; but finding that not enough, he tied the other. There were four safety valves, but two of them were screw valves, which I did not understand. There was one valve on each boiler tied down. The gauge to indicate the pressure was marked as high as two hundred, but when it rose to forty-four, we could not tell the exact height of it, as it became confused with the water. In one minute after I saw the gauge at forty-four, the mercury would be in that confused state.

Mr. W. Williams examined: I live at Ashford, in Kent. I am an engineer. I volunteer my evidence. About two months since I was a passenger on board the Cricket steamer. I was down from the deck when I saw a piece of one of the safety-valve loose and removed. I saw the valve was tied. I am certain the safety-valve was tied down. I remarked the circumstance to my brother, but did not make any particular observation. I have not travelled in the Cricket since. I noticed the valve being tied down for a period of three or four minutes during the voyage.

By the Jury: I did not mention the circumstance to any one besides my brother. I considered it unusual and unsafe to fasten the valve. I am not connected with the company that the Little Britain steam-vessel belongs to. I saw a rope attached to the valve, but I did not notice an iron bar.

By Mr. Chambers: I touched the strings attached to the safety-valve; they were quite tight. (This witness underwent a lengthened examination, but it was purely of a technical nature, explaining drawings and models which have been made.)

Mr. Cummin Reid, of No. 5, King-street, Snow-hill, musical-instrument manufacturer, examined: On the Sunday evening before the explosion I was a passenger on board the Cricket steamer. I looked down at the boiler, and saw a string as thick as my finger attached to the lever of the safety valve on my right. I was standing near the funnel. I then looked through the opening on my left, and I saw a similar string attached to the valve there. I did not touch the string less it should be any harm to do so. I merely made the remark, "You don't catch me taking another halfpenny-worth." (Laughter.) The strings were attached while I remained on board, after I first saw them. They were straight down and apparently tight, and I think they could only be loosened from the deck while the engine remained hot. I made up my mind that the object was to force the vessel to go beyond her power.

Mr. Henry Cruice, of 11, Adam-street, Adelphi, surveyor, examined: I was on board the Cricket boat at the time of the explosion. I only noticed that there was no escape of steam during the time I was on board. I was on board from four to five minutes before the explosion took place. The boat was attached to the pier and was afloat at the time

William Warren, 12, Diana-place, New-road, engineer, examined: Is employed in the King's College workshop. Has been on board the Cricket, and noticed the safety valves. The first time he noticed them was about the middle of April last. On arriving at the London-bridge pier, he remained on board, with the intention of returning in the boat to the Adelphi. After a minute or two, he observed that there was no steam escaping, and he then looked into the steam box, and discovered a piece of spun yarn attached to the lever of the safety valve. It was tied as near the end farthest from the fulcrum as it could be. Went immediately down into the engine-room. Saw a man smoking there, but nobody else. On looking round, he saw two ropes attached, one to each valve. There was one valve to each boiler tied. Both the ropes were fixed to the beam, but whether by nails or staples he could not say. He touched the ropes, and found them tremendously tight. They were very tight indeed, and they operated in this way, that the safety valve was no safety valve at all with them. He made an observation to the man that was stoking, who said, "Oh, that is nothing." He replied, "Oh, ain't it." He immediately went up, and got to the furthest part of the boat. Was on board again about the end of the same month, and he then found the valves at liberty, and the steam blew off when they got to the pier. Was on board again on the Wednesday or Thursday before the blow up. Found that both the valves were fastened down then, as on the first occasion. Did not go below then, and got off the boat as soon as he could.

Mr John D Smith, of Bedford-square, distiller, was then examined with regard to the ownership of the boat. He stated that the boat was the joint property of himself; Mr. William Curry, of Verulam-buildings, Gray's Inn-lane; Mr. Alderman Thompson; and Mr. William Forman, of the iron-works, London-road. The Cricket boat and machinery were built by Mr. Joyce, by contract. He has been constantly on board, hoping by his presence to keep everything in order, and that those on board did their duty. Never heard anything about the safety-valves being tied until the quarrel between the boat and the engineer which they had heard of in the evidence. Was in the habit of going below, but did not notice the valves tied. It was barely possible that such a thing might have occurred without his seeing it, as he could not imagine that such a thing would be attempted, and did not look for it. He had lost one of his eyes during the past year, and could not since then see as well as previously, but still he thinks he would have noticed such a thing, if it had been done. The engineers have the power of choosing their own stokers, as it is supposed that they are best able to judge of the capabilities of the men. He spoke to Clarke, the engineer, who was reported to have committed the act, and he denied it, saying that he had never done any such thing. He told Clarke of the charge made against him on the very day or the day after he heard it. The man who made the complaint had not at the time the good opinion of any person employed by the company; whereas, witness had a high opinion of Clarke, who was recommended to him as a superintendent engineer by Mr. Meecham. He was very anxious to get a thoroughly good mechanic as superintendent engineer, and Mr. Joyce agreed with him on the point. Clarke put up an engine for him at the distillery, nearly similar to that in the Cricket, and which was made by Mr. Joyce; and, as he understood the principle of the engine, and had acted for some months as a fireman to Mr. Joyce, the Company thought he was as good a man as they could have, both to attend the engine and to watch the working of the machinery. Witness, therefore, took the recommendation of the charge as satisfactory. Witness said to Edwards, "If you had such a complaint to make, why not come to me, or some party having authority to interfere, instead of making the charge in public?"

By the Jury: Did you follow up the charge by making inquiries of other persons?

Witness: I did not. I knew that Clarke had enemies, from the responsible situation which he filled; and from the high opinion which I entertained of him, I took his own contradiction of the charge as being sufficient. He had been recommended to me as the best-informed man on the subject in Mr. Joyce's workshop. I spoke to Mr. Meecham about him in the first instance, and Mr. Meecham highly approved of my selection, and negotiated the arrangement for me afterwards with Clarke. He was paid considerable wages, and in order to show that we wished to get only superior men, I would be happy to lay before the Jury a statement of the wages which we paid to our men. We took care to pay them from 1s to 20 per cent higher than any other company on the river. Clarke was paid £3 a-week, the other engineer £2 10s 6d, and the stokers £1 8s a-week each. I referred all engineering matters to Mr. Joyce, as I had the fullest confidence in him, and as I did not wish to take any responsibility from him in anything that could prevent the slightest chance of accident. My contract with him was that he should give me efficient strong boilers, capable of bearing a pressure of from 40lbs. to 50lbs. on the square inch. The boilers had been at Mr. Joyce's for examination on the 7th of August, and again, I think, on the 10th, but I was myself at the time in Scotland. With regard to the safety valves, I wish to remark that there were four attached to the boilers, which were connected together. There were two of what are termed Salter's safety valves, on the back part, which were never touched, and the two front ones were lever valves. So many valves are not necessary for letting off steam in case of rapid generation, but for the purpose of security, in case any of them should stick or get fastened down. It is not easy for four to get fastened down, though one may

Mr. Horne, a Juror: Has it come to your notice that the practice of tying down the valves has been continued in your boats since that explosion?—Mr. Smith: Certainly not. Such a thing cannot be imagined.

Mr. Horne: Then I declare to you that on Saturday last I was on board one of your boats, and on looking down I distinctly saw the levers of the valves fastened down. I state the fact for your information. [Sensation.]

Joseph Corsiopher Buttress examined: I live at No. 3, Thames-street, Greenwich. I am in the employ of Mr. Joyce. I have occasionally driven the engines when the regular engineer was not able to attend. The last time I did so was the 27th March. There is a saying of fuel by turning the steam twice. About the last week in April I attended the Cricket as driver, at the request of Clark. I was not aware that the safety-valves had been fastened until I had been on board an hour. I did not think to look. Clarke, when I went on board said, "I'm all right, Joe; take her away." As soon as I found the valves tied I assisted in loosening the cords by which they were fastened. The rope was tied several times round the safety-valve; it was very tight. I cut it off. I have been on the Cricket on occasions when no rope was attached to the valves. A day or two after I found the valves tied down. I charged Clark with having done it. He denied it. Edwards and the stoker also charged Clark with fastening them, but he again denied it. Shortly after this Edwards was discharged from his situation. The last time I was on the Cricket was the 3rd of August; the ropes were then hanging loose from the safety-valves

At the conclusion of this witness's examination, a desultory conversation ensued between the Coroner, counsel, and other persons engaged in the enquiry, after which the investigation was adjourned until Wednesday.

The proceedings were resumed on Wednesday. The first witness called was Richard Pater, a stoker in the employ of the Ant and Bee Company. His evidence chiefly referred to the statements of Clarke. The witness said that he never saw the valves tied down at any time, and that they were not tied down at the time of the explosion. Pater was cross-examined at some length, but nothing of consequence was elicited.

George Hall, of Regent-street, Blackwall, waterman: I was mate of the Cricket about seven months, up to the time of the explosion. I then went to the Echo. I don't understand the machinery. Sometimes the boat went slow. I was never more than twice or thrice in the engine room. I have seen Clarke working the engine. I cannot say I know what a safety-valve is. Was not in the engine-room on the day of the explosion. Don't know whether Clarke was then there. Halsman was acting as engineer that day. Nothing had happened to the boat that morning before the explosion, except that we had to take a "float" or two. Clarke and I are good friends. I have seen him this morning, but nothing passed about the boat. In fact, I know nothing about it. I had left the boat on my duty for about ten minutes before the explosion. I had gone up to the office, and was on the pier on my way back to the boat, when the explosion took place. Never heard on board that Clarke had once tied up the valve. The steam was blowing off just before the explosion.

The witness also underwent a long but fruitless cross-examination. The Coroner questioned him as to whether he had really heard steam blow off before the explosion, or whether he alluded to the noise of the explosion; but, his answers were so confusedly equivocal, that, for a length of time, he continued to puzzle every one who heard him. At length, he said distinctly, I heard the steam blowing off as I went up the pier.

Benjamin Nash, secretary to the Ant and Bee Company, said: I keep a report-book, to enter the statements made to me by the captains. There is only one entry—that made by the captain, in reference to the charge of Edwards against Clarke, for tying down the valves. Mr. Nash produced the book. The entry was in the following terms:—"25th April, 1847.—Started at a quarter to ten. About three o'clock the stoker came on deck and said the engineer had got the valves tied down, and it was not safe to stop in the engine-room." On cross-examination, Mr. Nash said, he travelled by the boats daily, and he should have attended to any complaint, if made to him.

Joseph Whelden, of Russell street, Blackwall, formast-hand on board the Cricket: I have been employed thus since the 14th of May. I was in the engine-room on the day before the explosion. I don't recollect anything being the matter with the machinery on that or the following day. I noticed the safety-valves the day before the explosion. I saw the engineer take off the casing and lift up the valve. I never saw a string tied to the lever of the valves. I have seen Clarke in the engine-room. I know no more about safety-valves than they know about me. Clarke never said anything to me about the safety-valve or about the machinery. A week before Halsman came I heard Clarke say the boat was in better order than ever she was. I was on board at the moment of the explosion. About half-past eight on the morning of the explosion I thought something was on fire, and looked at the safety-valve.

Mr. James: Upon your oath, had it not a piece of rope round it at that time?

Witness: I did not take that notice. I did not see that it had. It is not my business to attend to those things. I have been in the engine-room, but have never noticed the spun-yarns hanging down.

Some other evidence was given, but it was unimportant, and the inquiry was then adjourned till Saturday (this day).

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.—On Tuesday next, being St. Matthew's Day, the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Sheriffs, with the Governors of the several Royal Hospitals, will attend divine service at Christ's Church, Newgate-street, where a sermon will be preached by the Rev. George Townsend Warner, M.A., Assistant Master of Harrow School, after which they will repair to the Great Hall in Christ's Hospital, where orations on the benefits of the Royal Hospitals will be delivered, according to annual custom, by the four Senior Scholars, who are about to proceed to the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge; the first in Latin, by Edward Hayman; the second in English, by John Daniel Williams; the third in Greek, by Charles Edward Searle, and the fourth in French, by William Allaz Russell. Fifteen poems will also be recited, by the other Senior Scholars, viz.:—A Latin Alcaic Ode, on "Marcus Curtius," by H. C. Hellbronn; a Greek Iambic translation of Milton's "Invocation to Light," by J. L. Hammond; Stanzas on "The New Planet," by R. W. Thompson; a Hexameter translation from Goldsmith's "Deserted Village," by C. D. Craven; a Greek Sapphic Ode (a translation of Gray's "Ode to Spring") by E. Black; Latin Elegiacs on "Antigone," by J. Helward; and an English Poem, on "The Creation," by G. H. Crund.

THE NEW LORD MAYOR.—At a Court of Aldermen, which was held on Tuesday, Mr. Alderman Sidney asked Mr. Alderman Wood whether it was his intention on Monday next to propose the return of Mr. Alderman Hooper as the next in rotation to serve the office of Lord Mayor. Mr. Alderman Wood said, the support he had received last year, and expected on that present occasion, would have encouraged him to do so, but the very precarious state of his wife's health forbade it. She was in a state that rendered it impossible that she could take her part in the honours and hospitalities of the Mansion-house during the coming year, and he should therefore decline serving. Mr. Alderman Hooper will therefore probably be returned without opposition.

CITY OF LONDON REGISTRATION.—Mr. Thomas Young M'Christie, the barrister appointed to revise the list of voters for the City of London, held his first sitting on Thursday morning, in the Court of Common Pleas, Guildhall. The entire morning was occupied in receiving and disposing of the different lists of voters. The lists are in the hands of the barrister are likely to be of a very arduous nature, as no less than 9782 votes will have to be inquired into. In this list of objections, 609 have been taken by both parties, which will reduce the number for inquiry to 9614.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS IN THE METROPOLIS.—The total number of births during the week ending Sept. 11, was 1477, of which 749 were boys, and 728 girls. The number is less than that of last week by 18. The deaths number 1140 (619 males, and 521 females), thus exceeding the weekly average of the last five summers by 100, less than the number of the preceding week by 11, and less than the births by 237.

DEATH OF SIR JOHN BURKE, BART. On Monday last Sir John Burke, Bart., was attacked with a fit of apoplexy, which terminated fatally on Tuesday morning, at the house of his son, Mr. Granby Burke, in Dublin. He is succeeded in the title and estates by his eldest son, Captain (now Sir Thomas) Burke, late of the 1st Royal Dragoons, and member for the county of Galway. The late Baronet was a Roman Catholic, and a supporter of the Whig Government.

SALE OF THE LATE MR. O'CONNELL'S EFFECTS.—On Thursday (last week) a sale by auction took place at the residence of the late Mr. O'Connell, of a variety of articles of household furniture; and curiosity with many, and a personal feeling on the part of others, attracted large numbers to Merrion-square. The rooms were crowded during the course of the day, and every part of the spacious residence examined; but of the late occupant there was little or nothing in the property sold to suggest a memento. The furniture was solid, but plain, and number books nor pictures were put under the hammer. In the hall there were large trunks, directed for Derrynane Abbey, marked "Law Books," and vacant spaces on the walls showed where pictures had formerly been; but these articles were not offered for sale. The entire sale realised very good prices; but from the circumstance alluded to the details of the sale do not call for any especial notice.

FRIGHTFUL MURDER IN GALWAY COUNTY.—A horrible murder was perpetrated on Tuesday night (last week), in the neighbourhood of Mount Bellew. It appears that a man named Patrick Costello, a driver in the employment of James Cuffe, Esq., of Esker, was returning from that town (to the petty sessions of which he had a number of persons summoned for trespass, &c., that day), he was waylaid by a party of men, who literally pounded his head to atoms. An inquest was held, and the Jury returned a verdict of wilful murder against persons unknown. Four men have been arrested on suspicion of having committed the atrocious deed. They have been committed to prison. This unfortunate Costello was driver and wood-ranger to Mr Cuffe, and one of the persons arrested occupied the same situation before Costello got it. This barbarous murder seems to have been perpetrated by striking their wretched victim with stones. His chin was broken, his teeth knocked out, and literally scattered on the road, and his ear cut in two; his nose was also broken, and his head dreadfully fractured.

SUSPICIOUS MURDER OF TWO GIRLS AT THEIR MOTHER.—An inquest has been held at Drumcondra, relative to the supposed murder of two children named Rosannah and Mary Anne Flynn. Much excitement prevailed in the neighbourhood. The murder is in custody on suspicion. A great number of witnesses were examined, after which the Coroner recapitulated the evidence. He said that there was no question that the elder girl had been drowned, and the younger strangled. The statement which the prisoner had made had been contradicted by several witnesses; but it was for the Jury to say if she had or had not committed the murder. The Jury found that Bridget Flynn did grievously assault, beat, and ill-use Rosannah Flynn, on Thursday, the 2nd September; also, with a stick, on the 4th instant; and that there was strong suspicion that she murdered both the children. The prisoner was committed to Kilmainham.

THE CHALMERS MSS.—The late Dr. Chalmers has left a quantity of unpublished manuscripts, among which is a Commentary on the Scriptures, as far as the Book of Jeremiah. The commentary differs in its plan from the Commentaries of Poole, Henry, Scott, and Clarke, as it is written in a manner which will render it popular among all classes of Christians. Among the manuscripts fully written out, and in a fit state for publication, are also the series of Lectures which he, as Professor of Divinity in the University of Edinburgh, addressed to the students whose theological education was committed to his care. These lectures are understood to be singularly original and brilliant. There has likewise been found among the correspondence which Dr. Chalmers carried on with nearly all the distinguished men of the present century, a number of letters of a deeply interesting nature, sufficient to make, with a memoir of himself, four large octavo volumes. The whole of the rev. gentleman's manuscripts have been bought by Mr. Thomas Constable, brother-in-law of Mr. Cowan, the new member for Edinburgh, and son of Mr. Constable, the friend of Sir Walter Scott, and publisher of all his works. Mr. Cowan has given the enormous sum of £10,000 for Dr. Chalmers's manuscripts. The largest sum ever given, under similar circumstances, was £4,800, which Mr. Murray gave to the sons of Mr. Wilberforce for his "Life and Correspondence."

SHAKESPERE AND STRATFORD-UPON-AVON.

ANNE HATHAWAY'S COTTAGE, AT SHOTTERY, NEAR STRATFORD.

COTTAGE OF ANNE HATHAWAY.

We have no record of the place where Shakspere was married, but the marriage bond discovered by Sir Richard Phillips in the Consistorial Court, satisfactorily corroborates the information which Betterton had given to Rowe, that "his wife was the daughter of one Hathaway, said to have been a substantial yeoman, in the neighbourhood of Stratford." The bond in question is dated 28th Nov., 25th of Elizabeth (1582), and she is there described "Anne Hathwey, of Stratford, in the Dioces of Worcester, Maiden." This description of her being "of Stratford," must not be taken as proof that she was not of Shottery, for Shottery is a hamlet of Stratford, and such a document would take cognizance only of the parish to which the contracting parties belonged. At Shottery, the Hathaways had been settled long before the time of Shakespere's marriage. By a copy of Court-roll dated 1543, we find that John Hathaway, at that period, held a copyhold estate at Shottery, and the identical farm-house or cottage remained in the possession of descendants of the Hathaways until 1838, when it was sold. Tradition has associated this cottage of the Shottery Hathaways with the Anne Hathaway of William Shakespere, and hence it has always been an object of peculiar attraction to the visitors of Stratford. The hamlet is not more than a mile from Stratford. "On reaching the place, we find the dwellings numerous, and most of them conveniently detached by intervening garden ground; so that it stretches over a considerable space. In most instances, too, little has been done to impair the character of the tenements, which are still chiefly timber-framed, as in the Poet's day. The memory of this, its most important visitor, seems to be yet cherished by the inmates; judging, among other circumstances, from that sign, 'The Shakespeare Tavern,' which, from your rustic alehouse, invites the straggler to its cool stoned-kitchen, its little boarded 'parlour,' or adjoining rural skittle-ground, fringed with Ophelian pansies, and columbines, and herb-grace. But leaving this, and having crossed the brook, we gain sight of the dwelling we are searching for. Its aspect is that of a roomy old farm-house divested of its former homestead, and altered in other respects. The walls are roughly framed with timber, the intervals in which are mostly filled with wattling and rude plaster—latha being of later date; and the high-pitched roof is snugly covered in with moss-grown thatch. The orchards, which till recently adjoined the house, are now severed from the premises, and the old garden between them is rooted up, the present being of yesterday's construction."

INTERIOR OF THE COTTAGE.

Within the dwelling we find the kitchen as of old—then the chief living room—retaining still its ample hearth and roomy chimney corner, where, in winter time, the cosiest seats were reserved for the heads of the household, and an occasional guest: and that old short-backed elbow chair, now standing in it, looks verily as though it had been just occupied by him who was wont to visit here two hundred and sixty years ago. Whose tabard it covered by a [illegible] bore the initials "J. H." [illegible] and "J. H.," which are supposed to be [illegible] Hathaway, [illegible] his wife, and the joiner. The walls exhibit portions of the black oaken wainscot, with which the rough plastering was formerly concealed; while the rude stone floor, the low ceiling, with its heavy beams, the unpainted doors and wooden latch, are alike primitive and in character. In a bed-room above, remains an old oak carved bedstead of the Tudor or Stuart times; and in an adjoining chest is preserved a nearly contemporary sample of heavy home-spun bed linen, marked "E. H.," the needle-wrought ornamenting of which may justly cause even our lady wool-workers of the day to admire the taste and patience of their great-great-grandmothers.—May's Companion.

ROOM IN ANNE HATHAWAY'S COTTAGE.

THE TOMB OF SHAKESPERE.

From the town, the approach to the Church is through an avenue of limetrees, arched overhead; this terminates at the north entrance into the nave, which consists of a handsome porch, buttressed and embattled, and apparently of a later date than the adjoining aisle. Above the door is a pointed window, now covered with a tablet, but which formerly gave light to a small room over the porch, the entrance to which is by a staircase in the north aisle. The first impression upon entering through the porch is one of grateful wonder at the elegance and amplitude of the interior. At a glance we scan the lofty roof, the transepts, chancel, nave, and aisles. We catch the delicate tracery of the windows, and their "dim, religious light;" we see the noble monuments and stately effigies; but the mind refuses yet to ponder on these things—> a touch more rare

> Subdues all other thoughts—and noiselessly we hasten forward, 'till, with moistened eyes and swelling heart, we reach the well-known spot where sleeps the mighty Monarch of the Mind, before whose influence all other potentates seem nought—whose > roar'd arm

> Crested the world—whose voice was propertied
> As all the tuned spheres, and that to friends:
> But, when he meant to quail and shake the orb,
> Who was as rattling thunder.

There is something indescribably awful and affecting in the sense of contiguity, even, with the mouldering dust of Shakespere, and we found it a relief when a friend, as if responding to our impression, whispered—

> I never felt, in all its power, the majesty of Shakespere's greatness till I stood upon his narrow grave.

The far-famed mural monument and bust are on the left of the chancel, immediately above the line of graves containing the remains of the Poet, his daughter Susanna, her husband, Dr. Hall, and their daughter, Lady Barnard; and, in all probability, many others of the family. The bust is of the size of life, and stands fixed under an arch between two Corinthian columns of black marble; upon the entablature are the arms of Shakespere (surmounted by a skull), and two small figures sitting, one holding in his right hand a spade; and the other, whose eyes are closed, having in his left hand an inverted torch, and his right resting upon a skull. The sculptor of the monument, we gather from Mr. Hamper's lately-published Life and Correspondence of Dugdale, was Gerard Johnson, and from the verses of Leonard Digger, prefixed to the first edition of Shakespere's Works, it was evidently erected before 1623:—

> Shakespere, at length thy pious fellows give
> The world thy works; thy works by which outlive
> Thy tomb thy name must: when that stone is rent,
> And time dissolves thy Stratford monument,
> Here we alive shall view thee still. This book,
> When brass and marble fade, shall make thee look
> Fresh to all ages.

Originally, the bust was coloured to resemble life. The hands and face were of flesh colour, the eyes of a light hazel, and the hair and beard auburn. The doublet, or coat, was scarlet; over which was a loose black tabard, or gown, without sleeves. The upper part of the cushions, on which his hand rests, was green, the under half crimson, and the tassels gilt. Mr. John Ward, grandfather to Mrs. Siddons and Mr. Kemble, had it repaired, and the original colours preserved, in 1748; but, in 1793, says Britton, "Mr. Malone caused the bust to be covered over with one or more coats of white paint, and thus at once destroyed its original character, and injured the expression of the face."

Upon the tablet beneath the bust, are the following inscriptions:—

[illegible] IVDICIO SOCRATEM, ARTE MARONEM,
TERRA TEGIT, POPVLVS MAERET, OLYMPVS HABET.

LEAVES LIVING ART BVT PAGE TO SERVE HIS WITT.
OBIIT ANO. DOL. 1616. ÆTATIS 53. DIE 23 AP.

Below the monument, upon the stone covering the Poet's grave, are the following extraordinary lines :—

GOOD FREND FOR JESVS SAKE FORBEARE, TO DIG THE DVST ENCLOASED HEARE:
BLESTE BE YE MAN YT SPARES THES STONES,
AND CVRST BE HE YT MOVES MY BONES.

In a letter from Warwickshire, in 1693 (published by Mr. Rodd, from the original manuscript, 1838), the writer, after describing the monument, and giving its inscription, says:—"Near the wall where this monument is erected, lies the plain freestone, underneath which his body is buried, with this epitaph, made by himself, a little before his death." He subsequently adds:—"Not one, for fear of the curse above-said, dare touch his grave-stone, though his wife and daughters did earnestly desire to be laid in the same grave with him." We have here authority for the existence of the epitaph 77 years after Shakespere's death; but there is a still earlier authority. In a plate to Dugdale's "Antiquities of Warwickshire," first published in 1656, there is a representation of Shakespere's tomb, with the following passage:—"Neare the wall where this monument is erected lyeth a plain freestone, underneath which his body is buried, with this epitaph—

Good Friend, &c."

It has been conjectured that Shakespere's anxiety for the repose of his bones might have arisen from there being a door immediately below his bust, which formerly gave access to the charnel-house. And, indeed, from various passages in his plays, it is clear that he looked with horror at the desecration of the bones of the dead.

But, whoever may have been the author of the lines, we owe him gratitude for the effectual preservation of these sacred relics, for upwards of two hundred years; and we trust the simple but impressive denunciation will still secure them undisturbed.

Between Shakespere's grave and the north wall, Anne, the wife of the Poet, lies buried; she died 6th August, 1623, aged 67. The stone has a brass plate, with the following inscription:—

HEERE LYETH INTERRED THE BODYE OF ANNE, WIFE OF MR. WILLIAM SHAKSPEARE, WHO DEP'TED THIS LIFE THE 6TH OF AUGUST, 1623, BEING OF THE AGE OF 67 YEARES.

On the other side of Shakespere's grave is a flat stone, bearing the inscription :—

HERE LYETH YE BODY OF SCHANNA, WIFE TO JOHN HALL, GENT., YE DAUGHTER OF WILLIAM SHAKSPEARE, GENT. SHE DECEASED YE 11TH OF JULY AO. 1649. AGED 66.

Then follow some verses, which were formerly obliterated to make room for an inscription to a Richard Watts, a person in no way related to the family, but which the good taste and feeling of the Rev. W. Harness have latterly restored:

WITTY ABOVE HER SEXE, BVT THAT'S NOT ALL,
WISE TO SALVATION, WAS GOOD MISTRESS HALL;
SOMTHING OF SHAKSPEARE WAS IN THAT, BVT THIS WHOLY OF HIM WITH WHOM HE'S NOW IN BLISSE.
THEN, PASSENGER, HAST NE'RE A TEARE
TO WEEP WITH HER THAT WEPT WITH ALL?
THAT WEPT, YET SET HERSELF TO CHEARE
THEM UP WITH COMFORTS CORDIALL.
HER LOVE SHALL LIVE, HER MERCY SPREAD,
WHEN THOO HAST NE'RE A TEARE TO SHED.

On another flat stone is an inscription to the memory of Dr. John Hall, the husband of Shakespere's daughter Susanna. He died 25th of November, 1635, aged 60.

And, farther on, the grave of Thomas Nashe, Esq., who married the daughter "and heire" of the above John Hall. He died April 4th, 1647, aged 58.

Upon quitting the Church we had the opportunity of inspecting the valuable collection of documents illustrative of Shakespere's life, in the possession of Mr. Wheeler, a gentleman to whom the public are indebted for much interesting topographical information regarding, the town of Stratford, and many important particulars concerning the family of the Poet.

Among a host of curious relics are the original deeds of sale and purchase of lands by Shakespere near his native town. Mr. Wheeler is also in possession of a heavy gold signet ring, with the initials W. S., combined with cord and tassels, engraved on it, which was found some years since in a field near Shakespere's garden; and which, there is strong reason for believing the actual seal ring of the Poet. That it is of that age is shown by the exact resemblance of the engraving to several impressions of seals to deeds, &c., of the period—and that the initials referred to Shakespere, may be inferred from the circumstance of there being no other person of consequence in Stratford at that period with such initials but William Smith, whose signet ring is known to be different. There is another remarkable and corroborative fact, viz., that in the original of Shakespere's will dated 25th of March, 1616, less than a month before his death, the words, with "my hand and seal," are written; but the words, "and seal," have been struck through with the pen, and no impression of his seal is given.

TOMB OF SIR THOMAS LUCY, IN THE CHANCEL OF CHARLECOTE CHURCH.

SIR THOMAS LUCY'S TOMB.

A short distance from Charlecote Hall, stands the quiet little Church of Charlecote, as primitive as in the days of Shakespere. You enter through an old porch with rude stone seats on either side, and find an interior with an air as picturesque and humble as the outside promised. This is the last resting-place of the Lucys, and your attention is at once attracted by three costly monuments of the family. The one of chief interest is that of the Sir Thomas whom Shakespere has made immortal. His wife, the Ladye Joyce Lucy, is buried in the same grave; and the two figures are represented in the customary recumbent attitude, with their hands folded in prayer. Two lesser figures, representing their children, kneel beneath; and from a tablet above the tomb we copied the following unaffected and touching inscription :—

Here entombed lyeth the Lady Joyce Lucy, wife of Sir Thomas Lucy, of Charlecote, in the County of Warwick, Knight—daughter and heir of Sir Thomas Acton, of Sutton, in the County of Worcester, Esquire, who departed out of this wretched world to her heavenly kingdom the tenth day of February, in the year of our Lord God 1595, and of her age IX. and three. All the time of her life a true and faithful servant of her good God, never detected of any crime or vice: in religion most sound: in love to her husband most faithful and true: in friendship most constant: to what in trust was committed to her most secret: in wisdom excelling: in governing of her house, and bringing up of youth in the feare of God that did converse with her, most rare and singular. A great maintainer of hospitality: greatly esteemed of her betters: misliked of none unless of the evious. When all is spoken that can be said, a woman so furnished and garnished with virtue as not to be bettered and hardly to be equalled by any. As she lived most virtuously, so she dyed most godly. Set down by him that best did know what hath been written to be true. Thomas Lucy.

There is no tribute of any kind, except by effigy, to Sir Thomas Lucy. In a small vestry opposite this tomb is the monument of his son Thomas, erected by Dame Constance, his lady, daughter and heiress to Richard Kingswill. This tomb has no inscription. It is a painted monument, and he is represented, like his father, in armour, and recumbent. On a ledge in front there is a small-sized effigy of his lady, and, in panels, one on each side, are the figures of six sons and eight daughters.

The third monument is to the memory of the next Sir Thomas and Alicia his wife, and is more costly and beautiful in execution than either of the other two.

There is nothing else within the homely place to fix attention. Casting a farewell glance at the grim old Knight and his amiable wife, you retrace your steps, cross again the little bridge, and are soon once more beneath the stately avenue of elms. Their lengthening shadows, and a far-off bell (which may have often struck upon the Poet's ear), now warn you of declining day. You hasten on, and, as the eye, at the turn of the road, for the last time takes in the antique house, the gentle river, and the lessening turret of the village church, you muse upon the undying influence of the Wizard who is enabled "thus to spread the magic of his mind over the very face of Nature; to give to things and places a charm and character not their own; and to turn this working-day world into a perfect fairy-land."

SALE OF SHAKESPERE'S HOUSE.

On Thursday, the day appointed for the Sale of Shakespere's House, the Auction Mart, towards noon, became crowded with persons anxious to witness the transfer of the interesting property; or, at least, to ascertain its new possessor. The lower room at the Mart was filled shortly after twelve o'clock; and, when the upper room was thrown open, there was a tremendous rush up stairs, and the sale-room was instantly crowded with company, among whom we noticed several distinguished artists and men of letters.

At one o'clock, Mr. Robins ascended the rostrum, amidst loud cheers. He then addressed the company, explaining that the vender had no interest in the property, he simply acted as the trustee of several minors to whom interest he was bound to look; and in bringing the property before the public for sale, he was merely following a course which the Court of Chancery would have directed if it had been appealed to in the matter. He next stated there to be property attached to the house which yielded a yearly rental of £30. He then read the conditions, and explained that the title to the property would descend to the purchaser or purchasers, from the will of the Great Poet.

A person here interposed, and called upon Mr. Robins to prove that the house he was about to sell was the identical one in which the Post was born.

Mr. Robins replied that tradition pointed out this house as that of Shakespere's birth. His father lived in it, and there could be no doubt that the great Poet was born in the house, and spent the greater period of his life in it. (Cheers.) They must take it as a matter of course. He wished that those who were sceptical on the point would stay away, instead of starting doubts which had no foundation to rest upon. The house was transferred from the hands of Shakespare's descendants, in 1806, to the present possessors. At that time, and for many years, about 1000 persons visited the edifice in the course of a year; but, of late years, as many as 7000 visited it in the course of one year, a proportion of whom were Americans.

A person, who stated that he was a solicitor, inquired if the trustees could legally sell the house?

Mr. Robins produced the deed, which his audience would not allow him to read; he, however, read a clause of it, which stated that the trustees had full power to sell the house, a statement which was received with loud cheers. Shakespere left the house to his sister, who married Mr. Hart, and the house was always known as Shakespere's house, and the proprietors of it the "Hart Shakesperes."

Mr. Robins then stated his desire that the bidding should commence and 1500 guineas were immediately offered. This was followed by an offer of £2000, after which £2100 was bid.

A letter was then handed to Mr. Robins by Mr. Peter Cunningham, as Treasurer of the London Committees, for raising subscriptions for the purchase of the House, offering £3000.

Mr. Robins then said that the trustees had just authorised him to state that he would not use his privilege of bidding after the offer which had been made, and the property was then knocked down to the Stratford and London Shakespere Committees for £3000, amidst immense cheering.

The five books of the Autographs of visitors were next sold for 70 guineas.

A few lots of old furniture and relics were then sold; among them was a spectacle-case, and a small carving of Shakespere's monument, stated to be from the Mulberry Tree planted by Shakespere, at New Place.

Mr. Robins stated, during the sale, that, in all his auctioneering experience, he had never witnessed a scene of such extraordinary enthusiasm. Next week, we shall present our readers with an Illustration of this memorable Sale.

STRATFORD-ON-AVON.

Thou cradle of the Bard whose mighty soul
Shone as a seraph's wisdom on our race -
Far scattering from his path Earth's gall control.
Until his noble spirit could embrace
The universe of mind, what glories grace
Thee, fearless Stratford! and thy willow'd stream,
Where many a pilgrim comes, and loves to trace
The scenes that nurtured Shakspeare's godlike dream.
The humblest sod whereon a daisy grows
Is hallow'd ground. The whispering breezes bring Sweet Ariel's symphonies, and Juliet's woes
With all the moving sympathies that wring
Tears from all eyes, from mendicant to King,
E'en as at Prophet's rod gush'd forth the desert's spring.

There stands the cottage where the Muse watched o'er
Her favourite child - and yon is Lucy's lawn;
Often thereon the Poet loved to pore
Over the visions which began to dawn
And beam'd of immortality - yon fane
Enshrines his ashes, and the lowliest hind
Holds in his breath with awe, as though 'twould stain
The slab where sleeps the Monarch of the Mind.
And would they waft o'er Transatlantic foam
This cot, as sacred as Palladium old?
No! where his heart hath glow'd, shall rest his home,
Though every brick might gain its weight in gold!
England, whose lamp was kindled from His fire
Will never let the sacred flame expire.

THE ATTEMPTED MURDER IN MARK-LANE.

On Tuesday, at the MANSION-HOUSE, Owenston, who attempted to kill Mr. Crawley, in Mark lane, underwent a final examination. The health of the unfortunate man seemed to have suffered greatly since his last examination. He was scarcely able to stand.

George Crawley said: I have offices at No. 12, Mark-lane. On the 14th of August, on going to my office, I found the prisoner and a person named Holding there. I asked the prisoner whether he wished to see me? He nodded his head; and I said, "If you will be good enough to step into the inner room, I'll speak to you." He went into the room, and I followed him. His back was towards me. I closed the door. He turned round, and I heard a shot, and immediately made my escape. I was shot in the jaw. The only thing I had observed in the prisoner before he fired the pistol was that he moved his head, but there was nothing about him that caused any suspicion of his intention

Mr. Samuel Harris, 13, Fenchurch-street, surgeon, said: I was called to see Mr. Crawley in our surgery. He told me he had been shot, upon looking at him, I found that a bullet had lodged in the jaw. As there was no hæmorrhage, I advised that he should immediately go to the hospital, which he did.

Cross-examined: I saw enough of the wound to know that it was a bullet-wound. It was a dangerous wound.

The Lord Mayor asked whether any solicitor attended for the prosecution?—No answer was returned.

The Lord Mayor: The case is one of great importance to the public, and I am bound to take care that the Judges shall not have all the trouble in the prosecution. I shall, therefore, have the prisoner bound over to prosecute, and the City Solicitor to conduct the case at the Central Criminal Court

Mr. Crawley here was much affected. He expressed his gratitude to the medical gentlemen at St. Thomas's Hospital, to whose skill and attention he said he owed his life. He felt deeply for the prisoner.

The Lord Mayor said it was his duty to commit the prisoner for shooting, with intent to murder. He expressed his admiration at hearing a confirmation of the general character of the medical gentlemen of St. Thomas's Hospital; and he lamented that a person of whom he had heard such an excellent private character up the period of the commission of the act should have altered the opinion entertained of him by the perpetration of so heinous an offence.

The prisoner said not a word.

Mr. Crawley said the prisoner had, while he was in the hospital, sent to be informed of the state of his health, and desired that he should be told that he (the prisoner) regretted the violence he had committed, and could not guess what could have influenced him to commit such an act.

The prisoner was then committed for trial.

JENNY LIND AND MR. BUNN.—On Wednesday, in pursuance of an order made by Mr. Justice Williams, at chambers, a commission was issued from the Queen's Bench Office, to examine witnesses viva voce at Berlin, or any two other places in Prussia, as to the alleged breach of contract for which the action is brought. Mr. Hoggins, one of the barristers retained on her behalf in the action, has been named the other Commissioner. It would seem that the cause is to progress as rapidly as the forms of the Court will permit, the Commission being made returnable on the 2nd of November, the commencement of Michaelmas Term, and it is, therefore, expected that the action will be tried the first possible opportunity.

THE LEWES. The Sussex Israelites says:—"It is calculated that the total number of Jews spread over the surface of the globe is 6,000,000 of souls. Of these, 180,000 are in the enjoyment of civil rights, viz.—30,000 in the United States of America, 50,000 in England, 10,000 in Belgium, and 90,000 in France. In England, 20,000 are as yet incompletely emancipated."

REDUCTION IN THE PRICE OF BREAD.—On Monday morning the bakers of the metropolis again reduced the price of the 4lb. loaf. The highest bakers lowered their charge to 7d., while those of other qualities were figured as low as 6½d., and some of the shops on the south side of the Thames intimated a further reduction in the course of the week. The cost of the League anticipating their price at 5½d

SHIPWRECK AND LOSS OF FIVE LIVES.—A shipwreck took place on Saturday last, during a heavy gale from the W.S.W., in Carnarvon Bay, by which no fewer than five persons have met with a premature death. It appears that two vessels, one a yacht, and the other a schooner, were seen out in the bay, the former of which signalled for a pilot to cross the bar. This proved to be the Gem, the property of Mr. J. Fleming, member of the Royal Yacht Squadron; in consequence of the distance from the station, she did not wait for the pilot's arrival, but exchanged one of her own hands for the mate of the other vessel, who was to act as her pilot. The schooner proved to be the Vine, of Pwllheli, bound with a cargo of coal from Llanelly, in South Wales, to Bangor. From some cause or other, perhaps the darkness of the evening, she, in attempting to pass the bar, some time between five and seven o'clock, into the Menai Straits, struck on the north bank, must have immediately capsized, filled, and sunk with all on board. In the cabin, the dead body of a female passenger was found, and on the bank, the body of a man was discovered, and both were immediately taken to Carnarvon, there being signs of life in the man. Four other men, the remainder of the crew, perished, but their bodies have not yet been found. The Gem arrived safe over the bar, with the Vine's mate on board.

CRANCH CHURCH.—In our account of the New Church, last week, it should have been stated that the ancient and venerable Church of Cranoe, owing to the inroads of time, and the several storms of the last summer, was found to be in such a dilapidated and dangerous state, that it has been taken down, and is now being re-erected. As the subscriptions do not amount to more than half the sum required to complete it, it is to be hoped that a benevolent and Charitable public will give assistance to the Rector & d Churchwardens, in order that they may once more provide the inhabitants of the house of prayer, of which they have now been deprived twelve months. The sum required is about £1400. The subscription list is headed by her Majesty the Queen Dowager. Trusting to the sympathy of others who have yet come forward, the Rector has made himself responsible for the great deficiency yet required, rather than that his parishioners should pass another year without the use of the Parish Church.

IMPROVEMENTS IN THE CITY.—Workmen are employed in pulling down several houses in Gresham-street, formerly Lad lane, City, in order to carry out the improvements in that part. The houses are upwards of 200 years old; and, on tablets in the front of each, are busts of a female, very elaborately finished. The head is crowned with a garland of flowers. It is doubtful whom they were intended to represent, but they have been reserved from sale by the Mercers' Company, and are to be preserved at their Hall. In the front of all the new buildings are busts of her Majesty (crowned) in niches.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—There was a very limited quantity of English wheat brought forward this morning, owing to which the increased attendance of town and country buyers, and the presence of several from Holland and Belgium, the demand, for all kinds of wheat, of home produce, was very steady, at an advance in the quotations paid on Monday last of from 2s to 3s per quarter. There was a firm inquiry for foreign wheat, for home consumption, as well as for export, at a rise in prices of from 1s to 2s per quarter. Barley, though in short supply, was heavy, at barely previous prices. The quantity of malt on offer was small, nevertheless the trade was in a sluggish state, at but little alteration in figures. We have to report a firm trade for oats, the best qualities of which produced 6d per quarter more money. Beans, peas, Indian corn, and flour were quite as dear. In some instances the importers of the latter refused to accept late prices.

ARRIVALS.—English: Wheat, 2140; barley, 1390; malt, 2770; oats, 270 Irish: Wheat —; barley, —; malt, —; oats,——. Foreign: Wheat, 5600, barley,——, malt,——; oats, 13,220. Flour: 1610 sacks, 300 barrels.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 48s to 52s; ditto white, 50s to 61s: Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 46s to 50s, ditto white, 50s to 58s; rye, 34s to 36s, grinding barley, 22s to 30s; distilling, 32s to 36s; malting ditto, 32s to 34s; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 60s to 66s; brown do., 58s to 60s Scarcastle and Ware, 65s to 66s; Chevalier, 67s to 68s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 22s to 24s; potato ditto, 27s to 29s; Youghal and Cork, black, 18s to 22s, ditto white, 20s to 23s; tick beans, new, 30s to 32s, ditto old, 40s to 42s; grey peas, 42s to 46s; maple, 44s to 46s; white, 40s to 44s, boilers, 46s to 50s, per quarter. Town-made flour, 45s to 46s, Suffolk, 38s to 42s, Stockton and Yorkshire, 38s to 42s per 280lbs. Foreign.—Dantzig red wheat, 4s to —s; white, —s to —s; barley, 2s to —s; oats, 2s to —s; beans, —s to —s; and peas, —s to —s per quarter. Flour, American, 32s to 37s per barrel, Baltic, —s to —s per barrel.

The Seed Market.—We have to report a general heaviness in the seed trade, but in prices no material alteration can be noticed

Linseed, English sowing, 50s to 60s; Baltic, crushing, 46s to 48s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 44s to 45s. Hempseed, 35s to 36s per quarter. Coriander, 18s to 21s per cwt. Brown Mustard seed, 9s to 11s, white ditto, 8s to 10s. Tares, 9s 6d to 8s 6d per bushel. English Rapeseed, new £23 to £26 per last of 10a quarters. Linseed cakes, English, £13 to £13 10s; ditto Baltic, £8 10s to £10 per 1000, Rapeseed cakes, £7 10s to £8 0s per ton. Canary, 60s to 64s per quarter. English Clover-seed, red, 4s to —s; white, —s to —s; extra, 5s to —s. Foreign, red, —s to —s; extra, —s; white, —s to —s; extra,—s per cwt.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the Metropolis are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 5½d to 6½d per 4lbs loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 51s 4d; barley, 33s 1d; oats, 24s 7d; rye, 38s 1d; beans, 40s 5d; peas, 42s 8d

Flax.—No change of moment has taken place in this market, which may be considered tolerably steady

Coffee.—The article is dull, at barely last week's quotations.

Hops.—Most mealdrinks move off slowly, at a reduction in value of from 2d to 6d. per cwt.

Rum.—A fair amount of business is doing in this article at full prices. Demerara, 34s to 36s per cwt. proof; is selling at 2s 4s to 2s 6d per gallon.

Provisions.—A very extensive demand has been again experienced for Irish butter, at a further improvement in the value of from 2s to 3s per cwt. Carlow, Clonmel, and Kilkenny, landed, firsts, 94s to 96s; Cork, 92s to 94s; Limerick, 90s to 92s. Waterford, 87s to 91s, and Sligo, 86s to 90s per cwt. On board, prices have advanced 1s to 2s per cwt. The supplies of Dutch butter are rather large, yet sales progress steadily, at 102 to 104s for fine Friesland, 96s to 100s for Holstein; and 84s to 88s for inferior and surplus. English butter is 1s to 2s dearer. Fine Downs, 102s to 104s; mid ing do. 96s to 100s, fine Lewes, 96s to 98s per cwt; and fresh, 11s 6d to 14s per dozen pounds. Bacon is dull, at barely late rates. The sale for hams is steady, but we do not notice any advance in the quotations. In other kinds of provisions—except English cheese which is quite as dear—very little is doing.

Cattle.—Monday.—Newgate's Hatton, 2s 5d: Leadenhall, 2s 6d; Stewart's, 2s; Tess, 2s 8d; Whitworth, 2s 6d, Kilningworth, 2s per ton

Wool.—Friday.—The supply of new lamb on sale this morning was considerably on the increase, and a further improvement was noticed in the condition. The demand is by no means active, at prices varying from 6d to 1s per cwt. for Weald of Kents, and £4 10 to £5 for Sussex in pockets. As the hops are reported to come down very light in some plantations, the duty is valued only £180,000. So little is doing in yearling and old hops, that prices are almost nominal. To-salt, lower rates must be accepted.

Smithfield.(Friday).—A very extensive supply of beasts—about a moiety of which was received from rail—was on sale this morning; but the quality was unusually bad. With the exception of the very primest Scots and Downs selling somewhat freely, at full prices, the beef trade was excessively dull, and the quotations had a downward tendency. There were in the market 320 oxen from Oporto; 640 oxen and cows, 2110 sheep and lambs, 100 calves, and 50 pigs from Ireland and Germany; in, also, 98 Scots from Scotland. The numbers of sheep were comparatively small. Prime old Downs sold freely, at an advance in their currencies of 2d per 8lb; and the value of all other breeds of sheep was well supported. In lambs, next to nothing was doing, and prices receded from 2d to 4d per 8lb. The calf trade was firm, at 2d per 8lb more money. Pigs were a dull inquiry, at late rates. Milch cows sold slowly, at from £5 5s to £18 each, including their small calf.

Per 8lb to sink the offals:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 3s 10d to 3s 4d; second quality ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d, prime large oxen, 3s 10d to 4s 2d; prime Scots, 4s, 4s 6d to 4s 8d; coarse and inferior sheep, 3s 6d to 3s 10d; second quality ditto, 4s 0d to 4s 4d; prime coarse-woolled ditto, 4s 6d to 4s 10d; prime South Downs, 4s 10d to 5s; large coarse calves, 4s 0d to 4s 8d, prime small ditto, 4s 10d to 5s 8d; large hogs, 3s 10d to 4s 4d; neat small porkers, 4s 6d to 4s 8d; lambs, 6s 0d to 7s 0d per 6lb.

Newgate and Leadenhall (Friday).—We had a very inactive trade to-day, and prices were with difficulty supported

Per 8lb by the carcase:—Inferior beef, 3s 8d to 3s 10d; middling ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 2d; prime large ditto 3s 2d to 3s 4d; prime small ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; large pork, 3s 6d to 4s 4d, inferior mutton 3s 4d to 3s 10d, middling ditto, 4s 0d to 4s 4d; prime ditto, 4s 6d to 4s 10d; veals, 3s 10d to 4s 0d; small pork, 4s 6d to 4s 10d; lamb, 4s 4d to 5s 6d.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

Considerable alarm prevailed in the City on Tuesday, arising from Messrs. Sanderson and Co., the eminent discount brokers, having suspended payment. The extensive connections of this firm, and its high credit which it, till very recently, held, made it the depository of large sums, the surplus of country bankers' balances, as well as large private traders. With the latter class, and in many instances with the former, the money was left "on call," or, in other words, payable on demand. Where the sums are large, the practice of handing a parcel of Bills to the parties, of an amount somewhat beyond the sums advanced, is usually pursued. This renders it probable that, if the assets are not sufficient to pay 20s. in the pound, the loss will, in most instances, be but slight, except where security is not held. The leading partner is known to be exceedingly wealthy, but with the present depreciation on property, to realise suddenly must entail severe loss both on him and on his creditors. The immediate cause of the failure was a want of confidence, which arose from the first from the large sum in the statement of the affairs of Lesley, Alexander, and Company. The money on call was rapidly withdrawn, and this, coupled with the death of Mr. Morris, the active partner, decided Mr. Sanderson upon taking the step. Doubtless, it is the most severe blow to credit that recent events has yet produced. Its effects time alone can determine.

The general meeting of the Bank of England proprietors was held on Thursday, for the purpose of declaring a dividend. Affairs appeared to be in the most satisfactory state, and an increase of one per cent, making 4½ per cent for the half year, was agreed to, after adding £26,419 to the Rest. Some discussion afterwards ensued with regard to the election of Directors; but, at present, no means of changing the system is sufficiently matured to be offered with any chance of success. The feeling in favour of appointing a Governor for the Rest must be totally unconnected with trade or commerce, is daily gaining favour

The English Funds, on Monday, opened heavily, 86¾ for Money being the first price of Consols, which speedily receded to 86⅝. On Tuesday Bills 2s to 3s. premium. A rally towards the close restored Consols to 86⅞ for Money, and 87⅛ to ⅜ for Account. A slight improvement at the opening on Tuesday was counteracted by the news of Messrs. Sanderson's failure; and when the fact was absolutely ascertained, bargains were done out of the House at 86⅜ for Money, and 86½ for Account, the closing prices. On Wednesday the greater part of Wednesday. A large speculative sale, causing depression to the extent of a large number of bond fide purchases; and the absence of any new failures effected an improvement, which was maintained on Thursday by almost similar circumstances. Exchequer Bills are rather better, and things generally look firmer, as the following prices:—Three per Cent. Consols, 86; India Stock, 258; India Bonds, 3 dis. 3 pm.; Bank Stock for Account, 203; Consols for Account, 86⅞; Exchequer Bills, 6p. 8p. 15p

Mexican improved on Monday about ½ per cent, consequent on some speculative purchases; but on Tuesday the Money price was 19½. On Tuesday, however, the news of the probable prolongation of the war, caused a decline of 1 per cent. Wednesday was setting day, which was unattended by any difficulty, it being very small. American stocks receive. for the Bonds, 73; Pennsylvania, 4 per Cent, 74; Ditto, 5 per Cent, 84; Illinois, 76; Kentucky, 76; Louisiana, 4 per Cent, 74; Maryland, 3½; Massachusetts, 4 per Cent, 84; Michigan, 74; Mississippi, 4 per Cent, 74; Ohio, 4 per Cent, 84; Pennsylvania, 5 per Cent, 84; Spanish 5 per Cent, 1840, 20¾; Dutch 2½ per Cent, 54¾; Ditto, Account, 54¾; Ditto, 4 per Cent Certificates, 87¾.

Shares continue rather heavy, without prospect of improvement, any attempt at sales immediately influencing prices. The last dealings were: Birmingham and Oxford Junction, 20¾ ex. int.; Boston, Stamford, and Birmm ham, 5¾; Buckinghamshire, 2¼ discount; Caledonian, 7¾; Chester and Holyhead, 17¼; Ditto, York Extension, 9¾; East Lincolnshire, 10¾; Great Northern, 14¼; Do., London and York, 14¼; Great North of England, 229. Great Western, 104; Ditto, New, £17, 9s.; Lancaster and Carlisle, 15¼; Lancashire and Yorkshire, 14¾; Ditto, Half Shares, 40 x.d.; Ditto (West Riding Union), 1½ discount; Leeds and Bradford, 90; London and Blackwall, 9¼; London, Brighton, and South Coast, 46¼; London and North Western, 104; Ditto, Half Shares, 104½; Ditto, Extension, 18¾; London and South Western, £41 6s. 8d., 69; Ditto, New, £250, 22¾; Midland, 114; Ditto, £40 Shares, 43; Ditto, £50 Shares, 1¼; Midland Consolidated Bristol and Birmingham, 2 per Cent, 121; Newcastle and Darlington, 34½; Ditto, New, 7¾; Norfolk, 108 xn; Ditto, New, £20, 5¾; North British, 26¾; North Britain, Half Shares, 13; North British, Quarters, 6; North British, Thirds, 4¼; North Staffordshire, 9¼; Reading, Guildford, and Reigate, 8; Shropshire Union, 1¼; South Devon, 2⅝; South Staffordshire, 1¼ discount; South Eastern and Dover, 33¾; South Wales, 7; York and Newcastle, 34¾; Ditto Extension, 10¾; York Price Preference, 10; Antwerp to Rotterdam, 7⅝; Boulogne and Amiens, 13¾; Dutch Rhenish, 2¾; Louvain à la Sambre, 2¾; Luxembourg, 2; Paris and Lyons, 24 xi.

RAILWAYS AND MORNING.—The City was in consternation yesterday afternoon, in consequence of the failure of the eminent house of Reid, Irving, and Co. The senior partner, Sir John Rae Reid, is Director of the Bank of England, and was, for upwards of four years, Governor of that institution. The Liabilities of the house are very heavy. Consols, in consequence of this failure, were lower than for a long time past. They were done as low as 85¾ to ⅞ for Account. Exchequer Bills, 2 to 5 pm. Under the circumstances, the Railway Shares underwent a further severe depression. Every description of Railway property was on the wane, and the aspect of the Market was, in all respects, most gloomy.

DINNERS ACCIDENT.—Last Saturday afternoon an omnibus with twelve inside and nine outside passengers was upset in the Tottenham-court-road, the hind axletree having broken. One gentleman had his leg fractured, and another his shoulder dislocated, both of whom were conveyed to Middlesex Hospital. The driver and the rest of the outside passengers were all more or less injured. The inside passengers fortunately escaped without any further injury than a few cuts from the broken glass.

LIVES of the QUEENS, VOL. X. BY AGNES STRICKLAND

"There is certainly no lady of our day who has done so much to be beneficial a purpose as Miss Strickland. Nor is there any other whose works possess a deeper or more enduring interest. The Tenth Volume treats of the Queens of Scotland, from the Accession of Mary to the Throne of Scotland to the Death of Mary II., Daughter of the same 11 starred Monarch, and afterwards Wife of William III The details of the private life and character of Mary Stuarton are as new as they are interesting We have to thank Miss Strickland for a new light thrown upon a field of anecdote and character, and from a perusal of which the reader rises with a very clear knowledge of the times and the events that mark the most important epoch of middle world history. We need the personages in that very extraordinary era of our history throughout the Revolution of 1688 Miss Strickland is, to our mind, the first literary lady of the age."—Britannia

DONCASTER RACES, 1847.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE GREAT ST. LEGER.

Thou shalt be an everlasting leger.—SHAKESPEARE.

In progress has been the principle of the social state from its commencement, with what a funeral step it must have marched up to the early days of our generation compared with its movement since. The grandsires of the present race of London citizens—those, at least, who cultivated Arcadian lives on "the Surrey side"—were wont to take tea on their afternoon journeys to their villas around Peckham—at some hospitable half-way house at Camberwell; while their sons found it more laborious to pass from Tokenhouse-yard to Tattersall's than their grandchildren do to "run down to Doncaster." You may now breakfast in town at a seemly hour, and reach that borough in ample time to see the greater portion of the day's racing—and that, too, not packed as if for premature interment, but seated in a chamber skimming through space as smoothly as a balloon, wherein you may read, write, or gossip, as much at your ease as in your own parlour. If you doubt it, try the Leeds express train any morning at twenty-five minutes past nine A.M., from the Euston Station of the North-Western line. Oh! that transit by express trains! surely it is a direct anticipation of Elysium. . . . . Dr. Samuel Johnson used to say that life had no sensation more in spiriting than the rapid motion of a post-chaise. What would the burly bibliopolist have thought of seventy miles an hour over the Bridgwater Level on the Great Western? The courteous reader will excuse this rhapsody—or, at all events, ascribe it to our having recently made our way to see the Leger run for at a pace our pays would have treated as fabulous had it been claimed for a performance across the T.Y.C. at Newmarket.

Doncaster races are not what they were; so says the laudator temporis acti, with a sigh. He remembers the time when they had their coaches and six. But the world was never the worse when chivalry passed away with all its pride, pomp, and circumstance; and mankind can just as well dispense with the éclat of coaches and six. We are less aristocratic than our fathers—if we were only a little more moral! . . . . Always, our bane is the Turf; and this aspiration merely relates to its economy. Why the plague must men throw away their substance—another form of words for betting on a horse-race? We have thus reasoned for some years, and the answer is almost ripe:—They will do so no longer. Speculation, during this instant week, in the North, was the shadow of the cloud that lowers upon the Ring. The lease of Mammon—held by it too long—is at the last gasp.

Never dawned a more lovely Leger morning than that of Wednesday last: it was Autumn risen fresh and radiant from the lap of Summer. The pretty town was a bright particular holiday long before noon. Its highways were popular pageants. Equipage was there, in all its variety—and so was costume. The capital had contributed its brave men, and the rural neighbourhoods their fair women; of the intermediates—the levies from the manufacturing districts—we cannot speak so flatteringly, in especial as regards the sporting divisions from the sporting towns. The Rooms were the rallying point—but for little more than gossip—"vox et preterea nihil." Of this latter, there was plenty and to spare. Mr. Martin had been scratched over-night, and Sally Maggs in the morning; which latter event was accompanied by the following pleasant notice to our public:—"Mr. Pedley declares to win with Foreclosure: 20 min. to 10 A.M., Sept. 15, 1847." Time, however, sped on; and Speculation had not the fear of this announcement before its eyes. When we quitted the Rooms—a little after noon—Cossack was still the nominal favourite, at 5 to 4 on him; while Foreclosure ruled 4 to 1 against him; Van Tromp, a point more; and a strong disposition to invest against Planet and Philosopher—the latter quite "gone." In short, "there never was such a Leger"—a character that has distinguished the majority of its predecessors, and seems to be the type of the race. The attendance was very great: there is "room and plenty" in the land—it has pleased Providence to make the heart glad: the boon was acknowledged by a fitting welcome.

All the arrangements at the Course were admirable; the weighing house was in full dress; and there was a telegraph on a most comprehensive scale, giving the names of jockeys and horses, as well as the time in which the races were run—not quite chronometrically, indeed, but good, all hindrances considered. Three o'clock was the hour named for the great event; and at five minutes to it, the eight that started were being paraded before the Grand Stand. Cossack had still "the call" in the ring, as the odds, given elsewhere, will show; but the betting was slack in the extreme.

The start was a good one, though rather too far behind the post—some fifty yards or more. They went off as hard as they could split, with the "crack" at the head, and Foreclosure at the tail—a position he preserved all through the race. Van Tromp was second to the hill, where Eryx went up to force the pace—in the event, no doubt, of Cossack declining—which, however, he never showed a symptom of intending—making the speed as severe as it has been ever seen over the Leger course. No move of any account occurred till they rounded the Red House turn, where Van Tromp resumed the second place. Thus they passed the distance, where it was obvious the leader was in difficulty. As they closed the Stand, Job Marson let his horse go—passed Cossack—beat him on pace and bottom, and landed Van Tromp first by two long lengths—as easily as ever, perhaps, the Leger has been won. Eryx might have had better place than he had—it is our opinion—but he was run up to the spirit as well as the letter of honour. Foreclosure ran a couple of stone worse than almost any animal in the race—with the facility for trying which the stable possesses, how careless his party must have been to fall into such an error about him. The public proclaimed its views of their policy by cheering Lord Eglinton's victory to the echo! Seriously, the declaration to win with such a brute seems—to say the least of it a mauraise plaisanterie—fitted to make the uninitiated laugh at the wrong side of the mouth. It is such jokes that have brought the turf into evil repute, the donkey that dances among the chickens has all the fun to himself. The result of the race will be to the detriment of the betting classes, and to the profit of the legitimate supporters of the Turf. This, at least, is in some sort, a set off to that which cannot but act as a heavy discouragement to such as may feel disposed to put their trust in high racing authorities. If the Bond-street movement was the consequence of a mis-stake, it will not tend to make people noble in professional judgment. . . it was based on the principle of all being fair in war or racing, the public will presently come to understand what sort of a forlorn hope backing horses for great stakes may be.

THE DONCASTER PRIZE CUP—1847.

"THE DONCASTER CUP," which was run for this year is a vase, in the mixed cinque-cento and Arabesque style. The base and stem are richly chased, and the bowl has bold bosses, scroll-work, and moulding, of superb character. The cover bears an excellently modeled group from the best age of chivalry—an incident in the battle of Ascalon, in which Richard I. unhorses a Saracen warrior, and repels the attack of a spearman who assails him on foot. The Monarch wears the ringed armour, and the cylindrical helmet, of his time, and the other combatants are in the Saracenic costume. A palm-tree overshadows the group, and improves its pyramidal effect, while it characterizes the locality of the heroic incident. The height of the Cup and cover is 3 feet 3½ inches; and its weight 303 ounces. It has been modeled by Mr. Cotterill, and is a very spirited and elegant composition. The work is in silver, dead and burnished, admirably executed, at the establishment of Messrs. Garrard, of the Haymarket, to whom the order for it was given by the Stewards of the race—Lord Strathmore and Sir John Gerard, Bart.

THE NEW POSTAGE STAMPS. The new postage stamps, intended principally for the pre-payment of foreign letters, have been issued. They are of the value of 1s each, the colour being green, and the form octagonal, to distinguish them easily from the smaller denomination of postage stamps at present in use. These stamps may be used for inland as well as foreign postage, but they are chiefly intended for the payment of letters to the United States, India, China, the West Indies, New South Wales, New Zealand, and other places to which the postage is 1s. It is understood that other denominations of postage stamps are hereafter to be issued.

THE GOVERNORSHIP OF MALTA.—It is reported that Mr. More O'Ferrall, formerly Secretary of the Admiralty, has been appointed Governor of Malta.

THE QUEEN IN THE HIGHLANDS.

WE continue our narrative of the most interesting events connected with the Royal tour in Scotland.

THURSDAY.

On Thursday afternoon (last week), her Majesty and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Prince Leiningen, the Marchioness of Douro, and the Duke of Norfolk, on horseback, passed the floating bridge on their way to visit the waterfall of Ess Laiten. The Royal party rode in the char-à-banc, drawn by four beautiful long-tailed greys. On arriving at the point at which the road diverges to the right, over the hill-side, her Majesty alighted, and the Royal party proceeded on foot to the head of the fall. The time was unfortunately chosen, for although the weather, up near five o'clock, had been warm and genial the sun shining brilliantly—the rain at a later period began to fall, and the beauty of the scenery surrounding the Ess was not seen to such advantage as it otherwise might. The road by which the Royal party approached the fall of Ess Laiten was through the Coarstalk Pass, a place of rocky and romantic scenery, about two miles from the bridge of the Loch, and described in a former letter. The mountains are seen to great advantage from this road which leads up the hill-side, and at this season the rich abundance of the many varieties of heath, all in full flower, gives a liveliness to the scene, and imparts a sweetness to the air exceedingly refreshing. The fall, as seen from the side by which it was approached by her Majesty, is perhaps not so striking as from the opposite point of view. The mountain sweeps away in irregular mounds to the very verge of the narrow cleft—it is scarcely wide enough to be called a glen—through which the water rushes, and the first impression is somewhat destroyed by the merely partial view obtained of the surrounding accessories to the picture. The fall itself is probably about from forty to fifty feet in height, and as it is divided, when full, into several streams, the effect is striking and grand. After eddying round and round the cauldron below, it rushes merrily along, tumbling over the masses of rock which obstruct its course, until it is lost in the recesses of the mountain clefts.

Her Majesty returned to the lodge a little after six. The Royal dinner circle was formed by the Marquis and Marchioness of Abercorn.

FRIDAY.

This afternoon, her Majesty and the Prince drove out in a pony carriage, attended by Major-General Wemyss, the Equerry in Waiting.

Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal walked out, accompanied by Miss Hillyard.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by the Hon. Captain Gordon, went to the deer-stalking in Ben Aulder Forest, and, after enjoying excellent sport, returned to the Lodge about two o'clock, having killed a stag weighing 16 stones clean. While the Prince was in the Forest, her Majesty took a drive in the grounds, and was employed for some time at the head of the Loch in sketching the scenery, which from that point possesses peculiar attractions. After lunch, the Royal barge was ordered to be prepared, and her Majesty and her Royal consort sailed to the opposite shore of the Loch, where a carriage was in waiting to convey them to the west end of the Loch. Upon returning, her Majesty and the Prince re-crossed the Loch in a barge, and were much delighted on finding that, during their absence, the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal had been furnished with fishing-rods by Mr. Purdie, the Queen's fisherman, and that the Princess had succeeded in capturing a trout in a rivulet which runs into the Loch at Ardverekie.

Lord Palmerston, the Marquis of Abercorn, General Wemyss, and Mr. Anson, were engaged during the day at grouse and ptarmigan shooting on Corardee. The party killed ten or twelve brace of game.

SATURDAY.

This has been one of the wildest days we have had since her Majesty's arrival at Ardverekie. The Queen and the Royal Family were close prisoners during the whole day.

SUNDAY.

The storm of wind and rain which prevailed the whole of yesterday, continued with unabated violence this morning.

Her Majesty and the Prince, and the Royal household, attended the performance of divine service at Ardverekie.

MONDAY.

Her Majesty and his Royal Highness walked in the grounds early this morning. The Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal, attended by Miss Hillyard, went on their ponies to the hills.

Her Majesty is besieged at Ardverekie by bagmen of every description. Among the other arrivals came a dealer in stationery, from Paisley—a curious-looking red-haired fellow, arrayed in clothes of many colours and qualities; he claimed to bear a striking resemblance to the beloved Consort of her Majesty; and, when confronted with the London policeman stationed at the Boat Bridge, stoutly asserted the liberty of the subject, and his own right in particular to obtain an interview with her Majesty. "If she knew," said he, "that I was here, I would not have to wait long for admission." For the "very great resemblance" he bore to the Prince, he expected a pension of five hundred a-year, and "a Maid of Honour to be given him for a wife!"

Perhaps it is not generally known that the wild and romantic spot where our beloved Sovereign at present is resides is the identical place where Fergus, our first Scottish monarch, delighted to sojourn, and where, not many years behind the beautiful lodge of Ardverekie, his remains lie: also those of two succeeding monarchs. The proper meaning of the name "Ardverekie," is Ard-Fergus (Fergus's height); or, in the Gaelic language, Ardferigie.

THE "CRICKET" STEAM-BOAT.—The engineers appointed by the Government to inspect the machinery and engines of the Cricket having completed their investigation, the Thames Police, who were appointed to take charge of them, have been relieved from this duty, and the wreck has been handed over to the Steam-boat Company. The sufferers by the explosion still remaining in the Hospital are improving rapidly. They are now only five in number, and most of them have nearly recovered. Virgo Berks, whose leg was amputated, is the least convalescent, but he is gradually, though slowly, getting better. He has not experienced the slightest ill effects from the ether, which was applied most successfully during the operation.

THE BRUSSELS CONGRESS.

CONGRESSES are not a novelty in the history of Europe; too many of them are remembered by the mischief they have done, and the opportunities of doing good which they let pass by them. A Congress of Kings has parcelled out a territory, the inhabitants going with it like cattle. A Congress of diplomatists has divided kingdoms, or tied provinces together to make one; and a generation or two of discontent has ended in a revolution, bloodshed, and an approach to the natural order of things, which the "inky fingers" had violated. But Railroads and the Press are establishing another order of things, and the Congresses of the present age are composed, not of Sovereigns, or the agents of Sovereigns, but the deputies of the people.

Such a Congress has just closed its sitting in Brussels; even though the practical results of it may not be very great, the precedent and the principle is a good one; it shows that men, however divided by language and geographical position, have thoughts, feelings, and opinions, in common; that, though there are many difficulties in the way, they can join in an effort for improvement; nay, it is something gained if they have only met and talked about it. Look back through history, and where is there to be met a gathering of men of the people, to treat of the principles of Commerce? They have been hitherto bound by the compacts Ministers and Statesmen have made for them. Suppose they should turn round and say, at last: We will try and come to an understanding of these matters ourselves? Would any harm be done? Is it not likely the result would be good? The spirit raised may compel the Governments to new treaties, at least equal to the old ones; it would tax the power of stupidity, whose power is great, to make much worse. The very model of compacts made by political managers of commerce, is the Methuen Treaty, concluded with Portugal in the last century. It has, we observed, figured in the debates of the Brussels Congress; but it is precisely one of the examples that ought not to be followed. What have been its results? To gain a market of three millions of people for her woollens, England gave Portugal the exclusive supply of wine to some twenty millions; even in this respect, the disparity was startling; but that was not all. Stimulated by large profits, the wine manufacture of Portugal became the staple of the kingdom; the Government of Portugal made it over to a Royal Company, who alone had the privilege of buying up the produce of all the vineyards; they fixed the price, and made competition impossible. Having the wine, they managed it with as little expense and trouble as possible, and England had no choice; it must drink the port of the Company, or go without; French wines were excluded by a high duty. By degrees, wine ceased to be consumed by the people; that poisonous distillation called gin came into use, and is vended from glittering palaces to those who reel from its threshold to the workhouse or the prison; and a dark decoction called porter was called into existence, all the ingredients of which, except water, are a mystery. And yet, in the sunny South of France, are thousands of thousands of acres, growing a light fluid, fragrant in odour, and bright as the ruby, which might come to us as cheaply as the liquid fire of the distiller, and the black draught of the brewer, but which we have kept out, because Portugal is our "ancient ally," and France our "natural enemy." But, it will be said, at least, Portugal is enriched! Quite the reverse; it is the poorest state in Europe, embarrassed and bankrupt. What, then, is the use of these much lauded treaties, by which both parties are injured in the mass, though a few individuals on each side may be enriched? None whatever; the bulk of the lower classes of England drink less wine now than their ancestors two centuries ago; that is the happy result of Methuen treaties. The old dramatists are worth reading, for the light they throw on this subject alone; a knowledge of a past social state may be gathered from them even by those who do not appreciate their poetry. Do porters, and soldiers, and labourers, and coalheavers, invite each other to "crush a cup of wine" like the retainers of the Capulets? No; they have degenerated to gin. The English people are in a manner forced on the highest priced wines, which, on the Continent, are considered not as beverages, but liqueurs. In short Englishmen never drink wine at all; they only sip it, and Dick Swiveller's axiom is a true one, "it can't be tasted in a sip." We have relaxed this treaty of late years, and are gradually approaching a better state of things, but a generation will be required to restore the vine to a natural and healthy condition.

We have dwelt a little on this treaty and its effects, because they illustrate the working of the compacts by which nations bind themselves, when they allow statesmen to conclude commercial treaties according to political interests which are always changing, instead of the natural capabilities of nations which are ever the same. The north of England will produce iron and coal, and the south of France will grow grapes, till the end of time, though the men of each country may be hounded on to wars about thrones and successions, in which they have not a particle of interest. And it is these truths, declared viva voce, in the midst of each other, that give their value to meetings like that of the Brussels Congress.

There is also a good effect produced by bringing men acquainted with each other. It is extraordinary what errors arise from want of communication. In England, if there is one terror greater than another, it is the dread of the foreigner; he can produce so much cheaper than we can, his wages are so low, how can we compete with men that live, as the Essex rustics are taught to believe, on black bread and water cresses? Well, go abroad, and you find everything much the same as with us, save that the good things of life are more equally divided, that the people are more uniformly well fed, well lodged, and well clothed. But they, on the other hand, are convinced that England is a kind of Dom Daniel, or dwelling place of friends, with supernatural powers of toil, assisted by machinery going day and night, an everlasting canopy of smoke above it, and an eternal clank of cogs and pistons below, resulting in miles of calico running from one end of the engine, and showers of gold from the other.

How is it possible, for a nation that can put all the specimens of its manufactures into a single warehouse—as an exposition—to contend with a people who have got hold of Alladin's lamp, and rub it by steam, calling up a myriad of genii to do its bidding instead of one? And thus the two divided nations exist in a continual dread of each other—England haunted by foreign cheapness, the foreigner terror-stricken at the incomprehensible energy and wealth of England. The reader must be familiar with the exquisite duel scene in "Twelfth Night," where Sir Toby Belch, by his dexterous mediation, persuades each combatant that his opponent is a monster of bloodthirstiness and a prodigy of skill with the weapon—while fighting is the very last thing either of them desires. Something like it is the relative position of nations towards each other, with no one to clear up the misunderstanding. It is time that this should be done. Surely the future of the world cannot involve so dreadful a necessity as this—that nations can only exist by mutual annihilation. Whether men shall be blown into the air by artillery, or starved out of existence by a conflict of cotton mills, seems to be an alternative rather of the saddest, if we are to be reduced to it; but we must thoroughly disbelieve that either consequence is necessary. There has been much folly in war, and there may be much that is not wisdom in trade; but knowledge has abated the evils of the first, and made it more difficult. To the same power we must trust to correct what is yet clouded with error in the last. To spread that knowledge, no better mode can be found than discussion; and of that the best is the converse between men and men. Imperfect as the first of these Congresses has been, and small as the practical result will be anticipated from it, the precedent will not be lost: more will succeed it. For instance, when two Governments are in the most magnificent loftiness of diplomacy, brewing a war that may drain both countries of millions, what is to prevent some few common-sense men from each of them meeting (a few hours on a railway will bring them together), and asking coolly what it is all about, and why it should be? and let them come to the rational conclusion that they will not have their soil deluged with blood for any Prince in Christendom. Let those who have to pay for the fighting in purse and person on both sides hold a conference, and not leave it all to those who are to fight or reap the benefit of the battle. Some forty years ago there were blended together in that same city of Brussels a whole Congress of Powers, German and English and Belgian, with the French not far off; and they all met, and the world knows what came of it. The "old prize-fighting ground of Flanders" has just seen a better gathering —not so vast, or imposing, or so brilliant, or so costly; but it will bear contemplating with less pain, and indicates greater things for the future. Forty years produce their effect; and, though slowly, the world does move after all.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

THE FRAUDS OF MONEY-LENDERS.—On Tuesday John Bull, 26, described as an agent, was charged with obtaining a bill of exchange for £250 from John Mercer by false pretences. Mr. Huddlestone prosecuted; Mr. Clarkson appeared for the defendant. It appeared from the evidence of the prosecutor that he was a draper, and carried on business at Kelso, in Scotland. In May last he saw an advertisement in the Glasgow Herald, which stated that a sum of £12,000 was to be advanced. He answered the advertisement to the address in London, and received a reply from the defendant, in which he offered to advance £600 upon the acceptance with the endorsement of a respectable party, and enclosing a bill for that amount drawn by the defendant. The bill was accepted by himself according to the custom in Scotland, by writing his name under that of the drawer, and his brother wrote his name across the face of the bill as the indorsee. He shortly afterwards received another letter from the defendant, in which he stated that the instrument could not be negotiated in England in this form, and enclosed another draft with the form in which it was to be accepted and indorsed. He filled up this second bill, and transmitted it to the defendant, but no money was sent in return; and on his coming to London to make inquiries into the matter, he ascertained that the defendant had endeavoured to negotiate the first bill he sent to him, and that the statement of its not being drawn in proper form was merely a false pretence to enable him to obtain a second bill from him. The jury found the defendant guilty, and he was sentenced to be imprisoned and kept to hard labour for two years

FATAL CASE OF FORGERY On Wednesday, John Chappell Bennett, 33, was indicted for feloniously uttering a forged acceptance to a bill of exchange for £42, with intent to defraud HENRY Clapham Fuller. Mr. Parry prosecuted, and Mr. Ballantine appeared for the defence. The charge was clearly brought home to the prisoner, but the circumstances connected with the offence were of a pecuniary character. It appeared that the prisoner on his coming of age received five thousand pounds, and went into business as a tallow-chandler, and he knew little trade and other circumstances, the whole of the money was sacrificed, and he was reduced to great distress, and with difficulty supported himself and his family. He had always borne an irreproachable character, and he appeared to have committed the offence while under great pecuniary difficulty. He had a wife and three children now dependent upon him. The jury found the prisoner guilty, but recommended him strongly to the lenient consideration of the Court. Mr. Parry said he was instructed by the prosecutor to join in the recommendation, as he believed that the prisoner had been induced to commit the act by the pressure of great poverty. Mr. Baron Platt said that the offence of which the prisoner stood convicted was one of so serious a character to a commercial community, that, notwithstanding the recommendation of the Jury and the prosecutor, and the other circumstances that had been stated on the prisoner's behalf, he felt that his duty compelled him to pass a sentence of transportation; and he accordingly ordered the prisoner to be transported for seven years.

A MAN CONVICTED OF POISONING HIS WIFE.—On Thursday, John Hutchings, a cooper, was convicted of having poisoned his wife, by putting some arsenic into a pudding intended for her dinner. The occurrence took place at Chelsea, in August last, and we gave some particulars of it at the time. The principal witnesses against the prisoner were two of his sons. Mr. Justice Platt sentenced the prisoner to death. The prisoner and his wife lived on very bad terms together.

THE ATTEMPTED MURDER IN MARK-LANE.—Upon the application of Mr. Clarkson, the trial of John Ovenston, for shooting Mr. Crawley, was postponed until next session.

COLLISION ON THE DORCHESTER RAILWAY.—On Monday night a collision took place with the mail train a few miles from Dorchester, near the Wool station. It appears that the mail train left from Dorchester was very late in reaching Wareham station, a distance of fifteen miles. Imagining that something was wrong, the station-master at Wareham, and four railway porchmen, upon the one line of railway, a pilot engine, to ascertain whether any thing was wrong upon the line which prevented the train from reaching the Wareham station. Unfortunately, through there being a very severe curve near to Wool station, it was not possible for the engineer on the pilot engine to perceive the coming train, and the driver of the mail train labouring under the same difficulty, and there being an absence of signal lights on the particular part of this newly-constructed line, the consequence was that both drivers proceeded with unchecked speed, the result being a collision of a fearful character. Happily, there were but a very few (only two, it is said,) passengers in the train, who escaped without any injury. Considerable damage is done to both engines, and several carriages are said to be shattered.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

PARISIANA.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

PARIS, September 21.

Although foreign politics are still maintaining their hold of the public attention, and more than ever engrossing the columns of our papers, the last few days have elapsed without bringing out any very important revelation with regard to the movements and designs of our Cabinet. It is affirmed, however, by the Gazette de France that the formation of a camp of 40,000 men, at the foot of the Pyrenees, has been decided on, and that the army of Spain occupation should have been carried up to an effective force of 80,000, if financial considerations had not prevailed against the desires of the King. At any rate, it is given as certain that the regiments, stationed in the south, from the Alps to the Spanish frontier, have been reinforced, and ordered to be immediately got ready for any emergency. The last changes in the administration of Algeria had been generally attacked as betraying a firm resolve to deny the colony, what else is wanting above all, the benefit of civil institutions; and the new system, with its civil directors under the direct superintendency of the Military Chief, was considered a proof that the post of Governor-General of Algeria was actually reserved for the Duke of Aumale. All doubts about it are now at an end. An ordonnance has been issued, by which the King of the French appoints his dear and well-beloved son, the Duke of Aumale, Governor-General of Algeria, in the place of Marshal Bugeaud, whose resignation has been accepted.

It is stated that, in a recent Cabinet Council, it was resolved to send an additional force of 10,000 men into the African possessions; but there appears to be no ground for the rumour I had mentioned, of the Government having decided upon a prompt intervention in Morocco.

In the Almanac Royal, which has just appeared, Count Bresson is designated as our Ambassador to Naples. By a new ordonnance Lieutenant-General Reille, the son-in-law of Massena, and General Dode de la Brunerie, of the Engineers, are raised to the dignity of Marshal of France. The late Governor of the Invalides, Marshal Oudinot, who died a week ago, aged eighty-one years, has left behind him very interesting military memoirs, which are to be published by his eldest son, General Oudinot, at present in Algeria, with his two brothers, who serve in regiments as Captain and Lieutenant. It was said, at first, that the command of the Invalides, after being offered to Marshal Bugeaud, had been granted to Marshal Soult, who consented to exchange for his Presidency of the Council, so long the ambition of M. Guizot; but, according to later reports, it would seem that the succession of the Duke of Reggio (Oudinot) has been proposed to Marshal Gerard, who would not accept it, and is most likely to fall to the lot of Marshal Sebastiani.

Strange reports have reached us, touching a late fellow Minister of Marshal Soult. A subscription has been opened in the Department of the Gard to pay the fine of M. Teste; and we read in the Echo du Midi, that a triumphal arch has been erected to him at Sagnols, with this inscription—"To Teste, the God of the People!" Lists of subscription, prepared in Paris, are hawked about by the friends of the prisoner; and M. Teste himself writes letters, to thank the zealous, and stir up the lukewarm. This, however, is merely a new instance of the blindness of a certain class of persons

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The cheap omnibus system progresses. On Monday last, the omnibuses plying between Kennington Gate and King's Cross, and those between Kennington Gate and Islington, reduced their fares from sixpence to threepence for a portion of the distance that is to say, the King's Cross omnibuses now go from Kennington Gate to Temple Bar for threepence, and those to Islington reduced their fares to threepence from the Gate to the Post Office.

Mr. Cobden wrote from Moscow on the 2nd inst., which city he proposed to leave in a day or two for St. Petersburg, where he would remain only a few days, and would then set out on his return to England, most probably by way of Lubeck and Hamburg. At the latter city great preparations have been made for a grand banquet in honour of his visit.

The King of Norway and Sweden has charged the Minister of Justice to draw up a bill to authorise the admission of Jews into the kingdom of Norway, from which they are at present entirely excluded, and to declare to what rights they are to be entitled.

The death of Marshal Oudinot reduces the number of surviving Marshals to two out of the 26 created by Napoleon. These are Marshal Soult, Duke of Dalmatia, promoted in 1804; and Marshal Marmont, Duke of Ragusa, nominated in 1809, and suspended in 1830 for refusing to take the oath.

The boilers of the Cricket steamer have been tested, and with the most satisfactory results, as affecting the manufacturer of the boilers, for they resisted a pressure of no less than 140lb to the square inch.

In the garden of S. T. Marchant, at Margate, may be seen a monster pumpkin measuring five feet six inches in circumference, and of the estimated weight of seventy to eighty pounds. It is only in its infancy at present, and is expected to equal, in weight and size, its parent, which was last year presented to the Queen, and weighed upwards of a hundred and fifty pounds.

The Chartists of Wakefield have voted an address to the Duke of Newcastle, in which they profess to be his ardent admirers.

Tuesday was the first day of the year 5608 of the Jewish Era. Monday, being the last day of their old year, was kept as a strict holiday by the Jewish people, who closed their shops and suspended all business till after sunset

Our accounts from Switzerland are still of a warlike character. The General of Berne has issued an extraordinary call for the equipment of 20,000 men. Zurich is also organising its forces. In Tessino several thousand men have tendered their services. The Federal Colonel, Rilliet Constant, is likely to be appointed Commander-in-Chief of the expedition against the Seven Confederated Cantons. The latter are actively preparing to stand the attack.

A German paper asserts that the Emperor Nicholas has summoned all his Ambassadors at foreign Courts to meet him at St. Petersburg. It would appear that some great movement is contemplated, and that the Emperor has called his diplomatists to his presence to give them their final instructions.

The great iron-works of the park of Mesnkirch, in the Grand Duchy of Baden, belonging to the Prince de Furstenburg, have just been destroyed by fire. The loss is estimated at several millions of francs, on a portion of which is insured. The destruction of the buildings alone is estimated at 150,000 florins (390,000f.) About nine hundred men were employed in the works, all of whom, with their families, are now without resources.

Two large vessels engaged in the Davis' Straits Fishery have been lost, one the Ben Ascord, of Hull, 600 tons burden, Captain Lee, master; and the Alfred, 400 tons, of Boness. It appears the vessels were lost within a quarter of a mile of each other, on the same day, the 3rd of July last, in 79 degrees N., by being crushed to pieces between icebergs. The crews, sixty in number, suffered frightfully from the cold; they were knocking about the ice nearly a month before they were rescued. With the exception of three seamen they were all saved.

An official return has just been printed, which shows that 4201 letters are now lying in the Dead Letter Office, containing property valued at the almost incredible sum of £40,410 5s. 7d.; this, too has accrued during the last three years. The articles now lying for claimants are of the most varied character, some of them of a bulk and description little calculated for transmission per post. The number of money-orders undelivered is 846, for cash to the amount of £407 12s. 8d.—[We do not wonder that so cash for Post-Office orders should be unclaimed, for so many annoyances and difficulties are thrown in the way, that, where the sum is not large, people will rather lose the money than submit to the trouble of getting it.]

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

THE EXPLOSION ON BOARD THE "CRICKET" STEAMER.

The inquest was resumed last Saturday morning. A witness named Knight, who had been employed as a stoker, deposed that Clarke always tied the valves at the end of each journey. The effect of tying the valves was this, instead of the pressure being at 40, it was at 80, which number was indicated by the gauge, providing they stopped at the pier-end for three minutes

Knight, on cross-examination, said:—"Every time the Cricket got under way, when there were from 400 to 500 persons on board, I was obliged to tie the valves. I knew it was attended with danger, but I did not tell any one about it before I left the vessel. I began to tie the valves down the first journey I made, by order of Clarke. I tied them down six weeks before I was told by Mr Baltress that it was dangerous. I remained in the Cricket a fortnight after I was told there was danger."

By a Juror: "Either Clarke or I tied down the valves every journey. Previous to their being fastened, the steam escaped, but afterwards there were no means of escape. When the valves were tied, the boiler would get three times as hot during a journey as it ought to have done. The people, such as fishmongers and others, who went early to market, got so used to it, that they frequently used to cal out 'all hot, all hot' (Laughter.) I used to make up the furnaces in a morning, before starting. The Cricket was an extraordinarily built boat; I never saw any other like her. We could tell by the cooks what water was in the boiler. Clarke would often take away the vessel when there was no water in the boiler, trusting to the pumps working when the boat was moving. The pumps would sometimes out of order, which made it very dangerous to commence a journey without a full supply of water. The engines worked well when the gauge stood from 30 to 40."

The other evidence was unimportant, and the inquest was adjourned till Wednesday.

The inquest was resumed on Wednesday, for the sixth time.

Mr. Edward Portwine examined: I live at No 27, Catharine-street, Pimlico. I am a writer on engineering and machinery. I have seen the boilers of the Cricket, and examined the mercury gauge; it stood at 140 or 37. I told the engineer that it was extremely unsafe to work boilers of the description of those in the Cricket at that pressure. I have nothing to say against the construction of the engine, but I consider there was too great a pressure on the boiler.

By a Juror: I am not a working engineer, neither was Dr. Lardner. It is not usual to work the engines so high as 36; they ought to be worked higher than 22 or 23, certainly not to exceed 27.

By Mr. James: I have been writing on engineering for several years. The pressure on the engines depended principally on whether they were constructed for high or low pressure. The engines of the Ant, Bee, and Cricket were constructed for working as low pressure condensing engines; they were, however, worked at high pressure. I heard so from the different engineers.

Mr. Lloyd, chief engineer and inspector of the navy, underwent an examination, which lasted nearly four hours. The examination, however, chiefly turned upon professional points, the strength of the boilers, and the general condition of the machines.

The witness having made a lucid explanation upon these points, said:—

"I have come to the conclusion, from the best computation I can give the subject, that the strength of the front plate, aided by the imperfect assistance of the two small stays, was not sufficient to bear for a length of time (that is, during the usual time a boiler ought to be supposed to last) a pressure of steam of 80 lbs. to the square inch. For a time it would bear that pressure, but not long. I have made a calculat on of what would be the effect or keeping all the valves down either from accident or design. If the steam was not allowed to escape from any of the valves, it would increase from 60 to 90 in five minutes, in ten minutes to 130 or 140, and in a quarter of an hour it would be 180. I cannot conceive is possible that al the valves would stick at the same time, and if one or two remained free it would relieve the boiler. If the two weight valves were tied, it would bring a dangerous pressure on the boiler. I have tested the strength of the boiler, and examined places which were blown out at the time of the explosion. Mr. Lloyd here described the mode in which he made the examination, and produced several pieces of the Cricket's plate and exploded boiler, and those of the trial plate at Woolwich Dockyard. The average strength of the tunsel plates is 17 tons, and the strength of plates of the same thickness, of the best description, 21 and 2-3d tons. Specimens of these plates I also produces The plates of the Cricket are very much damaged."

Coroner: To what cause do you attribute that?

Witness: I attribute it to the iron being bad, but that must sometimes happen with the greatest possible caution. It is wrought iron several times rolled. I tried some common Staffordshire iron at Woolwich, and I found it nearly the same strength as the plates of the Crickes; it bore 16 2-3rd tons to the square inch. I do not consider the workmanship of the boiler such as it ought to be in an engine of this description; the rivets did not completely fill the holes, and they were not sufficiently long to make good rivets. The boiler did not seem seriously deteriorated by wear except that the two lower part of it.

Mr. Lloyd was cross-examined by the Counsel, and some of the Jurors.

By a Juror: It might be convenient to the a string to the end of the safety valve, but I do not consider it to be necessary. There is no cast iron boilers; they are made of wrought iron. I have heard of safety valves being sometimes tied down.

Mr Chambers: It is essential for the public to know if the boilers of the Ant and Bee are of the same construction and material as the Cricket boiler.

Mr. Lloyd said, he could not answer that question, as he had not examined the boilers of either the Ant or Bee, but if they are the same he should not consider them safe.

Mr. James said, the boilers of the Ant and Bee were much stronger than the boiler of the Cricket

Thomas Clarke, the Engineer, said: I am an engineer and mechanist, living at No. 63, Commercial-road, Lambeth. I was engaged on the Crickes in April last. I was the first time I did was to examine the boiler, when I found one of the plates at the back a little "blistered." I told Mr. Joyce of it, and he examined it, and said it was of no consequence. On the 30th of April I had a quarrel with Skinner; Edwards passed by at the time, and used a strong expression. I discharged Edwards on the following Monday; before that time I never heard of the valves being tied down: they were not tied down. Shortly afterwards, for the 4th and Mr. Pollett told me that Edwards had informed them the valves were tied down, and they directed me to act cautiously. I told them that the valves were not tied. In fact, the valves were tied down during all the time I was on the boat. I last acted in the Cricket as engineer about three weeks before the explosion. I never saw any one tie the valves down. I never saw them tied down. The boat worked very well; but, like other boats, sometimes went by blowing. I remember on one occasion the st am coming into the engine-room. I think it probable that when the vessel lay a little on one side at the pier, that the safety-valves did not let a sufficient quantity of steam escape I consider that arose in consequence of there being more water in one boiler than another. The levers to the safety-valve worked well. On the morning of the accident, I was at the paddle-wheel box with Hasaman. I have known the safety-valves to stick several times, and have called attention to it. I have on those occasions opened the valve with a stick or piece of iron. There is no pulley to lift the lever up. I used to shake the valve until I made it free. I never entirely removed the lever from the valve. I used to regulate it. I knew Knight; he was stoker when I was in the Cricket. I never saw him do anything to the valves, except shake them with a string, by my orders. I never saw him tie the string to a nail after shaking the valves. I never gave him directions to tie the string at both ends.

On examination by Mr James, the witness said: I never knew the steam to be so high as 80. I never heard people on the deck say at the time I was driving the engine, "All hot; Captain, all hot." The crew might have said so. On being pressed, the witness said: I heard, during the last three weeks I was on the Cricket, people say, "All hot, all hot." The other cords to those used in the Crickes are affixed to the supply valves of the Ant and Bee. I should say they were made faster than the cords used to be on the Cricket. I was not aware that any person in the rope to allow the valve to act proper y. I never saw Knight fasten the ropes so tight that the valves would not act.

At the conclusion of Clarke's evidence, the inquest was adjourned till Friday (yesterday).

MELANCHOLY ACCIDENT ON THE MANCHESTER AND LEEDS RAILWAY.

In part of our impression last week, we stated that an accident of a fearful character happened on the previous Thursday afternoon to an express train on the Manchester and Leeds Railway, by which the lives of two passengers were sacrificed, and many others seriously injured. The train left Manchester at one o'clock for Leeds and other towns in the north of England, with a large number of passengers, amongst whom were Captain Ellis, connected with the Admiralty; Mr. Robert Weston, Surveyor-General of Customs; Mr. Thomas Moon, his secretary; and Mr. Gillard, superintendent of the telegraph. These gentlemen were in the last carriage (a first-class one) of the train, which travelled at its usual pace, about thirty miles an hour, until its arrival near the Sowerby-bridge Station, twenty-eight miles distant from Manchester, and five miles from Halifax. Here the last carriage got off the line. As speedily as possible, however, the train was brought to a stoppage, but by that time the carriage had struck the abutments of some of the bridges with such force as nearly to demolish it, throwing out several of the unfortunate passengers with considerable violence. Mr. Gillard was killed on the spot; his body was stretched on the permanent way, having, no doubt, in being hurled from the carriage, come in contact with one of the bridges. In the wreck of the shattered carriage was Mr. Robert Weston, the Surveyor-General of Customs, shockingly injured, having sustained compound fractures of the right thigh and left ancle, and fracture of the skull. Mr Moon, his secretary, was also seriously hurt, and the other passengers in the carriage more or less so. Unfortunately, Mr. Weston's

SKETCHES IN SPAIN.

THE QUEEN PASSING LA PUERTA DEL SOL, AT MADRID.

The first of these Sketches represents a recent enthusiastic demonstration of the population of Madrid, to the Queen, called forth by the announcement of the amnesty, and the recal of Espartero.

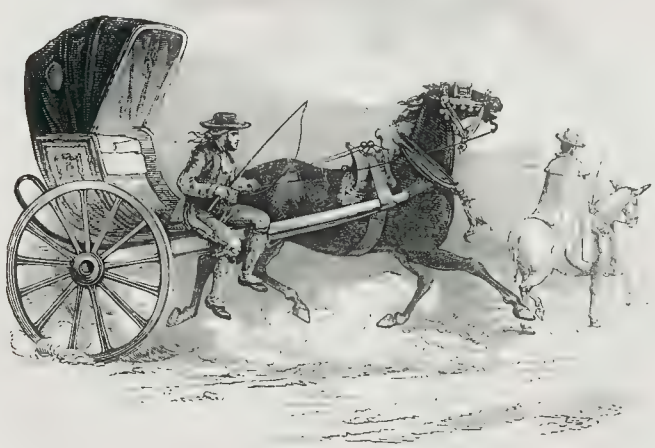
In the intelligence dated the 6th inst., it is stated that—"About an hour or so before her Majesty left the Palace for her usual promenade, a large concourse of persons had assembled in the Court. As soon as the Queen appeared on horseback, attended by only three or four persons, she was received with the most enthusiastic shouts, which were prolonged as she passed through the Calle Mayor, Puerta del Sol, Calle Alcalá, and Prado; and, to a late hour, parties of amateur musicians paraded the streets.'

The shouts are ringing loud and wild,
The joybells rend the air,
Hailing yon Queen, almost a child
In years—not so in care.
Beset, betrayed, her flower of life
Fines, canker'd in its core.
Oh! better far to be the wife
Of the humblest Picador!

Still peal the vivas to the sky,
As the young Queen rides along;
Both high and low join in the cry,
Or chant Riego's song.
The country's gates are open thrown
To th' exiled sons of Spain!
Oh! surely such an act alone
Might render Faction vain.—L.

The second Sketch is from the road to that "exciting, peculiar, and picturesque spectacle"—the Bull-fight.

"Nothing," says Mr. Ford, "can exceed the gaiety and sparkle of a Spanish public going, eager and full-dressed, to the fight. They could not move faster, were they running away from a real one. All the streets, or open spaces, near the outside of the arena are a spectacle. The merry mob is everything. Their excitement under a burning sun, and their thirst for the blood of bulls, is fearful. There is no sacrifice no denial which they will not undergo, to save money for the Bull-fight. The man go in all their best costume and majo-finery: the distinguished ladies wear, on these occasions, white lace mantillas, and, when heated, look, as Adrian said, like sausages wrapt up in white paper: a fan, abanico, is quite necessary, as it was among the Romans." (Mart. xiv. 28.)



THE ROAD TO THE BULL-FIGHT.

Commutation of Lieutenant Munro's Sentence.—Her Majesty, on the recommendation of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, has commuted the sentence of death recorded against Lieut. Munro to twelve months' imprisonment in Newgate. The announcement was made by Mr. Cope, the governor, to Lieut. Munro, who expressed his deepest gratitude for the clemency which had been accorded to him. Although, in accordance with the rules and regulations of the prison, Lieut. Munro was, after the sentence had been recorded, removed from that part of the prison in which married persons are placed, to the part among those who have been tried and convicted, yet everything that could add to the comfort of the unfortunate gentleman has been afforded, he being placed in a room by himself, and allowed books of various descriptions. He employs a great portion of his time in reading and writing; in fact, Lieut. Munro is as comfortable as the peculiar circumstances of his case will permit.

Statistics of France.—In recent official returns we find the following statements:—The population of Paris, which was only 935,261 souls in 1841, is now increased to 1,053,897. The total number of steam engines in France was 207 in 1845, whilst in 1840 it had been only 102. The produce of the French coal pits in 1845, was 42,022,919 metric quintals, being 4,193,524 more than in 1844. 22,572,949 quintals of foreign coals were imported in the same year, and the exportation amounted to 902,176. The increase in the produce of the French iron mines is equally important. In 1845, the quantity of iron cast was 420,000 tons, whereas, in 1825, the quantity cast was only 190,000. The general movement of the French external commerce by sea, which amounted to 2,045,978 tons in 1835, and 2,371,421 in 1836, presented in 1845 an augmentation of 1,554,000 tons; the foreign flags coming in for 930,000, and the French for 624,000.

Short Measure among the Drapers.—There has recently been some excitement in the drapery trade, in consequence of the discovery of a system of unfair measurement. The question first arose from a desire on the part of a few of the retail dealers to obtain the co-operation of the wholesale houses in the more equitable measurement of various goods, inasmuch as, under the existing system, the public are constantly defrauded to an immense extent. A meeting, for the purpose of investigating into some of the allegations made against the wholesale houses, has taken place in the presence of several exporters and others interested in the question. At this meeting, sealed packets of goods from many of the wholesale houses were examined, and the result showed that there was much reason for complaint. Among other instances, reels of cotton thread, marked "warranted 100 yards," were found to measure respectively 92¼, 89, 85¼, and in some cases even 25 per cent. less than the quantity indicated by the stamp, while in no single instance did the measurement reach the full standard. In tapes the deficiency was found to be still more considerable. It is usual to make white tapes in lengths of nine yards, one dozen of these lengths being packed in a parcel, and then issued from the wholesale house with the vendor's mark upon it as "warranted." On measuring these "nine yard lengths" it was found that in every instance they fell short. In some descriptions the nine yard lengths were under seven yards, in others under six, whilst in another sample, where the tape itself had been stamped at the end in indelible ink, as nine yards, there were found to be but five and three-quarters. Other goods were submitted to the same ordeal with like results. It appeared, from inquiries on the subject, that for some length of time the manufacturers have been improperly accused of being the guilty parties in these transactions; but their account of the affair is, that they are compelled to follow the instructions of the wholesale houses in making up the parcels, or to run the risk of the transference of the custom to some less scrupulous trader. The wholesale houses, in their turn, exteuuate their conduct by reference to the competition which exists, and which compels them to adopt this system. Meetings, however, are in course of organisation throughout the country, and the principals of some of the wholesale houses have intimated their desire to lend their influence towards the establishment of a sounder system of trade.

Railway Calls for September.—The amount of calls due on English lines, and payable this month, is £2,536,624. On Scotch lines the amount payable is £90,000, and on Irish lines £99,750, making a total of calls due this month of £2,726,374. The total amount called up this year by English, Scotch, and Irish Companies is, including the present month, £27,984,023. This is exclusive of £5,238,000 which has been called up by foreign lines.

THE WESTMINSTER HALL EXHIBITION.

"HENRY V., WHEN PRINCE OF WALES, BELIEVING THE KING TO BE DEAD, TAKES THE CROWN FROM THE CUSHION."—(PREMIUM £200.)—PAINTED BY JOHN CALCOTT HORSLEY.

WITH Mr. Horsley's picture, for which he has received one of the £200 Premiums, we conclude our Series of Illustrations of the National Exhibition in Westminster Hall. The painting is of a large gallery size—in height 14 feet 9 inches, and in width 10 feet, and stands thus in the Catalogue:—

Henry V., when Prince of Wales, Believing the King to be Dead, Takes the Crown from the Cushion. . John Calcott Horsley.

Prince Henry. * * * * * * *
* * * Thy due, from me,
Is tears, and heavy sorrows of the blood;
Which nature, love, and filial tenderness,
Shall, O dear father, pay thee plenteously:
My due, from thee, is this Imperial crown,
Which, as immediate from thy place and blood,
Derives itself to me,—so here it sits, (Putting it on his head)
Which Heaven shall guard: And put the world's own strength
Into one giant arm, It shall not force
This lineal honour from me: This from thee
Will I to mine leave, as 'tis left to me.
"King Henry IV.," Part Second, act IV., scene 4.

In arrangement of colour, and in light and shade, this is, perhaps, the most successful picture in the Exhibition. The "mad wight," Prince Henry, is represented as having just returned from the chase, his horn still at his side, and spurs on his heels; he has divested himself of one glove only, ere he lifts the golden diadem to his brows; and, by the attitude in which the Prince is standing, the artist has evidently felt the proud defiance which Shakspeare intended his Prince should feel when he makes him say:—

And put the world's own strength
Into one giant arm, it shall not force
This lineal honour from me.

The dying King is admirably expressed; and, perhaps, indeed, this is the most beautiful portion of the picture: the faint light glimmering on the forehead of the King, and the out-stretched hand feebly grasping the sceptre, as it rests on a faldstool by the bedside, are exquisite ideas, most skilfully worked out. In point of execution, this picture is very fine; the silk, velvet, and furs, being wrought with wonderful attention to texture, and, altogether, with admirable success.

The dying Monarch's pulseless hand drops on Weak Richard's sceptre; and th' Usurper's soul
Is slowly wending to that awful goal
Whence travellers return not. His young son,
Wild, gallant, Harry, whose blade flamed upon
The field of Agincourt, now feels the whole
Weight of his heritance. With streaming eyes
He takes the crown and fits it on his brow—
When spake his Father, 'mid death's agonies:
"So soon, my Son? Is that befitting now?"
"Oh! Father, Father, 'twas in fearful thought
I communed with that bauble for a while."
"Alas! my Harry, 'twas too dearly bought!"—
And the King gave his son his dying smile.—L.

FINE ARTS.

PICTORIAL ILLUSTRATIONS OF NEW ZEALAND. By S. C. Brees, C.E. Williams and Co.

The Author and Artist of this follows engaged in New Zealand, and resided at Wellington, as engineer and surveyor of the New Zealand Company, from 1841 to 1845; he is also advantageously known to the public as the author of a standard work on "Railway Practice." He had, consequently, numerous opportunities of witnessing the trials and difficulties of the Colonists, and he assures us that "he left New Zealand with reluctance, charmed with the country and climate, but grieved that this favourable field for the enterprising colonist and refuge for the industrious emigrant should have failed in its early stage in commanding the consideration that was expected." However, the prospects of the colony are brightening; and Mr. Brees's work appears opportunely enough, at what we hope may be an improved era of its colonisation.

The Illustrations comprise sixty-four distinct views of the most important and interesting localities in the Colony; besides two Panoramic Scenes: all are nicely drawn and delicately aquatinted. Rivers, bays, lakes, infant towns, and first settlements, are the leading points illustrated; and we see the hut-like dwelling, the colonist's cottage, and the abode of the Government officer—all, we trust, so many germs of prosperity gleaming amidst luxuriant plains, and the gigantic vegetation of the hitherto untrodden forest. On the fertile banks of the Hutt are the neat farms of the prosperous settler—the stack, the barn, the windmill, and the homestead; the thriving town of Wellington, Port Nicholson, a Surveyor's Encampment in the Bush, with a scene of his every-day life; a native Pa, with a memorial to a deceased Chief; "the Aglionby Arms," a small hotel on the Hutt, and the nucleus of a village; the town of New Plymouth, with Mount Egmont, and the Sugar-loaf Islands; Thoms's Whaling Station, and some statistics of the trade, showing the oil and whalebone caught in the neighbourhood of Port Nicholson, in 1844, to have been worth about £50,000 in the London market. Next, we have Port Nicholson, from Lowry Bay—a splendid scene; the little town of Petre, Wanganui, always a favourite with its residents and visitors—with the church on a hill, and the flag-staff and settlers' houses on the river-bank. Then, the Residence of his Honour Major Richmond, and the Hon. F. Molesworth, showing colonisation to be anything but a bed of roses; a gorge in the Hutt Road, with some magnificent specimens of the giant timber, the graceful pine, and the picturesque tree-fern; and the dense underbush matted with creepers and parasitical plants. The Church and Parsonage at Wellington, and the town of Kororaika, Bay of Islands, form a very attractive Plate; and the locality of the Artist's own cottage gives a good idea of newly-cleared country: the valley was once covered with thick forests, of which only one tree is left—a white pine, now preserved for the sake of ornament.

Another stage of colonisation is given in Barrett's Hotel, with a billiard-room and Freemasons' Hall, and beyond it, a Medical Hall—here a group of natives, and there a couple of emigrants—showing us life at Wellington; not omitting a view up one of its streets, backed by the thickly wooded Tinakore range of hills. The river scenery, with the richly-carved canoes of the natives; and the native Pa at Pipitea Point; are not forgotten amongst the settler's progress; a huge cabbage-tree, overhanging the Hutt, and parties of natives in canoes, steering past Mr. Molesworth's farm, is a very effective scene; and a pair of views—the Wesleyan Chapel and Mission House, and the Exchange, with the Jetty and windmill—show us the town again. Mr. Swainson's cottage at the Hutt, has an air of English comfort; and the beautiful scenery of the Ohiro Valley entitles it to the epithet of "Happy." The Kai-warra Saw Mill illustrates the ready mode of clearing: it consists of a water-wheel placed athwart the stream, which works several circular saws, and the water is dammed up above, to maintain the requisite head; huge trees lie felled, and the doomed forest is in the distance: further on, the work of clearing of a red pine forest is shown; a clump of tall trees are left to shadow the clearers' hut, and the timber-carriage is drawn by four sturdy oxen. The country has few rocky wonders—but, one of them, a lofty natural arch, of argillaceous slate, and hard marble, almost black in colour, makes a fine subject; and the Paramata Pa, with its fishing poles, stockade, and stacked fire-wood, takes us once more to the life of the natives. The two Panoramas one of Wellington, and the other from the top of Mount Victoria are cleverly executed. A Map of New Zealand, and its Harbours, drawn to a large scale, with depths of soundings, &c., completes the Illustrations.

The latter press is, in the main, the result of the Author's own observation. The Pas, of which we frequently read in our news from the Colony, are small fortified villages, inclosed with stockades and trenches sometimes built of great strength, and on elevated spots. They are presided over by a single chief, and frequently contain from 1000 to 2000 inhabitants, and a large number of subdivisions or alleys within, as each family has a separate inclosure, in which there are one or more huts built; but with but few pigs and dogs, and often cats and fowls, which are kept in by low bars laid across the entrances. The huts have a sort of portico, lined with reeds, and ornamented with carving, bearing a great resemblance to ancient Grecian scroll-work. Mr. Brees has frequently observed scrolls, fruits, volutes, &c., exactly resembling those found on Etruscan vases. In short, most of the most caring bears the same relation to early Grecian as Norman ornaments do to late Roman work. The volutes on the prows of the canoes resemble Grecian scroll-work "although," says Mr. Brees, "this peculiarity had never been remarked by any previous writer or traveller, yet, upon being pointed out to different parties in the colony, they perceived it instantly. perhaps, it may afford some clue to the numerous speculations respecting the original country of the wanes; their traditions state that they came from the eastward in vessels of much larger size than their present canoes."

In this extended notice we need scarcely add our warmest commendation of Mr. Brees's work as presenting the fullest information available respecting the actual condition of the now prosperous colony of New Zealand; in addition to the artistic attraction of the Illustrations.

ERRATA.—In the statement of facts connected with the History of Shakespere's family to our last, at page 180, we give a translation of the entry upon the Court-roll at Stratford, showing that the Poet's father was admitted, at the Quitrent, to two copyhold estates, in 1556. In this translation, for "in the year of the reign of William and Mary," &c., read "in the year of the reign of Philip and Mary," &c. At page 180, for "Dagger," read "Dagos."

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 1847.

THERE is scarcely any proposition more evident than that it is of the very utmost importance that the right of the Elective Franchise should be most easily asserted by those who are entitled to claim it.

If, from any cause, no matter what, legal tricksters are enabled, for their own petty purposes, to interpose such obstacles to the establishment of one's title to that most valuable of all the rights of the subject, as may effectually diminish the number of voters on the Registration Roll, we cannot, Englishmen though we be, justly say that we possess that full, complete, and perfect measure of freedom, which is alone compatible with the glorious boast that the mere touch of "the sacred soil of Britain" is the charter of liberty to the most fettered bondsman.

The indefeasible right of the subject, who pays taxes, to vote at the election of a member of that body of legislative Representatives that is to dispose of those taxes, cannot be destroyed amid the strife of party, nor sacrificed to the chicane and avarice of a few cunning lawyers, who only regard it as an excellent means, under the guise of patriotism, of putting money in their own pockets, without striking at the very root of all the advantages which arise from Constitutional Government. If proof were needed, it could unfortunately be but too readily adduced from the social and political features which not only neighbouring states, but even certain portions of the British empire present. It is then with more than ordinary satisfaction that we notice a decision that has been lately come to by Mr. M'Christie, the Revising Barrister in the City Registration Court, where the nuisance of "frivolous and vexatious objections" to voters' claims has been suffered to grow to an intensity of rank offensiveness which loudly called for removal or suppression. The nature and extent of the evil are so clearly stated in the reports of the morning papers, that we best consult brevity by quoting from them.

It appears that the Conservatives have objected to no less than 2279 voters, while the Liberals have only objected to 1181. Deaths and removals could scarcely account for such a sweeping riddance of men who only a few weeks before were entitled to the franchise. The cases which have been brought before this Court explain the matter, and the decision to which the Revising Barrister has come seems very well calculated to put a stop to this wanton system of making objections. The process is this:—The Conservatives—and, for aught we know, the Liberals too—have a list of the voters before them; they send canvassing letters to these voters through the Post-office; to these letters either no answers are given, or the letters themselves are returned, endorsed "Not known," "Gone away," "No such person," &c. Thereupon, notices of objection for non-residence are served.

And what may it be supposed is the nature of the process of objection to the franchise of a freeman and liveryman of the City of London? Just hear it, as described by the Learned Judge himself:—

In the first place, the objector must serve a notice on the person who was objected to, then a notice on the Secondaries, and thirdly, a notice on the Clerk of the Company to which the voter belonged. In the next place, the Secondaries must make a list of the objections, publish copies in the Guildhall and Royal Exchange, keep a copy for inspection by any person, without fee, and furnish copies to any person requiring the same, on payment of a fixed price. They were, moreover, required to transmit an abstract of their list of objections to the Revising Barrister; and, finally, both the Secondaries and the Clerks of the Livery Companies were required to attend the first court held by the Barrister, and deliver in their lists, together with the original notices of claims and objection received by them.

After all this has been accomplished, what happens when the time for adjudicating upon those "notices of objection" arrives? Why the voter objected against, if from whatever cause he is unable to attend court at the time, is disfranchised; but if he present himself, the agent, knowing that he cannot restrain his objection, says, "Oh! it's a mistake, the objection is withdrawn;" and when the voter, indignant at this attempt to "bamboozle" him out of his most cherished right of citizenship, demands as some slight recompense for the loss of time and trouble to which he has been wantonly put, the costs allowed by the law to be given to those who are subjected to frivolous and vexatious objections, the agent thrusts his hands deep into his breeches pockets, and with a self-satisfied side-long leering look of compassionate contempt for the "greenness" implied by such a demand, exclaims, "expenses! costs! eh? for what? I have withdrawn my objection—you have no claim on me." And thus it happens that numbers who intuitively shrink from contact in any shape or way with the arts and practices of the trickster, forego their just right of franchise, which should be as malleable as that of personal liberty, rather than be duped and humbugged to their very faces in the manner we have attempted to describe. The Registration Roll, drawn up under such a system, is but a "delusion, a mockery, and a snare." The remedy, however, is at hand, and comes from the right quarter. The Revising Barrister has decided upon adopting the following course:—

First, that he should do nothing that he could consider calculated to deter bond fide objections being made and brought forward; secondly, that where groundless objections were brought forward, he should give costs; and, thirdly, that as to cases of notices of objection which had been given, but where persons never called on from the lists which had been delivered to him, if he were then told the objections were withdrawn, as those notices had passed through all the mazes and formalities he had last read from the act, and the originals had been placed in his hands, provided the parties to whose names the objections had been taken, and upon whom the notices had been served, appeared, and informed him that they had received notice of objection, though the hardship of their case might appear being proved or admitted, he should hold, notwithstanding he might not do so at this late period, the objections were withdrawn, that, under the act, the objections had been made, and in such cases give costs, and that was the rule he should adhere to.

This very common-sense view of the matter has begun at once to produce fruit, for we learn from the same sources of information we have used above, that since Mr. M'Caristie's decision was come to "the agents of the two parties have gone through the lists of objections together, and, after having considered the evidence each party had to address, they had come to an agreement as to what names should be expunged, what objections withdrawn, and what retained for hearing."

HUMANITY and decency have been again shocked by the revolting details of the charnel-house at Elim Chapel, Fetter-lane. What ideas of "the House of God" have the worshippers at Elim Chapel? Do they, by some unaccountable, discorted association of religious fancies, believe that their prayers shall ascend more incense-like because it is uttered amid the reeking effluvia, the putrid stench, of decomposed human bodies? Is it possible that the senses of any body of men, presumed to be civilised, can be so overshadowed by fatuity or fanatic insensibility as to make choice, for their place of prayer, of a house filled with the fluid corruption of thousands of human corpses? And if some unnatural fanaticism of the kind is not to be presumed, how are we to account for the authorities that, in this age of science and the diffusion of knowledge, a body of Christians voluntarily select as the scene of their devotions to the God of all purity a house thronged with the rotting dead a pesthouse, whence they diffuse amongst their friends and neighbours the seeds of fatal disease and death? The history of ancient nations, even those who had not the knowledge of the true God, exhibits no approach to such barbarism. There is nothing to be found like it in the history of the Bible. The true spirit of religion, which is never incompatible with decency and philanthropy, does not recognise the hideous filthiness and corruption of Elim Chapel. It is not easy to impute to a Christian congregation of such a metropolis as London is, so great an amount of ignorance or apathetic indifference as the case seems to imply; and yet, from some one or all of these causes at which we have glanced, the evil must have taken its origin, if the whole case, as given in the newspapers, has been laid before the public. How humiliating is such a reflection! Something of a similar kind attracted attention a few years ago with respect to a place known as Enon Chapel, situated also in a densely-peopled quarter of the Metropolis; and from the extreme likeness which the two cases present, people, we should think, will begin to look on the opposite side of the way when they pass a Chapel with a very re herché Hebrew name inscribed over the door. The idea of "a mortuary Chapel" will at once suggest itself to the prudent pedestrian, and he will hasten his steps from the poisoned structure. But why should it be allowed to come to this? Why is not burial in such localities, or, indeed, within the precincts of towns altogether, peremptorily prohibited by Act of Parliament? Some hopes of good seem to be entertained from the labours of the Sanatory Commission lately appointed by the Government. We trust that they may not (after the manner of Commissioners usually) prove a failure. Things at all events cannot be worse than they are at present. Trustees of Christian Chapels, with Hebrew names, are at present so convinced of the propriety and legality of their reading of the Constitution, that they boldly insist at the very seat of Justice the Magistrates shall accept their interpretation of it. With them "liberty of the subject" means liberty to poison the atmosphere. Their propagandism is the propagation of pestilence. Aldermen Hooper and Johnson, however, had a different reading, and on Saturday, at Guildhall, issued a peremptory order to those gentry to abate the nuisance.

THE WEATHER.

THE weather during the past week has been distinguished for being cold, the sky cloudy, a heavy gale of wind of long continuance, and a good deal of wind from the S.W. The following are some particulars of each day.

Thursday, September 16, the sky mostly covered by cloud till 5h. P.M., and, after this time, the sky was cloudless. Rain was falling early in the morning. A gale of wind was blowing throughout the day from the S.W. and W.S.W.; during the afternoon and the evening the gale was at the highest, the gusts of wind were very strong and frequent. The average temperature of the day was 58°, being about that of the season. The average temperature of the week ending this day was 59°. Friday, the sky was for the most part cloudy throughout the day, and rain was falling occasionally; the gale of wind moderated a great deal; but was frequently very strong during the day; its direction was principally S.W.; the average temperature of the day was 54½°. Saturday, the sky was at times cloudless, and at other times it was much covered with cumuli, cirrostratus, and scud; a heavy shower of rain fell during the afternoon; the wind at times blew strongly from the W.S.W.; the average temperature of the day was 52°. Sunday, the sky was principally covered by cloud, consisting of cirrostratus and scud; the direction of the wind was S.W.; the average temperature of the day was low, being only 49°. Monday, the sky was overcast throughout the day, with the exception of some time about the middle of the day, when broken clouds covered a portion of the sky only; some rain fell in the evening; the direction of the wind was S.W.; the average temperature of the day was 50°. Tuesday, the sky was overcast throughout the whole day; a drizzling rain began to fall after noon, and continued falling during the remainder of the day; the wind was from S.W. and W.S.W. The morning was very cold, the thermometer reading being as low as 37°; the day continued cold till 5h. P.M.; almost immediately after this time the temperature increased, and by 7h. P.M. it had increased 7°, and it continued to increase after this time during all the following night; the average temperature of the day was 49°. Wednesday, the sky was mostly cloudy till 9h. P.M.; it was cloudless from this time till 9h. P.M.; and between 9h. P.M. and midnight it was partially cloudy; the direction of the wind was W. and W.S.W.; the average temperature of the day was 51°, being no less than 12° warmer than the day before. Thursday, the sky was frequently wholly covered with dark scud, but at times it was nearly free from cloud; the wind was blowing rather strongly from the W.S.W.; the average temperature of the day was 57°, and that for the week ending this day was 53°.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

RETURN OF THE COURT TO THE ISLE OF WIGHT.—Her Majesty, Prince Albert, and the Royal Family, returned to Osborne House on Wednesday.

PRINCE GEORGE OF CAMBRIDGE.—His Royal Highness Prince George of Cambridge will be absent from England about a month. His Royal Highness joined the Duchess of Cambridge and Princess Mary at Rumpenheim, near Frankfort, last week.

LORD AND LADY BROUGHAM.—Lord and Lady Brougham are entertaining a select circle at their Château-en-Sal. The Marquis of Douro has arrived on a visit to the noble and learned Lord, from his shooting box, in the Highlands

THE MARRIAGE OF MISS BURDETT COUTTS WITH THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.—Some time ago we informed our readers, upon an authentic source, that a marriage was in contemplation between the Duke of Wellington and Miss Burdett Coutts. We have reason to believe that the marriage will very soon take place. In consequence of advices of the Duke's son-in-law, the Marquis Douro having been engaged for some weeks past in preparing the settlements, but, owing to a difficulty which had suggested itself respecting the descent of the property, some delay took place in concluding the preliminaries. The difficulties which are stated to have arisen proceeded from the express desire of the lady that the greater part of her fortune should be settled upon the heirs to the title of the Duke of Wellington in perpetuity. The considerable amount of difference has now been effected, and in the event of the direct line becoming extinct, the property is eventually to be applied to an object intimately connected with the renown of the great warrior.

THE MAJORITY OF THE HON. E. STANLEY.—Great festivities are in progress at Knowsley Hall, to celebrate the coming of age of the eldest son of Lord Stanley. The tenantry assembled on the Lancashire property have been invited to enjoy themselves. The sum of £25,000, it is stated, has been placed by Lord Stanley at the disposal of the agents and stewards for the occasion. Lord Stanley proceeds to the Chimera, and the merriment will be of the most uproarious description.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE NEW PARLIAMENT.—On Tuesday, the writs were returnable for the meeting of the new Parliament, but an Order of Council had previously been issued, proroguing it to a further period. Shortly after the hour of 2 o'clock, the Lord Chancellor took his seat on the woolsack. The Earls of Denbigh and Gosford, Lord Sudeley, and three or three other Lords, were present at the time. Mr. Pulman, the Yeoman Usher of the Black Rod, was directed to summon the House of Commons. Almost immediately afterwards, Mr. J. Ley, one of the Clerks of the Table, and three others of the House, appeared at the bar. The Lord Chancellor then declared that her Majesty had been pleased to cause a writ to be issued under the Great Seal, proroguing the meeting of Parliament from that day, until Tuesday, the 12th of October. The writ for this purpose was then read by Mr. Rose, the clerk attendant. The Deputy Clerk of the Crown then appeared at the bar, and presented the return of Representative Peers for Scotland elected for the present Parliament.

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.—Tuesday being the festival of St. Matthew, commonly called at Christ's Hospital the "Speech Day," the Lord Mayor (Sir G. Carroll), with the Sheriffs, City authorities, and governors of that Royal Hospital, according to annual custom, attended morning service at Christ Church, Newgate-street, where a sermon was preached by the Rev. G. Warner, Assistant-Master at Christ's School, and an old Blue. After the close of the service, his Lordship, attended by several of the Aldermen and other civic officers, and by a good number of the Governors, proceeded to the magnificent hall to hear the orations, &c., which are a part of the business appointed for the day. Immediately on being brought into the centre of the hall, the speeches were delivered from it, under the direction of the Rev. Edward Rice, D.D., the much respected Head-Master. The speeches, all of which exhibited a high degree of merit, both in their composition, were delivered with great accuracy, propriety, and good taste, reflecting the utmost credit upon the tutors.

THE BANK OF ENGLAND.—On Wednesday a Special General Court of Proprietors was held to ballot for or against the resolution of the last meeting for an increase in the dividend to 4½ per cent. for the current half-year. The Governor, Deputy-Governor, and many of the Directors were present at eleven o'clock. At four o'clock the glasses were closed, the scrutineers retired, and on their return reported that the question had been decided in the affirmative, that the said dividend should be paid, out of interest and profits, without any deduction on account of income tax.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS IN THE METROPOLIS.—The number of births during the week ending on Saturday last was 1162, of which 594 were males and 568 females. This number is less by 115 than that of the previous week. The number of deaths was 1169, being seven more than the births, and 229 more than the weekly average for the last five summers, and 129 more than the previous week.

THE NEW SHERIFFS' STATE LIVERIES.—The State Livery of Mr. Sheriff Hill has been made by Messrs. Gaimes, Dodgson, and Nicol, of Bircolin-lane. The coat is dark blue, trimmed with broad silver lace, and embroidered with the bayntree in full fruit. Upon the left arm of the coat is the Sheriff's crest, encircled by a garter bearing his motto "Vine Montjoie Deo;" forming a badge, in a setting imitative of brilliants; a silver aguillette completes the splendid decoration. The waistcoat and breeches are white, with silver lace. The hat is trimmed with gold lace, and has white and blue ostrich feathers; and beneath the loop is embroidered the Sheriff's crest. The hat of Mr. Sheriff Cubitt's livery, by the above makers, is gold-laced, and is trimmed with black feathers. The coat is dark chocolate, guarded with broad gold lace, the crest badge as in Mr. Sheriff Hill's livery; crimson waistcoat, and white breeches, trimmed with gold; by Mr. Smith, of Bucklersbury. These liveries are very superb; the crest badge on the arm being a tasteful revival of old state splendour, entitled to special commendation.

RAILWAY ACCIDENTS.—A return of the number and nature of the accidents, and of the injuries attended to life and limb which occurred on the various railways in the United Kingdom from the 1st of January to the 30th of June, 1847, has been presented to the new Parliament. It shows us, in brief, that of a grand total of 23,114,4 passengers conveyed during the said half-year on railroads in England, Scotland, and Ireland, 101 were killed, and 100 more or less injured, being at the rate of 1.936th per cent. on both. Moreover, it appears, from a careful analysis of the returns, that of the 101 persons killed and 100 injured, there were 14 passengers killed and 48 wounded from causes beyond their own control, 8 killed and 3 injured owing to their folly or incautiousness, 8 servants of companies killed and seventeen injured from causes beyond their own control, 51 servants killed and 24 injured, owing to want of caution or recklessness (such as leaping from engines or carriages in rapid motion), and other similar acts of temerity), 19 trespassers killed and 7 injured, and 1 person killed and another injured while crossing the railways at level crossings.

POSTSCRIPT.

THE "CRICKET" EXPLOSION.—VERDICT OF THE JURY.

The inquiry relative to the explosion on board the Cricket steamer was resumed yesterday. The evidence was of a similar character to that previously given.

The Jury, after deliberating two hours, returned the following verdict:—"We find Henry Heaseman guilty of 'Manslaughter.' We consider Clarke highly culpable, and unfit to hold the situation of engineer. And we likewise consider Mr. Smith's conduct shamefully neglectful in not properly investigating the complaint made against Clarke."

DEPARTURE OF SIR HARRY SMITH.—Lieut.-General Sir Harry Smith left Portsmouth on Thursday, for the the Cape. He was accompanied by Lady Smith, and every demonstration of respect and esteem was evinced upon the occasion.

THE LIVERPOOL DEPUTATION AND THE RAILWAY COMPANIES.—On Thursday a deputation, consisting of Mr. D. Neilson, Mr. S. Woods, Mr. Healey, and others, deputed by the Liverpool Stock Exchange, waited on the Chairmen and Directors of the principal railway companies, in accordance with the wishes of the entire members of the Liverpool Stock Exchange, to take into consideration the present state of railway property, and adopt such measures as might be deemed advisable. The deputation succeeded in obtaining interviews with the following gentlemen, representing the chief lines of railways in the kingdom:—Mr. G. Carr Glynn, Mr. Hudson, M.P.; Mr. Ellis, Mr Smith, Mr. Charles Russell, Mr. Mills, Mr. P. Barlow, Mr. R. Bankes, Mr. C. Saunders, Mr. Chaplin, M.P.; Mr. Ricardo, M.P.; Mr Mac Gregor, Mr. Pritchard, and Mr Greenfell, M.P. The result of these interviews appeared to be, that a general feeling prevailed in favour of the objects of the deputation—that it would be desirable, as far as possible, to adopt the suggestions of the Liverpool Stock Exchange, to make as few calls as possible, to suspend all new operations where practicable, and to diffuse existing contracts over as large a space of time as possible. The deputation subsequently returned with these results of their inquiries to Liverpool.

FAILURE AT LIVERPOOL.—Letters from Liverpool announce the stoppage of another firm in that place, the liabilities of which house are said to exceed £300,000.

MURDER BY A MANIAC.—A man, named Lewis Mugford, has died from the effects of a wound inflicted by his master, Mr. Thomas Mackintosh Davidson, a gentleman of property, residing at Clay-hill, Tottenham. Mr. Davidson has been, for many years past, suffering under mental derangement. He has resided about eleven years at Clay-hill, and was under the care of the unfortunate man, Lewis Mugford, who was attended to by the surgeon of the village of Tottenham. On Sunday week two female servants and Mugford were at dinner in the kitchen, when Mr. Davidson entered and took a knife away. He was immediately followed by Mugford, who came up with another knife in his hand. Almost immediately a cry was heard, upon which Mrs. Holmes proceeded to the room, when she saw Mugford struck in the throat by Mr Davidson with the knife. Mugford rushed into the road, where he was attended to by the Police Officer on the Beat of Duty, and in an adjoining house, but he fell down and died in a few minutes. Mr. Davidson has been taken into custody, and now remains in the care of the police at his own residence. For several previous years Mr. Davidson never showed any signs of an intention to do mischief, and was allowed the liberty of the grounds, being only watched by the domestics. Mr. Davidson underwent an examination on Thursday, before the Edmonton Magistrates, who committed him for trial.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

TURKEY.

It appears by accounts from Constantinople of the 7th inst., that the Sultan's withdrawal of his representatives from Greece would probably be followed by the closing of the passage of the Dardanelles and Bosphorus—a movement which would embroil Turkey and Russia. It is anticipated, nevertheless, that the Divan will persist, at whatever risk.

GREECE.

Letters from Athens of the 10th state that the public finances are as deplorable as the increase of brigandism, bribery, and corruption is awful! A report had reached the Austrian Embassy at Athens, that Grisiotti was no more, having died at Sofia of his wounds. Mr. Andrew Korkovi, 3000 to 3000 of his followers are kept fourteen days allowed to subsist upon the produce of his lands Col. Pharmaki and several other officers of the phalanx have unlurled the standard of revolt, and taken up a position in the mountains to the north of Naupacta, where they are said to have repulsed a detachment of the King's troops under General Mamouris. Colonel Pappacosta, who was interdicted from leaving Salone, has fled, and taken up a position, with 100 followers, at Mavrolithari, in the heights of Ocèa; and Major Valenza has also left the capital, it is supposed, with a like object. The Cesarea, Austrian corvette, had arrived from Constantinople, and of the three English liners, two had left for Paros, to complete water.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

TURF "SETTLINGS."

LAST week we recorded the fortunes of the St Leger: in the present we purpose prating briefly about the misfortunes of certain of its dealers and chapmen.

Then comes the reckoning when the banquet's o'er.

The day of account indeed came—the successor of that which decided the issue—but many of the losers were fain to "reckon without their host." It is somewhat the courteous reader—may his shadow never be less!—is aware that legism is parcel of the turf—and that lavanting is part of its system. All good men and true are agreed that this is a grievous sin and shame—but they differ as to the treatment of the evil. "Legalise betting," says one—which appears like establishing a "raw," with a view to give the horse doctor a job. "Get rid of the P.P. rule," suggests another—In other words, make a big hole for the big rogues to pass through, and a little hole for the little fry even to creep out by. Now thus stands the case betting upon horse-racing is countenanced—recognised as the technical words express it—by the law; and as it has not been, nor is it announced, like every other species of "common gambling"... and silence gives consent. In this posture of the affair, what should all a sufferer by the lavanting of one who had covenanted to pay him eight and sixty moneys do upon such and such conditions, but that he hand over to the thief-taker the fellow who thus contemplated possessing himself of another's coin under false pretences? At best, justice is a matter of even betting—pro or con—but the experiment might be worth the trial. If the swindler should be set free—he will hardly venture to ask a jury to give him damages against his creditor: it's a dashing game but too often "nothing venture nothing have," is the philosophy that life teaches: audaces Fortuna juvat.

Is lavanting, in the spirit of the law, if not in the letter, propense swindling? Let us test this by a "case" -an imaginery one or not, as the reader shall determine for himself "I never knew," says the author of "Mrs. Perkins's Ball," "where Ballymulligan was—ever knew any one that did." The hero of our modern instance may appropriately hail from such a terra incognita: he shall be Mulligan the Second Well, it is at Epsom Races, some few years ago, that our man-about makes his first bow. The Mulligan has a noble nibble—his take of flat fish is a triumph of art. Would you believe it—the gudgeons at one "coup" are shoals! but it; but he gives the slip, and comest to the surface again, just in the nick of time to "land" them. He now sets up in a great way of business—another "fish monger" albeit not known "excellent well." Now his stall is at the Opera he has a miraculous schneider—and founds an annuity. His maxim of morals is,

I spend what I have, and I save what I owe

The day has arrived for a mighty coup: he goes to Doncaster, and "for the gloves," an expression meant to convey the most powerful possible essence of plunder, from the robbery to picking pockets—save the mark! He cuts cards "crabs," and straight way repairs to the French metropolis—Funbourg St. Honoré where he solaces himself under his affliction with a couple of thousands a-year—and a dinner at forty francs a-head—the café de Paris. Such is the condition of him who squares his policy according to the present practice of "turf settlings." He feeds fat, and takes the air in his coupé—the urchin who appropriates a penny-roll gets water gruel and bread

HER MAJESTY'S RETURN FROM SCOTLAND.—THE RECEPTION AT FLEETWOOD.

THE ROYAL YACHTS AT ANCHOR IN FLEETWOOD HARBOUR.

Lord Palmerston, expressed her unqualified approbation of the arrangements made by the company for her reception.

The pleasing intelligence of the Royal arrival at Fleetwood was communicated to the authorities at Preston about a quarter to six o'clock, and the bells of the parish church, in peals both loud and joyous, proclaimed to the loyal people of Preston that their most gracious Monarch was in Lancashire—an event which, since the days of the Second Charles, has not occurred.

So great was the enthusiasm along the line of railway, and in every direction near Preston, to catch even a passing glance of her Majesty, that at Wigan, Leyland, and various stations nearer Liverpool, crowds of anxious spectators were assembled, and lustily cheered.

Her Majesty arrived at the terminus of the London and North-Western Railway, in Euston-square, exactly at twenty-five minutes before six o'clock.

Her Majesty and the Prince were received at the station by Mr. Creed, the secretary, and several Directors of the Company, and immediately afterwards entered one of the Royal carriages, and proceeded to Buckingham Palace, escorted by a detachment of the 12th Regiment of Lancers, under the command of Lieutenant Mansell.

The Royal suite followed in four other of the Royal carriages, and drawn by four horses.

As the Royal cortège passed through the gates of the station, her Majesty and her illustrious Consort, who appeared in excellent health and spirits, were loudly cheered by the crowd which had assembled to witness their arrival.

As the port of Fleetwood is a creation of the last few years, it may be interesting to subjoin a few data of its rise and rapid progress.

The new Port and Town lies at the mouth of the Wyre, on the Lancashire coast. "This River," says Capt. Denham, in his account of the locality, "first assumes a river character near Bleasdale Forest, in Lancashire, and, after crossing the line of road between Preston and Lancaster, at Garstang, descends, as a tortuous stream, or five miles westward; then, in another five-mile reach, one-third of a mile wide, north-westward, sweeping the bight of Skippool, near Poulton-le-Fylde, on its way, and bursting forth from the Narrows, at Wardleas, upon a north trend, into the tidal estuary, which embraces an area of three miles by two, producing a combined rafter of back water, equal to 80,000,000 cubical yards, and dipping with such powerful under-scour during the first half-ebb, as to preserve a natural basin just within its coast-line orifice, capable of riding ships of fifteen or twenty feet draft at low water spring tides, perfectly sheltered from all winds, and within a cable's length of the railway terminus, 19 miles from Preston, and in connection with Manchester, Lancaster, Liverpool, and London."

On the western margin of this natural dock, rises the town of Fleetwood, with its wharfs, warehouses, and docks, under the privileges of a distinct Port.

Our especial acknowledgments are due to Sir Peacock Fleetwood, as well as to the Railway authorities, for their courteous attention to the requirements of our Artist.

RECEPTION OF HER MAJESTY IN THE SALOON ON THE LANDING-PIER AT FLEETWOOD.

AUTUMN.—DRAWN BY WILLIAM HARVEY

AUTUMN.

Crown'd with the clusters of the laughing vine,
Laden with Plenty's horn, and pealing forth
The pæan of thy triumph and the worth
Of Ceres' sons, whose mission is divine—
Autumn! thou comest!—joyfully we twine
The song of gratitude to Heaven's high throne:
No more the lands 'neath Famine's bondage pine—
No longer Pest lance extorts the groan.
The dismal day has vanished, the heart
Even of the bravest, wisest, quail'd with fear
For the dark future; and the field and mart
Ached for the promise of the present year!
Thanks to the Giver of all good y things,
Swart Autumn jocundly his anthem sings.

Merrily rings the vintage song of France,
And thine, Italia! now the task is done.
Blythe is the scene in Erin or Gar-mine,
When the brown peasantry lead forth the dance
In honour of the thyrsus—bloodless lance,
Save blood of gushing grape! And by the Rhine
Loud is the season's jubilee, while glance
The festal stars upon the Hodeien wine,
From east to west, from sunny south to north,
The universal hymn ascends to Heaven—
The universal pray'r of thanks is given
For the abundant blessings of the earth.
Well may the carolling be long and loud—
The Sun of Autumn has dispelled the cloud.

Hark! 'tis the Goddess of the Chase that winds
The hunter's horn, and calls her train afield.
Away! away! what sport can ever yield
Such glorious pleasure to all manly minds?
A sport to stir the blood of humblest hinds,
When the brave Centaur comes rushing o'er the plain
On the full view; and now no longer finds
The worn stag refuge where the Dryads reign.
Sounds "Tally Ho!" before Aurora's blush
Hath scarcely beamed upon the hunter's moon—
Reynard, with all his cunning, may lose his brush,
To wave o'er banner-net-cup at Cynthia's noon,
When intonates Old England's Squire his song,
And jests 'mid laughter loud the hours prolong.

But, oh! more blest than this, most blest of all—
Autumn! thou comest to the labouring poor,
Bearing thy gifts of gladness to their door,
Cheering their little ones, who need not call
Now vainly for their bread. The cot and hall
Have each their duties, which they will perform.
Together on the field they stand or fall—
Together on the main they brave the storm.
So let it be in peace! Then England's soul—
Soul of the world—may spread her saving light—
E'en as a beacon, 'mid the breakers roll,
Chafing in vain against her worth and might.
Welcome! swart Autumn! Bounteous is thy boon.
Welcome, fair Ceres, and the Hunter's Moon!—L.

THE THEATRES.

The season about to commence promises to be one of the most bustling that has been known for a long time in the theatrical world. The greater number of the vasts at all the houses that have been lately closed; and seldom have there been so many changes in the managements and arrangements of the leading establishments.

The HAYMARKET opens with either "The Road to Ruin," or "The School for Scandal, either of which pieces will introduce Mr. Farren, jun., to a London audience, in Young Dornton or Charles Surface. There will also be a force for the Keeleys; and Mr. Wigan, Miss Helen Faucit, Mr. Creswick, and probably Mr. Bunn, will be added to the company. A new play by Mr. Marston will be read next week, and many other novelties are in preparation. Shendt "The School for Scandal" be played, Mrs. Nisbett will, of course, be the Lady Teazle.

At the Princess', Mr Macready opens in "Macbeth," with Miss Cushman as the Queen. Mr. Cooper as Banquo, and the rest of the cast nearly as before. Engagements are Messrs. Macready, Cooper, Neville (from the Surrey), Gilbert (from America), James Young, Conway, Palmer, R. Hughes, Bodda, Fisher, Howard, Ryder, Cowell, &c.; and Mesdames Cushman, Macready, Gretton, Stanley, Somers, and Anna Thillon, who will appear in comedy and vaudeville, as we las in some musical piece written for her. The greatest novelty will be this charming actress' appearance in Ophelia, with Macready and Miss Cushman. If the principals will only assist the management, the public may look forward to some legitimate pieces as likely to be well played.

The LYCEUM comes out in great force; and, it is said, the Mr Strutt, one of the late directors, goes into the speculation with the Matthews'. The opening has been postponed until the 12th of October—the delay being unavoidable, from the extensive alterations and improvements. The old balcony is removed, and an elegant new dress circle is being formed in its place. The body of the house will be lighted by eight new and costly chandeliers in lieu of the former one in the centre. Eight new private boxes are being added; the stalls are removed and the pit enlarged. Indeed, every part of the house is undergoing some vast improvement, alike for the convenience of the public and those engaged in the theatre. A meeting of the company is announced for the 27th inst. The principal members of the troupe are Messrs. Charles Matthews, Robert Roxby (stage manager) Charles Selby, Buckstone, Baldwin, Meadows, Parsloe, Bridgeer, Frank Mathews, Granby, John Reeve, C. Horn, and Leigh Murray; Mesdames Vestris, Pitt, William, Stirling, Gilbert (from Manchester), Keeblen Fitzwilliam, and, we believe, Misses Fairbrother, Marshall, and Louisa Howard. Mr. Harley is also spoken of. Mr Emden is the promoter, and Mr. W. Beverley the principal scene-painter. A comic drama by Mr. Planché is in preparation for the opening night; and this gentleman, with Mr. Deacon, revive the old Olympic partnership from which so many excellent things emanated.

The ADELPHI numbers Mrs Keeley amongst the new forces, this lady being engaged to play at this house as well as the Haymarket. A novelty, in the shape of a five-act drama, brig ging in the entire strength of the company, is, we believe, in preparation from the joint pens of Messrs. Bourcicault and Charles Kenney. During the past week, the house has been mighty crowded, being the only theatrical theatre at present open Mr. Webster has just returned from Paris, where he has been in search of novelty. There is little available, however, at present, on the French stage. The private drama is anything but flourishing, and the Théâtre Français and Odéon are both closed; whilst the "bits" of the day—the "Chevalier de Maison Rouge," at Dumas' Théâtre Historique; and the "Fils du Diable," at the Gaieté, would require to be in the stage manager. To be properly mounted; and even then their success with an English audience would be doubtful.

At the SURREY, Mr. Bunn has issued a long prospectus of his intentions and arrangements, from which it appears that he will make opers his cheval de bataille. Nearly the whole of the late Drury Lane company have enlisted under his banners; and Mr. F. Vining, late of the Lyceum, is to be the stage manager. The price will remain at two shillings to the boxes, a shilling to the pit, and sixpence to the gallery; and the free-list has been entirely done away with, which we consider a judicious act. Without doubt, the speculation will be a good one—for some time, at least; but we would rather have seen the Surrey classed as a theatre for the representation of five-act melodrama. As we have before stated, there is no theatre now in London running with the Porte St. Martin, or Ambigu Comique, in Paris. The Adelphi can scarcely be placed by the side of them, as its style of entertainments is, to a measure, peculiar to itself, and yet it is the only theatre now open for the performance of pieces of the romantic school. If we may so term them. The representation of the legitimate drama will always command a certain audience; but, after that, no pieces are so likely to attract as these which the late Mr Yates used to bring out with such success at the Adelphi. This is, however, by the way. Mr. Bunn's arrangements show spirit and energy; and we shall be mistaken if the Surrey does not take higher ground than it has occupied since the days of Elliston.

EXTRAORDINARY ARREST.—Our attention has been drawn to the case of Mr. C. F. Ellerman, who was last week brought before Mr. Bingham, at the Marlborough-street Police-office, "charged with being concerned in a large manufacture of counterfeit Turkish coin, carried on at Birmingham." The charge was preferred by Mr. Zohrab, the Turkish agent, and his agent M. C. Grilliere. Mr. Ellerman, after his arrest, was first taken to the Queen's Bench, and thence to the office—but not prevented communicating with his legal advisor or his friends. He was then before Mr. Bingham, who declared that nothing had been produced to justify him in detaining the accused. At the request of the Turkish Consul's agent, M. Grilliere, however, the magistrate assented to Mr. Ellerman's removal to Birmingham, under a police escort; and next morning he was examined before that Birmingham magistrates, when no proof whatever could be adduced to connect him with the alleged manufacture of the counterfeit coin. The Turkish Consul's foreign agent then applied for a remand till Monday: to this the magistrates objected, as they could only remand till next day, when, no proof being forthcoming, Mr Ellerman was set at liberty. Shortly after his apprehension, on Thursday, two men called at his house, and seized all letters and papers. It remains to be shown what justification of this un-English proceeding can be adduced.

MUSIC.

THE GRAND OPERA, IN PARIS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

We were not in Paris in time for the opening night, after a close of upwards of two months, to redecorate the theatre. We "hesitated," to use the French word, at the first performance of Donizetti's "Fille du Régiment." After an excellent dinner at the Commerce Club, in the Rue Lepelletier, with a friend and member, we found ourselves shortly after seven o'clock ensconced in a comfortable fit d'orchestre. We were struck, on entering the vestibule, with the increased facilities for ingress and egress. The foyer d'attente is excellent, and Rossini (the statue) in his slippers and dressing-gown (of marble) sits in an arm-chair, at the office of the ticket-takers, as a kind of superintendent of the cheque department. Poor Rossini he deserved a better locality. Do not ask me for a description of the new interior, for which the Government granted 144,000 f. (£5760). It is a mélange of styles and colours, which seems to baffle all descriptive power. There is one consolation no two persons can agree in taste as to decorative art. My first impression was, that it was very rich; but the second look I looked the less satisfied I became. There is evidence of great taste. The ceiling—the presentation of the famed composers by Orpheus to the Gods in Olympus—is a good conception, but it is but feebly executed.

For the comfort of visitors, everything has been studiously consulted. The grand foyer is unexceptionally beautiful, but the admirers of the bals masqués complain of the removal of the fantastical clock under which the orchestra took place, a bust of Louis Philippe being substituted. We like, in the façades of some of the lieux d'bonres, the golden balustrades, but the grey marble of the pit tier is not in harmony. It would have been better, perhaps, if the entire decorations had been in white and gold, instead of having so many diversified hues to fatigue the eye. The chandelier is magnificent. It was gratifying to see that the old drop curtain, representing the granting of the letters patent for the Grand Opera to Lulli, the composer, by Louis the Fourteenth, has not been changed.

At half-past seven o'clock, M. Girard, for many years conductor at the Opera Comique, and the successor of the veteran Habeneck, gave the signal for the overture. We never experienced a higher feeling of gratification than after hearing the band, because we came to the conclusion that its fundamental principles, we at length can bid defiance to rivalry. Our Royal Italian Opera orchestra at Covent Garden, conducted by Costa, numerically, is not so strong as that of the Académie, but, in point of clearness and body of support—vigour and precision in the attacks sensitiveness of expression—uniform and well-proportioned care in finish exactitude—the nicest gradations of time and tone, and in the general colouring—we are now as far a-head as the Académie was in advance of as some years ago. Of course, there are individual players, whose superiority in the French band must be incontestable, but we speak of the ensemble of the extraordinary combination of the execution.

In the choral department, we prefer the French, both in acting and singing their stage business is more natural, and their grouping less stiff and angular. Take as an instance the chorus of "Don Gaspar and the Arts of the Court," in which they express their contempt for the marriage of Fernand with the King's Favourite (Leonor): nothing could be more admirably done. The exclamations came out with distinctness, and the final outbreak of rage and indignation, "Ah! que du moins notre mépris qu'il brave," was wonderfully sung. We heard this opera at its first production, on the 2nd of December, 1840, at the Académie. The cast at that date and now was as follows:—

1840.		1847.
Leonor de Guevnan	Madame Stolz	.. Mdlle. Masson
Inez	Mdlle Eisse	.. Mdlle. de Reisey.
Fernand	M. Duprez	.. M. Duprez.
Alphonse XI.	M. Barroilhet	.. M. Barroilhet.
Balthazar ..	M. Levasseur	.. M. Bremond.
Don Gaspar	M. Wartel	.. M. Koenig.

The falling off was immense. The artists of 1840 were then in their prime. It was the début of Barroilhet; and never shall we forget his singing of "Pour tant d'amour ne soyez pas ingrate" on that occasion. He received a double encore—a most unusual compliment in Paris. Now, his voice seems to have deserted him entirely. He sings scarcely two bars in one, and he indulges in the most absurd style of decoration. His action is grotesque—it is, in short, a complete caricature. I remarked that the claque was put on to sustain him Bremond is a coarse, boisterous bass; but he has an organ which he might turn to better account. Koenig sang with taste and tact Mdlle. de Reisey was very indifferent. Mdlle. Masson, a pupil of the Conservatoire, who has appeared but recently, has a mezzo-soprano voice of considerable compass, but it is not sweet and even in the quality. Her style is unenlivated, and her execution unfinished. Her acting is cold and conventional to the last degree—very amateurish, in fact. Duprez has taken a fresh lease. What a glorious singer he still is! His entrance in Halévy's "Juive," electrified his hearers, and now in Fernand, if time show its ravages in a dim nution of power, he has his beaux moments to prove that he is yet unequalled. His rendering of the King of Arragon's tirade of the first act, brought down thunders of applause; but in the concluding cloister scene, where Fernand returns to end his days, after the discovery of Leonor's real position, his pathos and passion were equally exquisite as his declaiming. In the latter interview with the still-beloved King's Favourite, his gradual relenting, until she falls at his feet with the exclamation "Grâce," was finely depicted. The words "Jetez, toi, Dieu le Cardinal, ce manteau de pourpre," with the hand on the head, and the thrill through his frame at the contact, were positively sublime; and when he madly rushed forward, clasping her in his arms, with the passionate shriek "Je t'aime," it was grand. But the sustained, impassioned and declamatory eloquence—again asserted itself, and the house rang with acclamations. Our recollection of this performance will be that of Duprez, and Duprez alone.

GLOUCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

GLOUCESTER, Tuesday Evening.

The 134th meeting of the three choirs of Gloucester, Worcester, and Hereford, for the benefit of the widows and orphans of clergymen in the three dioceses, commenced on Tuesday morning with Divine Service in Gloucester Cathedral. This festival is under the immediate patronage of Her Majesty Queen Adelaide, the Duke of Beaufort is President; and the Lords Lieutenant and Lord Bishops of the three dioceses, Vice-Presidents. The Stewards are the Marquis of Worcester, M.P.; the Hon. Captain Somerset, R.N., M.P.; Berkeley, M.P.; and Sir Paul Bart, J. J. Ackers, Esq.; W. H. H. Hartley, Esq.; W. P. Price, Esq.; T. Turner, Esq.; the Rev. Dr. Allerton, the Rev. Dr. Evans, the Rev. F. T. J. Bayly, the Rev. Thomas Huntingford, and the Rev. Canon Trewen. The collections at the Cathedral doors are appropriated without deduction to the charity. The Stewards pay any deficiency that may arise, if the sale of tickets do not meet the outlay. It is highly creditable to the present gentlemen, that they came forward to prevent the cessation of the festival. The meetings of the three choirs have achieved much for the progress of art in this country. It is to these celebrations that we owe "The Messiah" and "The Creation" in their original forms. The organist of the Cathedral, and the Conductor, has had an arduous task, but he has triumphed over all difficulties, and presented a very attractive programme. The principal vocal performers are Madame Caradori Allan; Miss Dolby, Miss A. Williams, Miss M. Williams, Mrs. Weiss; Messrs. Lockey, Williams, Weiss, and Herr Staudigl. Mr. John Parry is engaged for the three concerts, and Mdlle. Alboni for those of to-morrow and Thursday.

There was a considerable congregation in the Cathedral this morning. The western gallery and the aisles were well filled, and there was a good sprinkling of the gentry in the area; more than in the previous festivals we were present on the same as at the last festival. The numbered seats to day were 3s. 6d., the nave and gallery 2s. 6d., and the aisles 1s. For the performances, to-morrow, Thursday, and Friday, the prices will be 5s. 3s. 6d., nave and gallery 10s. 6d., and the aisles 5s. For the concerts, 10s. and 7s

Mr. T. Cooke is the leader of the band, in which we recognised the patriarch Lindley, who has attained the age of seventy-three years. Mr. Atwood's "Evening Hymn," Hill, Lindley, C. Lucas, Howell, G. Cooke, Williams, Baumann, Platt, Harper, C. Harper, Reynolds, Chipp, Card, Wagstaff, Griesbach, J. and W. Loder, Payton, Hatton, C. Severn, &c. The chorus singers, about 300 in number. The organ has been much improved in quality and power by Mr. Willis, of London; but it is not yet finished. Mr. Townshend Smith, of Hereford, is the organist for the meeting. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Archdeacon Bayly, Master of Magdalen College, Oxford, whose text was the third verse of the single Epistle of Jude, but the venerable preacher was, unfortunately, inaudible throughout his discourse.

The musical selection opened with Handel's "Esther" overture. The "Dettingen Te Deum" of Handel was extremely rendered, Miss A. and M. Williams, Miss Dolby, Mr. Lockey, and Mr. Weiss distinguishing themselves in the solos. It is a wonderful work, whether we regard the magnificence of the st ucture, or its solemn grandeur and sublime application. Dr. Boyce's anthem, "Blessed is he;" the duet, "Here shall soft Charity repair," and Attwood's "Evening Anthem," which succeeded, were heard to great disadvantage after Handel's massive proportions. In singing so heavenly a hymn as Handel's, the entire operation of Christianity on musical art is strongly developed, and, as an eloquent writer has observed: "The highest forms of the beautiful and sublime in Music, as in Poetry, owe their origin to the deepest human feelings and affections, to their union with the spirit of religion; and that the hearts of most beats most truly and fervently in unison with the harmony of Rise Art, when that harmony is the most faithful reflection of the image in which man was originally created."

WEDNESDAY NIGHT.

The collection at the Cathedral doors yesterday amounted to upwards of £17:, a larger sum than that of last Festival, on the first day. The attendances last night at the Shire Hall were more numerous than on the first night of the concert. Lord Wrottesley, the President of the Birmingham Musical Festival, was present; as also, Grantley Berkeley, Esq., M.P., and a good assemblage of the county gentry. The Concert opened with Mendelssohn's "First Walpurgis Night," conducted by Mr. Done, of Worcester Cathedral, and led by Mr. C. Lucas. Staudigl was in wonderful voice—we never heard him sing so finely. His scena, "Unclouded sun," was given with a power which thrilled the audience. The Druid Priest, were distinguished by a majesty and power, worthy of his best days. Mr Lockey took the lower voice, and Miss M. Williams those of the comaltto. The choruses, "Disperse, disperse," and "Come with torches," with its fantastic treatment, created a great sensation. The overture, with its storm movement, and the charming descriptive one of the returning Spring, were pretty smoothly rendered although something in the way of better colouring might have been expects from an experienced Conductor

After the "Walpurgis Night," Lindley, Lucas, and Howell, played one of Corelli's trios; the young contra-basso and the patriarch violoncello were greatly applauded. After Madame Caradori Allan's nice singing of Rossini's "Sombre forest," from "Guillaume Tell," the Misses A. and M. Williams sung a pretty gipsy duet, "Mid waving trees," by Benedict, which was rapturously encored, the concluding cadenzas, by the two fair singers, being neatly executed. The second part opened with Bernhard Bennett's "Naiades" overture, a picturesque composition that always delights. Madame Caradori sang two elegant canzonets of her own composition. "La Sera" and "I Silfo," the latter being encored for twice. Mr. Lockey sung a descriptive romance, "The Black Knight," composed by Mr. T. Cooke, the words by Mr. Oliphant, effectively, but the title is a misnomer; it should have been called, "His loves and rides away," which would have described the extent of the knight's adventures. Miss Dolby distinguished herself in the contralto song from the "Donna del Lago," "Elena" Mozart's "Parto," with Weiss's well-rendered clarionet obligato, faxed Miss A. Williams's powers to the utmost. Staudigl and Madame Caradori's "La Cidarem," of course pleased, and Mr. and Mrs. Weiss sang the duet from Donizetti's "Lucia," with energy. Rossini's flowing chorus, "La Carta," gratified the auditory. Staudigl, in a drinking song, with chorus from the new opera of "Guttenberg," by Fuchs, a rising German composer, sang with an animus as to warm for it a decided encore. John Parry terminated each part with his dities of "Fayre Rosemonde," and "Martinmory," substituting on the encores "Forogh Affairs," and the "Anglo Italian Lesson." He was in admirable spirits, and produced an honoured merriment. Altogether this was a very agreeable concert, although a little too long. There was a ball, to finish the night's entertainment.

The business this morning at the Cathedral was immense, to hear Mendelssohn's "Elijah." Every place was occupied, and chairs had to be placed, to meet the overflow. This great work seems destined to be another "Messiah" for the festivals. We were never more impressed with the beauties of "Elijah" than on hearing it in this sacred edifice. The execution was in general highly creditable. Hesitation and indecision marked, it is true, certain portions, and the Concerto-grosso accompaniments were somewhat terribly; but, all things considered, if the performances did not come up to the freshness and precision of the Birmingham Festival, it was in advance of the two first executions at Exeter-Hall. Having dwelt at length, at various times, on the "Mendelssohnian points of "Elijah," it will be unnecessary to refer to them more specially. The heroic breathing of high art with the impetuosity of genius are throughout conspicuous. Staudigl's marvellous declamation, and grand music of the Prophet, told amazingly. Mdlle. Caradori Allan, Miss Dolby, the Misses A and M. Williams, Miss E Byers, and Messrs. Lockey, Williams, Weiss, and Smithson, were assigned the other soli and concerted pieces. Mr. Lockey in making rapid strides as a tenor. His singing of the air in E flat, "If with all your hearts," was admirable. Miss Dolby, in the air, "O rest in the Lord," made a powerful impression on the auditory. The choral and instrumental masses did their duty bravely

The collection at the doors amounted to £242 14s 4d. Amongst the company present were Lord Ellenborough, Lord Wrottesley, Lady S Bridgeman, Sir J. Dean Paul and Lady Paul, the Very Dean of Gloucester, the Rev. Sir J. Seymour and Lady Seymour, Grantley Berkeley, Esq., M.P.; H.T. Hope, Esq., M.P., Lord Dunally, Sir Offley Wakeman, Sir W. Codrington; Capt. Berkeley, R.N., M.P.; Hon. Mrs. Holland, Hon. Mrs. Rice, Booth Gray, Sir W. and Lady Chatterton, Mr. and Mrs. Dowdeswell, Mrs. Colonel Browne, Mrs. Colonel Ewart, Capt and Mrs. Milligan, Lady Lechmere; E. J. Stone, Esq., High sheriff of Worcestershire; Mr. Bagden Hale, M.P.; Mrs. and Miss Wynnatt, Mrs. and the Misses Ludlow Walker, Mr. and Mrs. Barwick Baker, Mrs. Simpson of Bath, Lady Emily Lawrence, Colonel and the Misses Hawkins, &c.

THURSDAY EVENING.

The great attraction of the second concert was the appearance of Mdlle. Alboni last night at the Shire Hall She sang at Wolverhampton on Monday, with Mori, Corbari, and Signor Rovere and Mr. Hatton, and came on here yesterday from Cheltenham! The attendance was great, as may be supposed, and the reception on the contralto most rapturous the cheering from band and audience lasting several minutes. Excited by this ovational greeting, she put forth her inimitable powers with electrical effect She was fervently encored in Rossini's "Una Voce;" in the drinking song "Il segreto," from "Lucrezia Borgia," (her prolonged shake in the latter was quite marvellous); and in the duo with Staudigl, "Dunque io son," from the "Barbiere." She sang, also, the duet from Rossini's "Semiramide," "Bella immago," with Staudigl; it was evident the artists were annoyed at a portion of the auditory having the bad taste, because it was the concluding piece in the programme, to leave the room. Surely, the wholesome practice at the Manchester Concerts, of compelling visitors to retain their places during the performance of any piece, might be observed elsewhere, with advantage. John Parry was secured in "The London Season," and then gave, by desire, "Motrimony." His imitation of Jullien's mode of conducting in the first song, provoked much merriment. Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" was given in the first act of the scheme. All the movements mentioned were not, however, performed the orchestra being the "Dance of Clowns," the Allegro (Prolog e and Pi y), &c. The majestic "Wedding March" was encored. The overture and movements were, in general, well executed. Staudigl was called upon to repeat "O ruddier than the cherry," from "Acis and Galatea," a scena from Fuchs's "Guttenberg" very impressively. Mozart's aria, "Quando mero," was exquisitely sung by Miss Dolby. Miss M. Williams gave, with taste and feeling, "Ah! non giunge," from "Sonnambula," and "Home, sweet Home." Mr. Weiss rendered a clever MS song by Henri Laurent, "Old customs," with hearty sentiment. Curschmann's trio, "Ti prego," Sir H. R. Bishop's adaptation of two madrigals, by Sabastian Bach, and the duet, "O by rivers" and a fine "Hallelujah" chorus were the concerted pieces. An elegant serenade by Hatton, "The silver moon," was deliciously sung by Lockey. Mrs. Weiss sang Benedict's "Woman's heart" very pleasingly. She was given to show. Mr. Lockey understanded a better selection of classical gems than is usual on such occasions; but it was too long, the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber being added to the pieces we have already recorded.

The Cathedral this morning exhibited a very different aspect from that of yesterday, for the "Elijah." The attendance was scanty both in the reserved seats, to the area and gallery, and the aisles. This is to be attributed to the miscellaneous nature of the scheme, and is a proof of the growing intelligence of amateurs, who will not brook such melanges. In part I there was the overture and chorus from Haydn's "Seasons." Next came a chorus from Handel's "Judas Maccabeus," and then came a selection from Beethoven's Mass in C. Part the Second composed the "Rex tremendæ," and the "Recordare," from Mozart's Requiem, the "Benedictus," with Weiss's "Sounding Billows," sung by Staudigl; "With Verdure Clad," by Madame Caradori Allan; and "In Native Worth," by Mr. Lockey, from Haydn's "Creation;" to this succeeded Perglesi's "Gloria in Excelsis" Gregorian "Magnificat," with Mori's Mr. Williams's Clarionet obligato: Spohr's duo, "Forsake me Not," by Miss A. Williams and Mr. Lockey, from the "Last Judgment." Mendelssohn's air "Hear the Lord a Mandful of His own," sung by Miss Dolby, from "Paul;" the quartett "Alla Trinita beata;" Haydn's chorus "The Arm of the Lord;" and, finally, the principal pieces from Handel's "Israel in Egypt."

Such a selection as the above lasted, of course, several hours, and fatigued the auditory as well as the executants terribly. How much better to have given Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," with "The Israel in Egypt," in their entire form, than such a mere farrago of schools and styles, broken and disjointed. The third and last Concert will take place this evening, at the Shire Hall, Alboni and John Parry being the stars. The Festival terminates to-morrow, with Handel's immortal "Messiah;" and, in the evening, a Grand Ball will be given in the Shire Hall. In our next we shall give a summ ng up of the results of the meeting. Mr. Brown, the secretary, deserves great credit for his exertions in the administrative portion, and for the musical arrangements, for the musical world. Dr. Evans's zeal and enthusiasm in the good cause, as one of the most active stewards, ought not to pass without an allusion. Mr. Turner, the banker here, handed the orivate to their Majesties on their visiting with Prince Albert very gravity. Mr. Townshend Smith and Mr. Done, as the organist and pianist, ably assist d Mr. Arnott's labours.

The collection at the Cathedral doors this morning (Thursday) was £121 10s.

MUSICAL TOURS.—Mdlle. Lind will complete her trip to the provinces by singing at concerts at the Bath and Bristol Theatres next week, and will then depart for the Continent for 12 months. The concerts given by Mr. Mitchell, and Mr. J. L. Hatton, at Cheltenham, Bath, Bristo., Exeter, Brighton, Harrogate, Newcastle, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Liverpool, Manchester, and Chester, have been brilliantly attended. Grisi in the plenitude of her powers, passed down and dispirited. The Mario is "Il mio tesoro" and "Addi ide," and Tamburini in "Pro peccatis," were always encored; as also Grisi and Tamburini, in the duo buffo, "Oh, guardate." Mr. J. L. Hatton, in his pianoforte-playing of Handel, &c., and in his comic ditties, was also a general favourite. Mdlle. Alboni and Mdlle. Corbari terminate their triumphant tour this (Saturday), at a concert being given at Brighton. The forthcoming Grisi and Mario pianoforte-playing of Handel, &c., and in his "Qui la voce;" and

LITERATURE.

HISTORY OF THE BANK OF ENGLAND, ITS TIMES AND TRADITIONS. By JOHN FRANCIS. 2 vols. Willoughby and Co

The Bank of England—"the greatest monetary establishment in the world,"—has now existed for a century and a half, yet, hitherto, there has not been published any connected history of its rise and progress. It may have been apprehended that annals of the Bank were to be found in the general history of the period; and its events might be traced in the fluctuations of the prosperity of this great commercial country: that the final rejection of the Bank by the Government gave the career of the former too politico-economical a character to be attractive to the reading masses; and that, therefore, the history of the Establishment might be left to such writers as, from time to time, attempted to portray the great features of the metropolis. Nothing daunted by such doubts as the preceding, Mr. Francis appears to have set about his task in the right spirit of undertaking: hence, his book is at once amusing and instructive. It has, accordingly, produced two volumes rife with sterling information; not, in all cases, so exactly given as we think the nature of the subject demanded—we mean, as regards the financial progress of the Bank. The general history we consider to be even less exactly narrated; and, in some cases, the author has had recourse to compilations of slender pretensions to accuracy, instead of at once referring to authorities contemporaneous with the events related. However, this may be too severe a test for a work evidently given to the public with great diffidence, yet recommended by an impartial tone, and an agreeable and intelligent style. Mr. Macaulay, in the early part of his two volumes are, we feel that it was hard to saved dryness in one class of details, and gossiping different in the other. These errors—the Scylla and Charybdis of his labour—Mr. Francis has eschewed with rare judgment; hence, his book is never tedious, but invariably entertaining, and communicative of acceptable information.

The narrative sets out with the origin of Bills of Exchange, and then deals with rates of interest, the Lombards in England, and times when Kings pillaged their subjects, borrowed money, and pawned their jewels wherever they could to raise money, to carry on the expensive games of war and luxury. The robberies and usury exercised upon Jew and the Lombard, in the dark ages of the Plantagenets," says Mr. Francis, "were successively imitated at a later and more polite period by the Stuarts; but the very blow which appeared likely to crush the mercantile spirit of Banking proved its support."

During the Civil Wars, the merchants kept their cash in their own houses, trusting much to servants and apprentices: the love of fighting, however, often overcame the love of honesty; and they, with the money entrusted to them, disappeared. As a remedy for this evil, the Goldsmiths were next employed; "they were a rich body, and it was natural that the richest should be most trusted. The receipts they issued for the money lodged at their houses circulated from hand to hand, and were known by the name of Goldsmiths' Notes. These may be considered the first kind of Bank-notes issued in England." Hence, Goldsmith became also the Banker, and gold and silver vessels and coins were alike the contents of his "strong room." As a specimen of the anecdotic character of the work before us, we quote the following:—

THE FIRST BANKER.

"The celebrity of the first Banking-house belongs, by common consent, to Mr Francis Child. This gent-eman, who was the father of his profession, and possessed a large property, began business shortly after the Restoration. He was originally apprentice to William Wheeler, goldsmith and banker, who shop was on the site of the present Banking-house. The foundation of his immense fortune arose from the general old fashion of marrying his master's daughter; and, through this, he succeeded to the estate and business. The latter he subsequently confined entirely to the Banking department. The principles on which he conducted it, and the remarkable classes in his will, by which he regulated its future conduct, are well known. It has maintained to the present day, amid all the changes and changes of Banking, the same position, and the same respectability, which he bequeathed it."

We must pass over the details of the necessities of Charles the Second, after the Restoration, and content ourselves with relating that, at this period, was the first Money Panic. "The country was in danger. London itself might be invaded What security was there, then, for the money advanced to the Crown? The people fl ched to their debtors; they demanded their deposits; and London witnessed the scene upon the Bankers' stopping payments—a panic, a run ceased; but they and their clients were subsequently ruined by the infamous Cabal Ministry closing the Exchequer. The King yielded, but soon found he was compelled to borrow money at exorbitant interest. "The principal was never repaid. It was, however, made part of the National Debt by William; this act was confirmed by Anne; and the Stock ultimately became part of the celebrated South Sea Bank."

We now arrive at the establishment of the Bank: the originator was William Paterson, who also projected the scheme of the Darien Company; and the real soul of the Darien Company: he, however, shared the common fate of unfortunate projectors, and lived "pitied, respected, but neglected." He was only on the list of directors for one year—1694, when the Bank was established. We quote a little picture of

THE BANK AT GROCERS' HALL.

"In Grocers' Hall, since pulled down to make room for a more stately structure, the Bank of England commenced operations. Here, in one room, with almost primitive simplicity, were gathered all who performed the duties of the establishment. Books, pens, and ink were all that they had to keep; and the first graceful essayist of the day, 'and was not a little pleased to see the directors, secretaries, and clerks, with all the other members of that wealthy Corporation, ranged in a row into the room where they had to keep their books in that less regular economy.' The secretaries and clerks altogether numbered but fifty-four, while their united salaries did not exceed £4350. But the picture is a pleasant one, though so much unlike present usage, It is a consolation to reflect on whether our forefathers did not derive more benefit from intimate association with, and kindly feeling towards, their inferiors, than their descendants receive from the cold line of separation which now exists between them?"

In the year 1707, upon a threatened invasion by the Pretender, was one of the earliest, if not the earliest

RUN UPON THE BANK.

"When the run took place, many, instead of withdrawing their deposits, carried all their cash to assist the establishment. The Lord Treasurer Godolphin, who, as an astute and able financier, felt that the credit of the country was connected with that of the Bank, informed the directors that the Queen would allow, for six months, an interest of six per cent. on their sealed bills. Nor was this all: the Bank of Martinique, Genoa, and Hamburgh, with others of the nobility, offered to advance considerable sums of money to the Corporation. A private individual, who had but £500, carried it to the Bank; and, on the story being told in the Queen, she sent him £100, with an obligation on the Treasury to repay the whole £500. It is pleasant to read of such chivalrous devotion repaid in so Royal a manner. Encouragement such as this gave a firmness to the establishment; and, united with a call of 20 per cent. on the proprietors, enabled the directors to meet their difficulties and preserve their credit."

We have here a retrospect of

THE BANK IN 1757.

"A Correspondent of the 'Gentleman's Magazine' gives the following particulars of the external appearance of the Bank in 1757:—'When I came to London, and lived near it, it was, comparatively, a small structure, almost invisible to passers by, being surrounded by many others, viz., a church called St. Christopher-le-Stocks, since pulled down; three taverns, two on the south side, one (the Sount-in), in Bartholomew-lane, facing the church there, just where the gate of entrance is now placed, and about fifteen or twenty private dwelling houses. Visitors are sometimes shown in the halfton-office the identical old chest, somewhat larger than a common seaman's, also the original books and cases, where cash, notes, papers, and books of business were kept; and well are they preserved, as pregnant vouchers no less of the Bank's pristine simplicity and confined operations, than of the amazing rapidity of its modern extension, and almost boundless accommodation of the monied interest and commercial world.'"

Of course, there is an abundance of interest in the chronicles of the runs upon the Bank, and the expedients by which it has been saved—in 1745, for instance, by the Corporation retaining its specie, and employing agents to enter with notes, when, to gain time, were paid in sixpences; and, as these were quickly exhausted, the public was entitled to priority of payment, the agents went out at one door with the specie they had received, and brought it back by another, so that the bond fide holders of notes could never get enough to present them. We may as well here, though it be out of date, quote the explanation of the

"The incidental mention to one of the directors that there was a box of one pound notes ready for issue, turned the attention of the authorities to the propriety of attempting to circulate them; and the declaration of Mr. Henry Thornton, in 1797, probably occurred, that it was the want of small change, for a necessity then being surrounded by many others, viz., a church called St. Christopher-le-Stocks, since pulled down; three taverns, two on the south side, one (the Sount-in), in Bartholomew-lane, facing the church there, just where the gate of entrance is now placed, and about fifteen or twenty private dwelling houses. Visitors are sometimes shown in the half all heavy and expensive works, and, at the same time, secured easy curves and gradients; and this in a country apparently presenting the most formidable irregularities of surface. The whole of the works, also, have been executed in a most substantial manner, the embankment, slopes, &c., being all thoroughly finished. These works reflect the utmost credit upon the contractors, the Messrs. Stephenson.

The company on the 9th inst. were regaled with a sumptuous collation, in the large room of the Beatock Station, which was tastefully decorated with flags evergreens, &c.; and the afternoon was passed in great harmony—auspicious of the success of the Caledonian Railway.

SEPTEMBER.

May of the Autumn! blythe September! thou
Comest with boon and blessing to mankind,
Crocus and dahlia grace thy swarthy brow,
And the groves ring with sweetest notes, combined
To welcome thee. Thrush, blackbird, woodlark find
Again their voices, pouring their wild song
Through scaring leaves high rustling to the wind,
The Boreal breeze now waving keen and strong.
Away! blythe month! far o'er the heather hills
Thou boundest, where the whirring of the grouse
Invites the fatal shot—or by the rills
Loved by the snipe—or where the partridge house
Their young amid the stubble.
There thy voice
Resounding, bids the sportsman's heart rejoice.

But worthier joy the country's grateful heart
Feels for the blessings Providence hath pour'd
Abundantly, wherever Ceres' art
Invoked the succour of all Nature's Lord. . . .
Dire Famine hath departed, with the horde
Of evils in his train; and plenty crowns
The noble Land which always can afford
Munificence, to chase Want's withering frowns.
Then welcome, hale September! to our clime,
To yeoman's homestead as to princely dome!
Fearless and free old Albion's brow sublime
Rises unsullied o'er broad ocean's foam.
Ever be thus her blazon without blot,
And Honour sanctify her humblest cot! —L.

ST. ANDREW'S CHURCH, LANGTON, NEAR HORNCASTLE.

The erection of this edifice presents a very interesting, as well as important, instance of Church Extension, which we have much satisfaction in commemorating in our columns, in the assurance that the wider such "good works" are known, the more beneficial will be the result to society in general. There are, also, some peculiarities in this construction which call for special notice; it has, indeed, been raised by many hands, and contributed from the individual wealth of the district.

The new Church has been erected from the designs of Mr. Stephen Lewin, architect. It is beautifully situate in the parish of Langton, near Horncastle, not far from Woodhall Spa. The locality possesses some romantic interest; the spot called the Tower on the Moor, and ancient ruins of Kirkstead Church, lying at a short distance.

The building was commenced in March, 1845; Sir Henry Dymoke, Bart., Chairman of the Committee, laying the corner-stone. It is in the Perpendicular style, and comprises in plan, a south porch, nave, and chancel; a small pulpit, and vestry turret, and western bell-gable. It has a high-pitched roof, surmounted with the floriated symbol of our faith. The ashlar-stone is from Ancaster; that for the wall, given by Mr. Turnor, of Stoke, has been dug from the ruins of Stixwold Abbey; so that the material is now only restored to holy purposes.

The interior, which we have engraved, is of impressive design. It is open to the roof, the tie-beams springing from each stone corbel, bearing alternately sculptured angels' heads, and armorial shields; whilst the two corbels in the chancel bear the heads of the Queen and an Archbishop. The pulpit is of Caen stone, richly sculptured: it was given, with the stall-heads, by the architect, Mr. Lewin. The seats are open, and, as well as the other wood-work, are stained dark oak. The "holy table" is the gift of Richard Ellison, Esq., of Sudbrooke; and the communion service is the present of Lady and Miss Dymoke.

ST. ANDREW'S CHURCH, LANGTON.

The font, which is very handsome, is, also, a gift. The east window of the chancel has three lights of stained glass, by Ward and Nixon: the figures being those of St. Peter, St. James, and St. John, with their characteristic symbols. The cost of this window, it is hoped, will be defrayed by the sale of lithographed views of the interior and exterior of the Church, drawn by the Rev. Charles Terrot, Rector of Wispington.

The cost of the building is to be otherwise defrayed by public subscription, aided by a grant of the Church Building Society. All the sittings, 200 in number, are free, and unappropriated. The Rev. Edward Walter, the Rector of the mother church, has given, with the necessary consents, ten acres of land belonging to the living, for sites for the church, a school-house, and a parsonage, and for glebe to the clergyman. Mr. Walter has, also, charged his own living with an annual payment of £20 towards the endowment; and the reverend gentleman's zeal and liberality can scarcely be too highly commended.

The Church was consecrated on Tuesday week, when the Bishop of the diocese preached an appropriate discourse. During the reading of the offertory sentences, a collection was made, from seat to seat, by Sir H. Dymoke, and T. Brailsford, Esq., the amount of which, inclusive of £5 sent by Robert Vyner, Esq., of Gantby, was £54 1s. 7½d. After the blessing, the Bishop, accompanied by the Archdeacon, the Committee, the officiating and other clergy, perambulated the churchyard. The proper prayers were then offered, a psalm was sung, the blessing given, and the whole ceremony concluded.

The Lord Bishop, Sir H. Dymoke, the Committee, with the greater number of the clergy and visitors, then retired to the Hotel, to partake of a collation, provided by Mr. Tweed.

HEADS OF THE MONTHS.—DRAWN BY KENNY MEADOWS.

DESTRUCTION OF LANERCOST PRIORY, CUMBERLAND.

The lovers of architectural antiquities will learn with regret that, very early on the morning of the 4th inst., a great part of the roof of Lanercost Priory fell in with a loud crash, bearing everything down with it.

This venerable ruin is situated at the foot of the vale that descends from Naworth Castle, at a short distance from the banks of the Irthing. It was originally an Augustine monastery, founded by William de Vallibus, in 1169. It was frequently visited by Edward I., and partly destroyed by fire in 1296; but was restored, and continued to flourish till the Dissolution; and in the time of Edward VI. was granted to Thomas, Lord Dacre. Few vestiges of the monastic buildings remained; though originally sufficiently extensive to become the residence of Edward I. during one of his Scotch expeditions. Part of the structure was used as a farm-house, and some portion of the cemetery had been converted into gardens. The gate of the burial-ground was a fine semicircular arch. The church was in the conventual form, with a low tower, embrasured. The portal at the west entrance consisted of numerous mouldings, supported by pilasters, with plain capitals and bases. This part of the structure has been fitted up as a parochial church; but the other parts were open, and exposed to the weather. Round the upper part of the edifice was a colonnade, with pointed arches, supported on single pillars; and most of the windows were tall and narrow.

The principal materials for this edifice are supposed to have been obtained from the Roman wall, which passes within a short distance. The manuscript chronicle of Lanercost, deposited in the British Museum, mentions the election of a Prior about the middle of the fourteenth century, whose name was Thomas de Hextoldsham, a man of such worldly conduct, that, besides the oath of canonica obedience, he was obliged by the Bishop to make a solemn promise not to frequent public huntings, nor to keep so large a pack of hounds as he formerly had done.

LANERCOST PRIORY, FROM KLVAN.

Death of Lady Charlotte Homan.—This lady died on the 12th inst., at Drumroe, Sir W. J. Homan's seat, in the county of Waterford. Her Ladyship was only surviving daughter of the late Marquis of Bute and the Hon. Charlotte Jane Windsor, eldest daughter and co-heir of Herbert, last Viscount Windsor, and was born July 16, 1771, and married, June 13, 1797, Sir W. J. Homan, Bart.

The Embarrassments of the Duke of Buckingham.—Towards the end of last month, an execution was put in Buckingham House for a sum of £20,000, for which a verdict had been obtained at the last assizes at Devizes. This was immediately followed by other executions in Stowe, Wotton, and Avington (the house in Chandos-street being occupied by the Austrian Embassy). The total amount of the Duke's debts is stated at between £1,750,000 and £1,800,000. It is reported that there are no less than sixteen executions in the town mansion of his Grace the Duke of Buckingham, at the suit of various creditors, whose debts are from £ 9,000 downwards. The officers of the Sheriff of Buckinghamshire have failed in almost all their stratagems for gaining admission to the Duke's residence at Stowe Park. The extensive property at Abington, Winchester, belonging to the Duke, is also in the possession of the Sheriff of Hampshire, at the suit of numerous creditors. Opposed to the executions of the bona fide creditors, a number of claims have been set up under the Interpleader Act, by the Duke's relatives and others, who insist that the greater portion of the valuable paintings, plate, &c., belong to them. The Judge, at Chambers, before whom all these cases have been heard, has recommended the Sheriffs to delay the sales until an issue can be tried to set at rest the disputed claims. Messrs. Currie, Woodgate, and Williams, the solicitors, state that the whole of the Duke of Buckingham's interest in his real and personal property was purchased by the Marquis of Chandos for considerably more than its value in May last. The deed of conveyance and assignment was regularly registered in Middlesex and Ireland; and immediate notice was given to all parties then having claims upon, or being in any way connected with, the property, to the parish officers of the several parishes, and to the Sheriffs of Middlesex, Hampshire, and Buckinghamshire.

White resigns.

(a) This is opposed to the advice of the best authorities, who recommend 7 B to Q Kt 5th.

(b) Q to K 4th was preferable, we think.

(c) The object of this is quite unfathomable.

(d) We can see no defined purpose. He is so inextricably locked up that he can only make these futile efforts to beguile the time until the inevitable Mate arrives.

FLYING SHEETS FROM OUR TRAVELLING CONTRIBUTOR.

MUNICH, Sept. 17.

Although I thus date from this pleasant city, the metropolis of the Fine Arts of Germany, and, moreover, the place, next to Vienna, where the people best understand how to enjoy life, his present letter will not be concerning Munich. Having arrived here only yesterday, of course there has not yet been time to penetrate beneath the rich crust of the outside of the elderly wonder which greets me. A few impressions of my route, however, may not be without interest, more especially to any of your readers who may now or hereafter meditate a visit in a direct o.

Travellers from London to Munich usually adopt one of two routes. After sail ng their way through Belgium, and up the Rhine, they either strike off at Frankfurt, and join the Germany and Switzerland Railway, to Donaw rth (on the Danube), where the railroad to Munich at present commences; or they avail themselves of the Duke of Baden's railway as far as Carlsruhe, travelling from thence by diligence by Stuttgard and Ulm to Augsburg, where they take the rail to Munich. On the two, the latter is the shortest, presenting at the same time the greatest interest; but the distance you have to trave. by either is enormous, while for those who post, the expense is great, and the inconvenience not much less, so wretchedly bad is the posting system in these districts.

I took another route—one which appears on the map to be a roundabout one, but which is in reality more pleasant and cheaper, as it avoids the enormous intricacy of scenery, character, and "sights," than the other By that route, and with the friendly aid of railroads, steam-boats, a small dose of ellwagen (of which always the less the better), and a little German, which, thanks either to knowledge, is not with these good-natured people a "dangerous thing," I found myself yesterday at Munich, having undergone scarcely any fatigue, having expended so little money that I am fairly astonished and, better than all, having been constantly delighted with every variety of interesting objects, including a glimpse of France, a temporary sojourn in Switzerland, and a journey through the most Bavarian part of Bavaria. If others do the same, they will not find reason for disappointment at the choice.

A good first stage is from Frankfort (which, by the way, is alive with character just now, pending the presidential fair) to Heidelberg, which you reach in three hours, by trains which start every three hours, from six in the morning till six in the evening—the latter part of your journey being through the lovely valley of the Neckar. Of course, at Heidelberg you see those magnificent views, from the town, of the glorious Castle, almost unrivalled in Europe for its romantic situation; and from the Castle, of the town—a view of mingled grandeur and beauty, commanding mountain, valley, plain, and stream; and, in the distance, Mannheim on the one side; while, on the other, the Rhine, to the eye only a fine line of silver, winds a tortuous course beneath the mountains, whose outline, now bold, now soft, forms the boundary of the horizon of the picture. And, while exploring the subterranean wonders of the Castle itself, remember well to make a fair demolition who shows you the memorable tun. Should it be on Sunday, or a fête day, she will be simply arrayed in white, and devoid of all meretricious ornament to set off her natural grace and beauty; and this last consists less in mere uniformity or perfection of feature, than in the charm of an expression of countenance, in which intelligence and modesty combine to please. Further, you will discover that she is wholly unconscious of possessing any particular attraction; that she is well read, not merely in the poets and authors of her native Germany, but also in some of those of France and England, especially in Shakespere; that she is at once virtuous and intelligent; that she speaks French like a Parisian and German, with the accent and pronunciation of a Hanoverian; and that at present her highest ambition is to render herself perfect in the habit of speaking English—a language which, self-taught, she has learned to read

Again taking the rail, a pleasant ride of nearly three hours through a very pretty country, up to a garden in its richness and picturesque variety, and conspired by, to a happiness, a thriving and contented people, brings you to the far-famed Baden-Baden, which is worth seeing, if only to note that, although nature has done everything for the place, making it picturesque and cheerful, yet there reigns over it a cold, almost cheerless air, in spite of its amusements, fine buildings, and splendid hotels. This is chiefly to be attributed to the evil example of the English visitors; too potential, unfortunately, with foreigners also, by which the society of a place honoured with their patronage becomes subjected by pride and ostentation, and is a locus of attraction to a crowd of slavish and fulsome EXTORTIONERS

At Baden-Baden, you pay twice as much for your dinner, for instance, as you do elsewhere; in all other things in the same proportion; and it is a great mistake to suppose that they are any better. But, worse than all, is the substitution of a dashing swelling, gorgeous, genre scenery at every disagreeable, for that homely, friendly kindness with which I have met invariably in every country at the inns not frequented by the English, and which arises while you stay at the place, to regard you as almost a friend. For my part, I always seek, when it is possible, for an inn used solely by the natives; and I have never yet been disappointed, either as to the fare or as to the bill. I supped the other day the cheapest of this route. Arriving at Baden, not knowing the name of one of my sort of inns, and being unable to get in at the Three Kings (the best hotels are the victimising order), I took at random one, which, from the name, I divined might be good. It was No. 7 on the engraving list; and, I need hardly say that if you are to pay extravagantly for cold comfort, you may as well, at least have the elegance and abundance of a first-rate establishment. Well, it certainly was comfortable, with an appearance enough to tempt to consider it as first-rate; there was a waiter who spoke English, and always misunderstood it, too; there was a landlord who stalked about and smoked cigars, and received visitors; there was a landlady who had the capabilities of his different guests; and, worse than all, there was that indifference to your personal identity which is the great damper to all enjoyment in travelling. You feel that you are not looked on or regarded as a human being with kindly feelings, and a disposition to assimilate with those around, but merely as "Number" So and so—here to-day, and gone to-morrow—to be duly entered in the visitors' books, and then forgotten. And when the bill came, my fears were realised. For bad accommodation and neglect, I paid at the second-rate inn two shillings per day more than at the most exquisite of the crack ones; and, as I never intended to stay a short time at Schaffhausen, to see the Rhine Fall, I enquired for and found an inn of the sort I required. Well; it was a plain, but large and roomy place, yet quite comfortable enough. The landlord was a native; and I had found their fortunes to mine. When we came to the door, there was mine host, a little fat, red-faced man, with little laughing eyes, and a good-humoured mouth his frau, a certain stately matron of the full proportions of a comfortable and comfortably domestic. The lady was forthwith installed in the best bed-room, and a Swiss female domestic, who could speak a little French, ordered to attend exclusively on her; and the two men were also well provided for. Without our asking, a private sitting-room, with a piano and music, was prepared for us, the host himself waited at table. A new set of knives and forks, and of silver spoons, with the initials of my visiting cards especially for me, graced the sun and daughter of the best came, and, by our glad permission, sang duets (with exquisite musical skl.) during our repast, simply joining us for fun's sake, and to do away with the awful incognito. In a glass of wine, I, for my part, was soon completely at home and en-fortable, that we did not like to go. Well, when the bill came, what did we pay for all this? For three excellent meat breakfasts, three dinners, and good coffee and cream for the evening, two bottles of good wine, two bottles of beer, cups of coffee and cognac, and three bedrooms and a sitting room, we were called upon to pay 14s. English, or 4s. 8d. each person! And even then our good natured host would not receive what's to go away pannier fu—ot bread and wine lest we should be hungry on our journey; which—that would indeed—seem to let us go without a stirrup cup. The charge at the Bash lion, for less and worse accommodation, was 12s. each person per diem. I repeat my advice to all travellers to go to the inn of the country unless, indeed, you want a lot of fashionable around you; and then you had better, small-like, stick at home with your house to your back

But I forget my route. Well: from Baden, an easy and delightful ride by rail brings you to Basle, on the German side of the Rhine, and opposite Strasbourg. From this in—a pleasant stroll of about an hour brings you across the Rhine, into the heart of Strasbourg. And, if for the mere contrast between a place so wo—man and bold as the quaint old German city, which makes other "knowledge," is not with these good-natured people a "dangerous thing," I found myself yesterday at Munich, having undergone scarcely any fatigue, having expended so little money that I am fairly astonished and, better than all, having been constantly delighted with every variety of interesting objects, including a glimpse of France, a temporary sojourn in Switzerland, and a journey through the most Bavarian part of Bavaria. When we came to the door, there was mine host, a little fat, red-faced man, with little laughing eyes, and a good-humoured mouth his frau, a certain stately matron of the full proportions of a comfortable and comfortably domestic. The lady was forthwith installed in the best bed-room, and a Swiss female domestic, who could speak a little French, ordered to attend exclusively on her; and the two men were also well provided for. Without our asking, a private sitting-room, with a piano and music, was prepared for us, the host himself waited at table. A new set of knives and forks, and of silver spoons, with the initials of my visiting cards especially for me, graced the sun and daughter of the best came, and, by our glad permission, sang duets (with exquisite musical skl.) during our repast, simply joining us for fun's sake, and to do away with the awful incognito. In a glass of wine, I, for my part, was soon completely at home and en-fortable, that we did not like to go. Well, when the bill came, what did we pay for all this? For three excellent meat breakfasts, three dinners, and good coffee and cream for the evening, two bottles of good wine, two bottles of beer, cups of coffee and cognac, and three bedrooms and a sitting room, we were called upon to pay 14s. English, or 4s. 8d. each person! And even then our good natured host would not receive what's to go away pannier fu—ot bread and wine lest we should be hungry on our journey; which—that would indeed—seem to let us go without a stirrup cup. The charge at the Bash lion, for less and worse accommodation, was 12s. each person per diem. I repeat my advice to all travellers to go to the inn of the country unless, indeed, you want a lot of fashionable around you; and then you had better, small-like, stick at home with your house to your back

But I forget my route. Well: from Basel, an easy and delightful ride by rail brings you to Basle, on the German side of the Rhine, and opposite Strasbourg. From this in—a pleasant stroll of about an hour brings you across the Rhine, into the heart of Strasbourg. And, if for the mere contrast between a place so wo—man and bold as the quaint old German city, which makes other "knowledge," is not with these good-natured people a "dangerous thing," I found myself yesterday at Munich, having undergone scarcely any fatigue, having expended so little money that I am fairly astonished and, better than all, having been constantly delighted with every variety of interesting objects, including a glimpse of France, a temporary sojourn in Switzerland, and a journey through the most Bavarian part of Bavaria. If others do the same, they will not find reason for disappointed at the choice.

A good first stage is from Frankfort (which, by the way, is alive with character just now, pending the presidential fair) to Heidelberg, which you reach in three hours, by trains which start every three hours, from six in the morning till six in the evening—the latter part of your journey being through the lovely valley of the Neckar. Of course, at Heidelberg you see those magnificent views, from the town, of the glorious Castle, almost unrivalled in Europe for its romantic situation; and from the Castle, of the town—a view of mingled grandeur and beauty, commanding mountain, valley, plain, and stream; and, in the distance, Mannheim on the one side; while, on the other, the Rhine, to the eye only a fine line of silver, winds a tortuous course beneath the mountains, whose outline, now bold, now soft, forms the boundary of the horizon of the picture. And, while exploring the subterranean wonders of the Castle itself, remember well to make a fair demolition who shows you the memorable tun. Should it be on Sunday, or a fête day, she will be simply arrayed in white, and devoid of all meretricious ornament to set off her natural grace and beauty; and this last consists less in mere uniformity or perfection of feature, than in the charm of an expression of countenance, in which intelligence and modesty combine to please. Further, you will discover that she is wholly unconscious of possessing any particular attraction; that she is well read, not merely in the poets and authors of her native Germany, but also in some of those of France and England, especially in Shakespere; that she is at once virtuous and intelligent; that she speaks French like a Parisian and German, with the accent and pronunciation of a Hanoverian; and that at present her highest ambition is to render herself perfect in the habit of speaking English—a language which, self-taught, she has learned to read

Again taking the rail, a pleasant ride of nearly three hours through a very pretty country, up to a garden in its richness and picturesque variety, and conspired by, to a happiness, a thriving and contented people, brings you to the far-famed Baden-Baden, which is worth seeing, if only to note that, although nature has done everything for the place, making it picturesque and cheerful, yet there reigns over it a cold, almost cheerless air, in spite of its amusements, fine buildings, and splendid hotels. This is chiefly to be attributed to the evil example of the English visitors; too potential, unfortunately, with foreigners also, by which the society of a place honoured with their patronage becomes subjected by pride and ostentation, and is a locus of attraction to a crowd of slavish and fulsome EXTORTIONERS

At Baden-Baden, you pay twice as much for your dinner, for instance, as you do elsewhere; in all other things in the same proportion; and it is a great mistake to suppose that they are any better. But, worse than all, is the substitution of a dashing swelling, gorgeous, genre scenery at every disagreeable, for that homely, friendly kindness with which I have met invariably in every country at the inns not frequented by the English, and which arises while you stay at the place, to regard you as almost a friend. For my part, I always seek, when it is possible, for an inn used solely by the natives; and I have never yet been disappointed, either as to the fare or as to the bill. I supped the other day the cheapest of this route. Arriving at Baden, not knowing the name of one of my sort of inns, and being unable to get in at the Three Kings (the best hotels are the victimising order), I took at random one, which, from the name, I divined might be good. It was No. 7 on the engraving list; and, I need hardly say that if you are to pay extravagantly for cold comfort, you may as well, at least have the elegance and abundance of a first-rate establishment. Well, it certainly was comfortable, with an appearance enough to tempt to consider it as first-rate; there was a waiter who spoke English, and always misunderstood it, too; there was a landlord who stalked about and smoked cigars, and received visitors; there was a landlady who had the

SATURDAY MORNING.—The Directors of the Bank of England made a step towards relaxation yesterday, by announcing that paper will be discounted for a term of 30 days to run, would be done at the minimum rate of 5½ per cent. The English Market was quiet, with a slightly upward tendency. Consols closed at 85½ to 86 for Money, and 86½ to ¾ for Account. India quoted at 258 to 260, upon the news from Calcutta having transpired. In the Foreign Market there was nothing of importance: and the principle topic of conversation in the Share Market was the result arrived at by the Liverpool deputation. The gentlemen from Liverpool may, however, spare themselves further surprise or trouble. The end sought will be arrived at by a more potent opposite in than a deputation, by the impracticability of finding either calls, labour, or material to carry out one half the schemes sanctioned by Parliament.

SKETCH FROM THE SALE OF SHAKESPERE'S HOUSE, AT THE AUCTION MART, SEPT. 16, 1847.

SALE OF SHAKESPERE'S HOUSE.

This characteristic Sketch of the anxious company at the Auction Mart, on Thursday week, will commemorate a very interesting scene—the Sale of the Birth-place of our great Dramatic Poet, whom Neither man, nor muse, can praise too much.

Last week, we gave an outline of the proceedings. Amongst those in the room were Sir F. Madden, Keeper of the MSS. in the British Museum; Mr. Amyot, Chairman of the London Committee; Dr. Thomson, Chairman of the Stratford Committee; Mr. P. Cunningham and Mr. Sheldon, Treasurers of the Committees of London and Stratford; Mr. Wilkes; Mr. Payne Collier, Chairman of the General Meeting of Subscribers; Mr. Flower, Mr. Charles Knight, Mr. Butterworth, Mr. Halliwell, many members of the Shakespere Society, and most of the resident members of the Committees interested in the subject.

The conditions of sale having been read, an offer of £1500 was then made, which was immediately advanced upon to £2000, by Mr. Butler, of Clapton. £2100 were then offered; and, after a slight pause, the following offer, on the part of the Stratford and London Shakespere Committee, organised for the purchase of Shakespere's House, was placed in the hands of Mr. Robins, by Mr. Peter Cunningham:—

PARIS FASHIONS FOR OCTOBER.

Sept. 16, 1847.—To Mr. Robins.—Sir: We, the undersigned, deputed by the united Committees of Stratford and London for raising subscriptions for the purchase of Shakespere's House, hereby offer a bidding of £3000. The Committees having purchased another property, which really constitutes an integral portion of Shakespere's House, have expended a considerable part of the amount already raised by public contribution; but, looking at the duty imposed upon them in undertaking to represent the feeling of the nation, they have come to the resolution of making this large and liberal offer for the property now on sale, without regard to the funds which they at present command, in the confidence that the justice of the public will eventually discharge the Committees from the individual responsibility which they thus incur.—(Signed) T. Amyot, Chairman of the Committe of London: Thomas Thomson, Chairman of the Stratford Committee; Peter Cunningham, Treasurer of the London Committee; W. Sheldon, Treasurer of the Stratford Committee.

The Committee had, in good taste, confided the tendering of their offer to the son of a Poet. This was well-timed and graceful.

Mr. Robins having read the offer aloud, and announced the intention of the Trustee to forego his privilege of bidding for the property, inquired if any one would offer a larger sum. After some unseemly interruption, there was a breathless silence—the usual "Once, twice, thrice"—a rap was heard—then, a loud, hearty, and prolonged cheer—"One cheer more," and "A cheer for Amyot," the property having been knocked down to Messrs. Amyot and Co for £3000; the Stratford and London Committee being declared the purchasers.

The five Visitors' Books of Autographs were next sold to Mr. C. S. Butler, of Upper Clapton, for £73 10s. The same gentleman was the purchaser of an oak coffre, for 20 guineas; and a carved cabinet for 10 guineas. Two portraits of Shakespere (unauthorised) brought five guineas each; and a carved chair seven guineas. A life-size bust of Shakespere (from the bust in Stratford Church), and a copy of the church register, tracing the family from their first settlement at Stratford, fetched 35s. Two articles carved from the Poet's mulberry-tree, cut down at New-place, with their authenticity attested by Mr. Sharpe, the carver, occasioned some competition: one of these memorials, a small bust of Shakespere, sold for eighteen guineas; and the other, a spectacle case, fifteen guineas. Such were the most interesting proceedings after the sale of the House in Henley-street. By the latter purchase, the Committee exceeded the sum then in hand by about £2000; but, so completely have they represented the national feeling by the zeal they have shown in preserving the birth-place of Shakespere for the country of his glories, that there is no doubt the public will come forward and supply the deficiency. Many persons have held back their subscriptions on the supposition that a large sum raised before the completion of the purchase would increase the expectation of the owners, and render the property more difficult to obtain, but now the amount is actually known that objection is removed.

We are happy to learn that the subscription proceeds well; and the Committee hope that, in addition to their being enabled by the public to meet the above payment, they will also raise a fund for founding a "Shakespere College" at Stratford, as a happy home and haven for decayed dramatists.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR OCTOBER.

It is scarcely possible yet to speak of the Winter Fashions; the rain and rough weather having led to the Summer toilettes being laid aside, without any positive novelties appearing in their place. Nevertheless, there are a variety of new articles, which have been invented with a view to their adoption for the Winter.

At Paris, the capottes are of taffeta, simply trimmed. The round calottes are worn in the morning promenade. The toiles de Chine, or de Lahore, are in favour; but China crape shawls are more worn. For the promenade, robes of taffeta Royal and bleu Joinville, with high corsage; with Brandebourg to match, are in request. Close Redingotes, with plaited muslin or lace trimming, and demi-large sleeves, are worn; as are, also, aiguillettes and worked buttons; and lace is in high favour.

The costumes which we have engraved, are a chapeau de paille de riz, with flattened velvet flowers; China crape shawl; and striped taffeta robe.

Extraordinary Tree.—During a late heavy storm a portion of the famed lime tree at Neustadt, in Wurtemberg, was blown down by the wind which prevailed. This tree, which was planted more than five hundred years ago, is thirty-six feet in circumference at the base, and the twelve main branches of this gigantic trunk were as thick as oak trees, being more than six feet in circumference. These twelve branches, thickly covered with foliage, formed a circumference of 450 feet, and rested upon 115 props, which, since the year 1554, were for the most part set up by noblemen, bishops, and other persons of distinction. The trunk of this once majestic tree is now standing a mournful wreck of its ancient beauty.

COMMERCIAL CONSCIENCE.

N Cromwell having to organise the forces of Parliament, he was obliged to meet the spirit of chivalrous loyalty which animated the Cavaliers by another moral force which should be equal to it; he found it in religious enthusiasm, and a strong earnestness in the cause: your tipplers, and broken retainers, and such losels, said the sagacious Brewer, are no match for gentlemen bound together by the sentiment of honour; "we must raise men who have some conscience of what they do." In many respects, it is to be wished that a "conscience of what they do" were more frequently to be found; it is required for other things besides regiments of Ironsides.

A conscience of what they did, for instance, can hardly have been possessed by the proprietors of the Cricket steamer, who went on pocketing the gains of the speculation long after they must have known that every day they were risking the lives of thousands. They knew that the hours of toil forced from their servants were excessive beyond physical endurance; that warnings of danger had been given; that men had quitted their employ rather than encounter that peril, till, at last, their vessels were worked by men perfectly ignorant and reckless of the consequences of their actions, either to their own lives or those of others. All this may have been mere carelessness, and not a cool calculation of a certain profit to be made by a certain course of action; it was, perhaps, merely so much capital "embarked" in a speculation, the management made over to agents and servants, and everything else left to take its chance. The last supposition being the least bad of the two, charity should adopt it; but the consequences are just as fatal to the public as if a certain number of explosions had been reckoned upon as a set-off against so much per cent. profit on the capital. It is precisely this want of thought or care in the movers of such undertakings as the cheap steamers, that is so mischievous; and it is to be regretted that, when a catastrophe happens, the punishment can only reach the subordinates, the mere instruments of the system. That the engineer of the Cricket should be convicted of Manslaughter was inevitable after the evidence on the inquest. But is there no blame to his employers? If they knew the facts revealed on the enquiry—of inordinately prolonged hours of toil—of men fainting with fatigue—of all the lax attention and badly discharged duties that such a state of things involves—they are responsible for the result, even if all their material machinery was quite perfect. If their profits allowed it, they should have had more men and better ones; if then the gains did not allow the scheme to be worked efficiently, the sooner it was abandoned the better. If, content with their returns, the Company went on careless of the details of its management, till roused by this horrible accident, then it is guilty of what has occurred; and it is only by a defect of the English law—not the want of a settled conviction in the English public—that it escapes proper punishment. We have before stated, and again repeat, that nothing but making public Companies of this kind responsible for the damage they may do to life and limb by neglect, will work any change for the better. Proper compensation to the wounded, and to those dependent on the killed, would touch Directors and Shareholders in the only part where they are capable of any feeling—the pocket. The sacrifice of some driver or engineman to the vengeance of the law, is made with perfect indifference—the philosophy with which people bear the misfortunes of others being proverbial. A diminished dividend would be quite a different matter. If it did nothing else it would excite attention, thought; the want of which, rather than absolute callousness, causes half the misery of the world. Men absorbed in active pursuits do not see half the consequences of their own acts; they do just what the opinion of the society amidst which they live permits them to do, quite unconscious that anything more or different is required from them. The merchant brothers, in Keats's version of Boccacio's tale, are the types of an immense class; they sit, surrounded by their wealth, unthinking what miseries its creation inflicted on the slave toiling in the mine, and the pearl-diver for them descending to the shark:

> Easy themselves, they turned an easy wheel,
> That set sharp racks at work to pinch and peel.

It was a want of "conscience in what they did," either callousness or carelessness, that allowed the wild system of management on board the Cricket to go on so long. Such mismanagement is unfortunately rendered more easy, by the total ignorance of the mass of the public of what is necessary to their own safety, and their rage for cheapness. The latter amounts to a passion, and converts them into supporters of any scheme that promises something impossible for an incredible price.

This laxity of "conscience," which cannot be safely encouraged, is showing itself in other quarters; and, as it is principally among the conductors of large branches of industry, it is to be presumed there is something in the competition of capital as grinding in its effects as the competition of labour. Cheapness is the great object; and if that cannot be really effected, the semblance of cheapness—the last giving birth to downright swindling and fraud, which are beginning to sully the reputation of English commerce. Half of the dealings of mankind are carried on on trust—the purchaser takes for granted that the ware is what it professes to be: life would be too short if we were compelled perpetually to test and analyze. For a considerable time every gold coin that passed from hand to hand was weighed; every one can remember the inconvenience. A similar feeling of distrust is excited when articles are found to be other than they seem. By the revelations made during a controversy among the drapers, it appears that some manufacturers are in the habit of marking bales of goods as containing one hundred yards, when there are really only eighty-nine, or some other deficient quantity. The manufacturer taxed with the fraud says he is instructed to do it by the "wholesale house" that employs him. The manufacturer, we apprehend, can allege nothing in his defence but that others do the same—the old bad excuse that brings us again to the want of conscience, the sense of the clear right and wrong of the matter. Where does the loss of the fraud fall? The "house" does not pay for the spinning or weaving of a hundred yards, when it knows there is much less; the retailer can at the utmost be cheated but once, and at the next purchase will give but the price of the real quantity. What is the use of the wretched swindle? We fear it finds more success in the foreign market, where it used to be the boast of English merchants that their marks on every bale were received as the most secure of warrants. Are we destroying this great mercantile faith, and descending to be tricksters? The foreigner may be cheated longer than the home dealer, but the consequence of the deception to the country at large is even more fatal than when practised within our own borders. When we held almost all the markets of the world, we could perhaps have been dishonest with some degree of impunity; but when many other nations produce, as well and cheaply as ourselves, the dishonesty is perilous. It becomes the great producing interests, more than any other, to bestir themselves in this matter; let them refuse to be parties to such an act as stamping a lie on their bales of merchandise. However sanctioned by custom, it is nothing else; if it do not deceive it is useless. If there be needy houses, and men who can only stand by the aid of such practices, let them be driven from the trade by the impossibility of finding abettors; if it continue possible to find them, so much the worse for the country at large.

There is another sort of deception much more common; and, as the fraud is less direct, more easily passed over. And yet it is a fraud, with all the effects of one. Articles are made at a price so absurdly disproportioned to what it is possible to supply them for in a really serviceable condition, that "conscience" has evidently gone to sleep in those who manufacture them. The journals have lately spoken of muskets shown at the Exposition at Brussels, complete, for five and six shillings each; we fear their brethren have ere now been produced at Birmingham. It is said that these arms are made for the African market—a phrase which disguises the real fact, that they are constructed purposely to deceive the ignorant—no European, of course, could be taken in by them. So poor Quashee, on the coast, having sold his son for one of these villanous pieces and a red night-cap, is blown out of existence the second or third time he discharges it. But the slaver has paid the manufacturer for so much goods for the "African Market," and, both pocketing their profits, think the transaction a matter of course; the amount of additional misery they have brought into the world never troubles them. And the same principle runs through a whole world of production, in which the articles are not the things they profess to be, but merely the semblance of them. The "conscience" of the work is wanting. It is in this respect that the love of cheapness in the community has re-acted on the manufacturers; the public likes to be cheated with show and pretence, and they are gratified. So they rush on board Cricket steamers, to be carried a couple of miles for a halfpenny, or rather for the chance of being carried it. They make the fortune of any trader who can persuade them that his goods are going at a "awful sacrifice." What less sheer cheating in the world than might be expected, there is an enormous deal of delusion not far removed from it. Mere cheating is somehow discovered, and don't pay for any length of time; but delusion spreads and lives, one kind serving to keep up another. Conscience is equally wanting to them all. Another large chapter might be added to this subject from that class of misfortunes, and even crimes, caused by the want of conscience displayed in regulating the amount of wages of labour. The question is never what is the worth of the work, but how many can be got to do it for the minimum? The Post-office is perpetually robbed in consequence of the operation of this system; there is no counterbalance in the amount of wages to the force of temptation and opportunity. It is the same in private undertakings. In trades and governments alike the virtues and talents of humanity are expected for what will barely support life; and, of course, the virtues and talents are always assumed, the singularity being that people are satisfied with the assumption, hugging themselves with the idea of what a deal they are getting for their money. In a police case, the other day, it appeared that a London tradesman has been robbed of £300 a year, for two years, by a youth to whom he paid six shillings and sixpence a week. Six shillings a week wages—six pounds a week, on an average, stolen. How could honesty be expected in the midst of money circulating around him, from a boy retained on such a wretched pittance? But plenty of others could have stolen, too, unless the employer had lighted on a rare exception. It is always forgotten that such exceptions are not to be attracted by the prospect of six shillings a week. Here again is a "conscience of what they do" desirable in the trading world.

POPULAR DEMONSTRATION AT FLORENCE.

THE scene engraved upon the preceding page presents a strange contrast with the recently perturbed aspect of Italian affairs. The proceedings are thus described in the Journal des Débats:

"The great popular demonstration, which took place at Florence on the 12th, passed off admirably. It commenced at twelve o'clock, in front of the Palace Pitti, the customary residence of the Grand Duke of Tuscany. The object of it was to thank that Prince once again for the institution of the National Guard. Numerous deputations, sent from the principal towns and localities of Tuscany, took part in the proceedings. A summer sun shone on the meeting, which was composed of at least 50,000 persons, of all ranks, divided into brigades, and marching in the most perfect order, preceded by music and banners, on which were inscribed 'Long live Leopold I.'—'Long live Pius IX.!'—'The Customs' Association for ever!' &c. The Tuscan colours, generally speaking, were in the majority; but the Italian tricolore were borne in preference by the deputations of Leghorn and Pisa. These colours are those of the constant Chaplain Republican red white, and green. To avoid all dissension, it had been agreed that the yellow colour, in honour of the Pope, should be added to all the flags, and serve as a sign of union between the different banners. On the arrival of the first flag on the Place of the Palace Pitti, the Grand Duke, surrounded by all his family, including the reigning Grand Duchess, advanced on the grand balcony, wearing the uniform of St. Stephen. The Princes were attired in the Tuscan colours. The assembled multitude then commenced to file off before the Grand Ducal party; and there passed in succession the municipal body of Florence, the officers of the troops on foot and on horseback; deputations of all the religious orders of Tuscany Capuchins, Augustins, Franciscans—all in costume, and preceded by different flags. There came afterwards the representatives of all the great towns of the Grand Duchy, of all the provinces, of all the foreign nations residing at Florence, with their respective flags. An immense shout, in honour of the Grand Duke, was given by these thousands of persons, and it lasted several minutes. It was, we are told, a magnificent and touching spectacle to see this crowd obeying one impression and expressing one sentiment; to which the Grand Duke and his family replied by waving pocket-handkerchiefs, and affectionately saluting the people, which redoubled the enthusiasm. The gigantic cortège did not take less than three hours in passing before the Grand Duke Everything went off with admirable order. Notwithstanding the immense crowd and the general enthusiasm, not a dissension took place between the numerous deputations, not a theft was committed, not a drunken man was seen! Nor was a cry hostile to any Power uttered. In the evening, all Florence was illuminated; the Pitti Palace shining with a thousand lights."

On the day after the festivities, the Grand Duke issued a decree, indicating "paternal satisfaction and gratitude"

THE "GREAT BRITAIN" STEAMER.—This vessel has been towed out of the Prince's Dock Basin, Liverpool, and conveyed to the Coburg Dock, on the south side of which she is now floating. The repairs she has undergone have proved thoroughly effectual in preventing leakage, the quantity of water made up to this time being scarcely perceptible. No orders have yet been given as to when and in what she is to be taken for the alteration or restoration of the machinery and fittings. The agents have not yet received any directions as to the sale of the vessel.

ELECTION EXPENSES.—The publicans' bills of charges sent in to the Newcastle Conservatives since the late contested elections, are said to amount to £3000. On the polling day alone, 6000 persons are said to have breakfasted at Mr. Hodgson's (the Tory candidate) expense, being nearly four times the number of persons that voted in his favour. The total number charged for as having breakfasted, dined, and supped, during the day of the poll, is 14,000, or nine meals per vote!

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE

PARISIANA.

PARIS, September 28.

(From our own Correspondent.)

During the last few days, all the Royal Family have been away from Paris; on the 24th, the Marquise and Marchioness of Normanby set out for Chantilly, where they will remain until after the races; everything, in short, seems to betray a temporary respite in the diplomatic activity of our metropolis; and there is, meanwhile, such a dearth of the events of last week has been a pastoral letter of the Archbishop of Paris, ordering prayers to be put up for Pius IX. In the absence of events of more stirring interest, we have accounts of the military festivities at Compiègne. On Wednesday last, the King and Royal Family drove out to witness a sham attack upon the farm of Corbeaulieu, where they partook of a collation when the skirmish was over. On Thursday, the Persian Ambassador was formally presented to the Majesty, which ceremony is said to have given way to a rather absurd circumstance. According to the Persian fashion, his Excellency is not in the habit of wearing stockings, and his bare legs being considered an inadmissible breach of etiquette, the Civil List sent him a present of red-striped cotton hose, to qualify him for appearing in the Royal presence. He is what it may, he pronounced a most poetic address to the King, setting forth, "How his Sovereign, whose power was that of the constellation of Saturn, and whose empire reaches to heaven, had charged him with the signal mission of laying the homage of his Imperial friendship before the King of the French, the sublime image of the sun, in the august threshold of his Imperial grandeur." His Excellency next delivered into the King's hands an autograph letter of his Sovereign, with a miniature portrait of the Schah, richly set, and the Insignia of the Persian Orders of the Sun and the Lion, conferred by Si e Asiatic Monarch upon his Majesty Louis Philippe. He then retired, and was conducted to the apartments of the Queen, where all the Princesses were assembled, with the Count of Paris among them. After presenting his homage to her Majesty, he tendered her rich presents of jewels, Cashmeres, and the finest Persian stuffs; and to the Count of Paris he offered some Persian guns, enclosed in splendid cases. We are assured that the King has conferred the Grand Order of the Lion of Honour upon the Schah of Persia, and that the Ambassador himself has been made a member of the same Order.

A grand reviewing of all the troops on the 24th, was the last episode of the Royal visit to Compiègne; his Majesty having left for St. Cloud on the 26th, in company of the Princes and Princesses, and the equipages alone of the Duke and Duchess of Nemours. It was observed that, during the whole holidays of the Court at Compiègne, the Duchess of Orleans did not attend any of the theatrical representations, nor, indeed, appear in public, unless on the rare occasions when her presence was strictly necessary.

It has been equally remarked that General Fox was the object of the most officious attentions on the part of M. Guizot and the Russian General, Baron Medem, was treated by him with a designed coldness. Now the Camp of Compiègne is broken up; but it does not appear that the Duke of Nemours is to accompany to Algeria the new Governor-General, which will, no doubt, create some sensation, as it confers a dignity which did not legally exist in our military hierarchy. By this ordonnance, dated St Cloud, the 26th, the Duke of Dalmatia is nominated Marshal-General of France. To have done with all the rumours and reports bearing upon politics, I will add that several European and American States are said to have accredited residents at the Court of Queen Pomare, at Tahiti; and that Admiral Deciès, it is affirmed, has been commissioned, on his return from China, to visit the Queen of Madagascar, and use his personal influence with her, in order to bring about a friendly solution to the differences between her Majesty and our Government. General Prim left Paris on Friday, for Madrid. His friend, Brigadier Amedée, at present in our metropolis, has equally obtained a passport to return to Spain. In a previous letter, I had told you of 12,000 muskets, which were stated to have been offered to Pius IX. Now the Union Monarchique informs us that this was not a generosity of our Government; but merely a private speculation, under the patronage of our Cabinet—a smart invention to turn to good profit 12,000 superfluous guns, which have been declined, of course, by his Holiness, thanks to their European renown.

New accounts have reached us of the late fire at Rochefort, and one cannot help perceiving in this unfortunate occurrence a curious resemblance with the conflagration at Toulon two years ago. It is in the offices of the Control Department that the fire broke out, and all the records and registers of the Administration were the first prey to the flames

Prince Napoleon Bonaparte, the son of the ex-King of Westphalia, arrived in Paris on Thursday. Prince Jerome himself is shortly expected to join him; but both of them are only authorised to make a temporary sojourn in our metropolis.

Frederic Soulié, the author of the "Mémoires du Diable," and one of the most popular novel-writers of the present school, died on the 23rd, in his forty-eighth year, after a long illness, at Bievres, near Paris. A funeral service was performed for him yesterday, at the church of St. Elizabeth, which was crowded with the friends of the deceased and all the literary characters of the day. After the pall was held by MM. Victor Hugo, Baron Taylor, Saintine, and Balzac. After the ceremony the remains were removed for interment to the Pere Lachaise, where Victor Hugo pronounced a funeral oration over the tomb

If we are to believe in the assertions of the Constitutionnel Mdlle. Delmay has, for some days past, been relieved from her secret confinement, and is even shortly to be set at liberty. Her long-expected trial, which is to take place in the Assize Court, is, however, still delayed, in consequence of the non-arrival of the witnesses from Algeria, to which she is indebted, it is said, for the change in her position. It was rumoured that certain speculators had proposed to her a considerable sum to allow the whole of her correspondence with the late Duke to be published. This offer she at first absolutely rejected; but, the desire to explain her conduct must be exceedingly strong in her mind, and it is far from unlikely that she may alter her decision. It is also affirmed that two persons have sent in an offer of marriage to the prisoner.

The Lyons papers have given intelligence that a suspension bridge of a new species has been recently invented by a speculator, who is now planning a still more wondrous achievement. In the neighbourhood of the Wood of La Fête d'Or, there is a pavilion erected on the banks of the Rhone, from which rope extends to a distance of about a hundred yards, where its extremity is fixed in the ground, and small waggons are made to rush down this aërial path, by means of pulleys rolling on the ropes. The success of this pleasure contrivance was so complete as to suggest the idea of connecting by a similar bridge the hill of La Croix Rousse and the Brotteaux, a new suburb on the opposite bank of the Rhone. The difference between the levels of these two points is upwards of 200 feet, and they are some 18,000 feet distant from one another. According to our Lyons contemporaries, the project is as serious as possible. The sites of the two stations are already specified, and the contemplated bridge is spoken of as though it were already constructed. It is to be strong enough to carry goods, as well as passengers. An omnibus, with eight seats, will run over the distance; and, at the station on the Croix Rousse, there will be established a steam-engine for the purpose of bringing into play a windlass, with a rope, to draw up the waggons in their ascent.

Let me pay off now the arrears of my debt to the fine arts. I have already alluded to the competitions annually instituted at the Ecole des Beaux Arts for the Prix de Rome, that is, for several prizes entitling the pupils on whom they are conferred to spend three years at Rome at the expense of the Government. These competitions are now over; the prizes have been awarded; and the bas-reliefs, pictures, and architectural drawings of the laureates, are in the course of exhibition at the Ecole des Beaux Arts—where the public is, moreover, admitted to visit the more important works sent in for 1847, by the present pensioners of the French Academy in Rome. Of the three competitions for the Roman prizes, that of the class of painting is certainly the most interesting. For the first time, the pupils of the Royal School were bold enough to abandon the cold and formal style of the old classics; and, however unwillingly, the Academy did actually confer the first and second prizes on two pictures essentially in the pseudo-romantic feverish manner of the Jeune France. The "Death of Vitellius" was the subject to be treated.

The class of architecture, on the contrary, is as common-place as possible, with the ordinary display of the bastard Gallo-Greek columns and pediments, so much in favour under Napoleon. As to the sculptures, they are clever compositions, no doubt, like everything produced by the Academy; but the subject—"Presenting to Philoctetes the Remains of his Brother Lipplas," but they certainly show more handicraft than striking artistic qualities.

The works sent in from Rome consist of eight important paintings, one marble statue, three large basso-relievi, and several busts and medals. With more experience, all these attempts exhibit the same tendency to pay more attention to the materialities of art than to the spiritual which planks the French school. However, the marble figure of "Sappho," by M. Diebolt, is remarkable for its grandeur and amplitness; and in his basso relievo, "Socrates and his Demon," M. Guillaume has imitated, with great neatness, the severe elegance of the Greek artists of Greece. Among the painters, M. Blennoury contributed a splendid copy of Titian's "Sacred Love and Profane Love;" and M. Dauncey's "Othryades" is a masterly, skilful production of the Lamartinian school, whose chief, whilst writing with his blood on a rock—"Sparta has conquered."

On Thursday night the Odéon will open again with "Isabelle de Castille," a play in five acts. Two days after, it will be the turn of the Hallées; and the Français will not be long in following their example—meanwhile, it is undergoing a complete restoration, actively carried on by MM. Cicerl, Rubé, and Dosse—the latter artist is charged to paint the cupola, which is to represent the "Rising of Aurora."

SPAIN.

One of our letters from Madrid alludes to the probability of another change in the Ministry, as disputes have already arisen between General Serrano and M. [illegible].

M. Gurrea, General Espartero's Aide de-Camp, who arrived at Madrid on the 2nd inst., has been received with the greatest cordiality and kindness. He has come to desire to be of service to the interests of her Majesty. General Espartero, in this letter, gives expression in the warmest manner to his feelings of gratitude for the decree which restores him to his country, and which recognises the rank and the other distinctions he won in battling for the Throne and the liberty of the nation. He declares that all that has passed for the last four years has been obliterated from his heart by this mark of her Majesty's kindness. He proclaims himself ready, whenever he may be called on, to fly to the defence of his Queen, and that in any capacity that she may think his services of most value; and says that he did not require this proof of the Royal bounty to be convinced of her Majesty's natural goodness of heart and nobleness of disposition. He professes himself persuaded that the amnesty—which forms, as it were, the basis of his communication—will be carried out both in spirit and in letter.

Mr. Bulwer was at La Granja, where he was to spend a few days.

The Infante Don Francisco de Paula had arrived, with his daughter, the Infanta Josefa, at Burgos, where due honours had been paid to their Royal Highnesses.

ITALY.

By our last advices from Italy we find that public attention is chiefly directed towards Naples. A letter from that city dated the 21st ult., anticipates a general rising in Sicily.

In Calabria the insurrection has extended to Catanzaro, and the insurgents are said to have fortified themselves in Gerace.

The Augsburg Gazette asserts that the Pope has written an autograph letter to the Emperor of Austria, with a view to procure a friendly arrangement of the differences at Ferrara. That paper also contains a letter dated Vienna, the 21st ult., which announces that the affair of Ferrara had assumed a favourite turn at Vienna. The Prussian Ambassador at the Court of Rome, who accompanied the King during his journey in Italy, had arrived at Vienna, bringing with him an autograph letter from the King of Prussia. He proposed to return to Rome in a few days.

The Italian and French journals continue to give accounts of the insurrection in Calabria, but a good deal of exaggeration appears to prevail in both channels. It is said that almost every district has declared in favour of the movement, and reinforce the bands of the insurgents. The greater part of the coast connected with the principal towns which are in insurrection has also declared in their favour. A sanguinary conflict has taken place between the bands of Romeo and the Royal troops commanded by General Nunziante, who has five battalions under his orders. Upwards of three hundred of the King's soldiers were either killed or taken prisoners; amongst the dead were found a colonel and a captain. On their side, the insurgents had also a good number killed or taken prisoners. After this affair, Romeo sent to propose to General Nunziante an exchange of prisoners, but in reply to this proposal, of late, all the prisoners who had fallen into his power had been at once shot. Romeo, in reprisal, had the prisoners taken by his men also put to death. The tactics of Romeo appear to be to advance constantly, organising the insurrection in all the districts he passes through, respecting in all cases the property and persons of the inhabitants.

The Republic of San Marino has just experienced a change. This little country, honourable in an old age by the States of Europe, has always preserved its independence. It contains about 7000 inhabitants, all engaged in agriculture. Its Government is composed of two Captain-Regents, charged with the executive power, a Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, another for Home Matters, and a Council of State. The latter body has just been converted into a Chamber of Representatives, named by all the inhabitants, and it has declared that its deliberations are to be public.

GREECE.

Our correspondence from Athens last week, enabled us to announce the death of M. Colettí. The Moniteur contains the official despatch from M. Piscatory, the French Minister at Athens, to M. Guizot, dated Sept. 10, giving an account of M. Colettí's last moments:—"After a struggle of fourteen days—the most unexpected, but a very strong constitution, and a very firm soul, can sustain against a desperate disease—M. Colettí is expiring. The end of this day will probably be that of his sufferings and life. By such as shall have beheld him in his last moments, his death will be deemed a perfect model of a good and great citizen He has lost nothing of his mental strength and calmness. From the first moments he discovered about his disease, and pronounced it incurable; but although convinced of the inefficacy of all remedies, he accepted them from his friends. Every day the King has come to see him. His Majesty would demand the last advice of a man whose loss he deeply feels. Yesterday, while striving to check his tears, the King attempted to converse with him once more. M. Colettí had me called for, in order to support him as he sat in his bed; but he had had his strength deserted him, and, taking the King's hand, he said, 'I had, Sire, a great deal to tell your Majesty, but I can no longer do it; God will perhaps permit that I may have strength enough to-morrow.' 'To you, also, my friend,' said M. Colettí, after the King's departure, 'I should have a great deal to say, but it is impossible. Thank your King and your Queen for the kindness with which they have always honoured me. Mention me to my friends at Paris. Convey my farewell to M. Guizot, M. de Broglie, and M. Eynard. Until the last moment I have followed their affairs so far as I have been able; they must be pleased with me. The King has just told me that everybody—my enemies as well as my friends—takes an interest in me. This is pleasing to me, but my work is not accomplished. If I could but be commenced it twelve years ago, I should now die in peace. I can speak no more; lay me down. I would fall asleep.' From this moment the fits of calmness and of suffocation have rapidly succeeded one another. In brief moments of delirium he is to be heard repeating the songs of his youth. Ten months ago you told me, Monsieur le Ministre, that it was not yet time for M. Colettí to join Plutarch's battalion. God has judged otherwise of it!"

TURKEY

We have accounts from Constantinople to the 14th ult. On the previous day a disastrous fire occurred at Pera, in the immediate neighbourhood of the Galata Seraglio. The wind, which was high at the time, increased to a hurricane, and in a few minutes the fire had extended itself over a considerable portion of Pera. At five o'clock it had gained the houses near the New British Palace on the one side, and Balnk Bazar on the other, a distance of 80 houses in a straight line. At six, the conflagration grew still more fierce, and had broken out in the very centre of Pera, in the direction of the small burying ground, a considerable distance from the original seat of the conflagration itself. Fortunately the wind turned to the south, and the flames were thrown upon an open space in the Piccio Campo. At half-past six it was announced that another fire had broke out in a Turkish quarter at Orta Kuey, and thus the surplus of the spectators, firemen, and water carriers, &c., was drawn towards that point. At half-past ten the fire was mastered on all sides, having consumed upwards of 250 large houses, inhabited by the most respectable Perote families. Sixteen of these were large stone mansions, which had consequently become the depôt of furniture and goods. The British chapel, and several outhouses appertaining to the new palace, were consumed. In all, it is calculated the loss of property must exceed a million sterling. Several persons perished in the conflagration, and among others, it is said a young Englishman, who had remained in a house with the hopes of saving some important papers belonging to a person who was himself absent in the country. It is known that the house was bought by Feris Ahmet Pacha profiting by the misfortune to rob the unfortunate sufferers whose houses were taking fire, were by his orders thrown into the fire and burnt.

It is feared that misfortunes will generally (in Constantinople; what the panic in the commercial world had begun, fires have come to consummate In 1830, when Pera was burned down, the plague was raging amongst its inhabitants; for a sickness wasting now, for an epidemic of a dangerous nature prevails at this moment.

The news received from Albania is favourable to the preservation of peace. The army of the Sultan, which was in vast force, had advanced into the mountains of Malacastro, and had defeated the insurgents in several engagements. There will be some very important changes in the Turkish high functionaries immediately after the return of the Bairam. It is definitively stated by some that Mehemet Ali Pacha and Hosref Pacha will again be brought forward.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

We have received Cape papers to the 28th of July. The Kaffir depredations on the frontier still continued with impunity. Not a day elapsed but they succeeded in carrying off cattle; and a few only were afterwards recovered, even with the most vigilant pursuit. In fact, resistance appears to have been almost abandoned. The settler, named Phillips, residing at the Great Fish River Mouth, [illegible]. "The Kaffirs paid me another visit last night, and stole off with 26 oxen and cows. Within these last four months I have lost cattle and horses to the value of more than £300, and I am now left without oxen to plough my land. Where this will end, no person can say, for the Kaffirs deliberately take them along the waggon road." The South African papers contain a long account of the fine derby sheep which they possess little interest for the English reader. They are all of the same character, but happily unattended with loss of life. Nor do matters appear more promising for the future, for at a meeting which had been convened by Mr. H. Young, and a deputation appointed for that purpose, Sir H. Young "regretted that he had it not in his power to assist them, and he could give them no better consolation than his first belief that matters would be worse before they were better."

The agitation for a "distinct and separate government" occupied some of the people of the eastern province.

The resolutions, which had been passed at the Fort Elizabeth meeting, had reached Cape Town, but they had not been received in the best spirit, as one of the papers, alluding to them, remarks, that "the agitation for a distinct and separate government occupied some of the people of the eastern province, though the precise meaning of these words had not been elicited" The same journal also observes, that the last frontier post communicated no news of interest. The latest letters from Natal were unimportant.

LABUAN AND BORNEO.

The papers by the last India Mail state that the steamer Nemesis, with Mr. Brooke on board, had a severe action on the 30th of May with a fleet of piratical prahus off Labuan. The pirates were completely routed, several of their prahus having been driven on shore and burned.

The pirate force consisted of eleven prahus—two of the largest size—four somewhat smaller, with crews of fully fifty men each, and five with a complement of from thirty-five to forty hands. The force of the pirates was reckoned at 500 men, exclusive of captives, and these, on the testimony of some rescued Chinese, were above a hundred persons.

It is difficult to form a correct estimate of the killed and wounded on the enemy's part; but, as forty to fifty men were dead on the deck—fifty men killed found in the captured prahus, and the like number in the prahus which escaped, besides those who may have died in the jungle, we may reckon the killed at 80 or 90 men, and the wounded at double that number. The loss on the British side was one man killed, and seven men wounded—two mortally and most severely. Ten brass guns, varying in size from nine-pounders to 1elas, and five iron guns, are the trophies of victory.

Five prahus were taken, and the escape of the rest is to be attributed to the small number of our boats, as at one time eight prahus were lying on the beach at once, and their crews and, had our boats been sufficient to secure them, the other three would have been overtaken by the Nemesis

The Sultan of Borneo, who secured the persons of the pirates, appointed the 4th of June for their slaughter. They were taken to the rear of Brunl town, and the whole of the re-captured captives, thirty in number, were assembled on the spot. The day was made a general holiday; hundreds of Dyaks were drawn to the spot. The Sultan directed the whole of the pirates to be secured, with their hands fastened behind their backs, their feet also bound, and a thick cord secured the knees to the neck—in this state they were utterly helpless. The Sultan then addressed the late captives, and, after expressing his dislike of piracy and slavery, requested the captives to take their revenge by slaying the pirates. The captives declined cutting their enemies to pieces, saying, "God is great, and will punish the wicked." The Sultan then addressed himself to Pangeran Moormein (the Prime Minister selected by Admiral Cochrane), and said he agreed that the Sultan and his Minister should destroy the pirates between them. The Sultan set the example. One of the pirates was secured to a tree, and the Sultan hurled at him a spear, which pierced the heart. This was a signal for the work of carnage. The followers of the Sultan and Pangeran Moormein gave a shout of triumph, rushed on the pirates, and, with parangs, spears, and short swords, cut the helpless wretches to pieces—the slaying reduced at studding the blood of their enemies—most of the captives turned their heads from the scene! Such was the summary execution under the direction of our new ally, the Sultan of Borneo

Mr Brooke is on his way to England, bringing with him the treaty he had concluded with the Sultan.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

MR. GRANTLEY BERKELEY AND THE HOUSEKEEPER AT BERKELEY HOUSE.

At the Westminster County Court, on Tuesday, a plaintiff, Mr. Latham, sought to recover, on behalf of his wife, housekeeper at Berkeley House, Springgardens, the town residence of Earl Fitzhardinge, from the Hon. Grantley Charles Fitzhardinge Berkeley, M.P., the sum of £19 13s. 10d., for money, goods sold and delivered, and breakfasts and luncheons supplied to the defendant between April, 1842, and September, 1844, under the following circumstances:

Mr. Dod, in stating the case, said that from the year 1842 to the year 1844, during which period the present bill was incurred, the Countess of Berkeley was living; on the 3rd of October, 1844, the Countess died, and up to that period Mrs. Latham, the plaintiff, was housekeeper at Berkeley House. The Countess was in the habit of residing chiefly away from London at Cranford Lodge. During her absence from London she allowed her sons and daughters to occupy sleeping rooms in Berkeley House, the plaintiff, who was on board wages, receiving strict orders from the Countess that her sons and daughters were to pay for everything they had, wax-lights, the washing of the bed linen, and even for heating the carpets in their rooms. The plaintiff did, or got all this done, and the five sons and daughters paid her every year for what she did for them, except the defendant. He had, however, paid several previous bills, and the present was the last.

Mrs. Frances Latham was then sworn, and stated that she had been sixteen or seventeen years housekeeper in Berkeley House. The Countess Berkeley died in October, 1844, and the amount now claimed was for articles supplied to Mr. Berkeley during her lifetime. Her Ladyship paid her board wages every three months, and the sons and daughters paid for everything they had, with the exception of Mr. Henry Berkeley. They merely had the use of the rooms, and she kept their accounts in separate books, and gave them bills of what she had expended for them

The Judge: How many were occupying rooms in Berkeley House?—Mrs. Latham: Four. Lady Mary, the Hon. Grantley, the Hon. Craven, and Mr. Henry. Mr. Grantley and Mr. Craven only came to town during the session of Parliament.

By Mr. Dod: The letter produced is in the handwriting of the Countess. It is addressed to me, and the postscript says, "If you ever send carpets to be beat, or put me to any expense for my sons, I will discharge you."

By the Judge (D. C. Moylan, Esq.): I have settled bills of the same nature before with Mr. Grantley Berkeley, and he has paid me by check. The last payment was in 1842, in August of that year. From that check, which was £24, a balance remained due to him, for which I have given him credit in the present bill.

Mr. Dod: Was Mr. Grantley Berkeley in the habit of giving you orders to get his room ready for him. Mrs. Latham: He was.

Examination continued: Mr. Grantley would sometimes come and stay one night, and sometimes two, and I supplied him with candles. I entered every thing in his book. I paid the postage of a great number of letters, and railway parcels. I delivered bills to him from time to time, and repeatedly asked him for payment. I pressed him for money in 1844, and told him that I really must have it.

By the Judge: I swear most positively that I pressed him then for the money, and have not now proceeded against him in consequence of family differences having arisen.

Mr. Dod: I have a letter from Mr. Grantley Berkeley, bearing date October, 1845, in which he says, "I have applied to Lord Fitzhardinge for money, and until he pays me I can't pay your bill."

The Judge: I think the case has been satisfactorily proved.

An order was then made for the payment of the debt and costs on the 20th of October.

Outlawry of Mr. Maclean.—At the Bankruptcy-Court, on Wednesday, it was arranged that the adjourned examination of Mr. D. Maclean, late M.P. for Oxford, should take place. The bankrupt was described as a brick-maker, of Grosvenor street. The bankrupt, however, did not attend, and information was was intimated that he was abroad. In consequence of the non-appearance of the bankrupt, the usual proclamation of outlawry was made by the officer of the court.

IRELAND.

Death of the Archdeacon of Killala.—The Venerable Archdeacon Trotlock died on Sunday last, after a few hours' illness, at the rectory in Skreen, in the 51st year of his age. The deceased had taken an active part in alleviating the sufferings of the poor during the last calamitous winter, and wrote a letter to the public journals, descriptive of the frightful condition of the district where he resided attracted considerable attention at the time of their publication. His death is greatly lamented by all classes in his neighbourhood.

The Repeal Association The usual meeting was held on Monday, and was fully attended, Mr. Edward Maguire in the chair. Mr. Ray, the secretary (who has just recovered from very serious indisposition), congratulated the country on the progress Repeal was making, which, he said, was amply proved by the number of Repeal members returned at the late election. O'Connell then handed in £11 from Londonderry, and read a couple of fulsome letters addressed to him as "The Leader of the Irish People." In moving their insertion on the minutes, he animadverted upon the Morning Herald paragraph, and said that another preliminary meeting of Irish representatives would assemble, to fix the day for the general conference, which, he expected, would take place early in October, as the general opinion of the country was, that Parliament would assemble in November. (Hear, hear.) There were already forty pledged Repealers, who promised to attend the conference—they had got no rein-als—and many gentlemen, Conservatives and Whigs, he understood, would be present, when the day was fixed, to assist them in urging on Government the necessity of providing for the distress likely to be felt during the ensuing winter. (Hear, hear.) There was another subject to which he (Mr O'Connell) would allude, namely, the state of Italy, and the gross and violent attempts which were made to put down the authority of the sovereign Pontiff. (Hear.) The political horizon of Italy was even more clouded than it was on that day week, and clouds were daily lowering. Yet, owing to the accursed Union, they were deprived of the means of rendering assistance to resist the attempts made to put down morality and religion. (Hear, hear.) Several other speeches were made. The amount of the rent was £50

Execution for Murder at Clonmel.—Yesterday week, the extreme penalty of the law was carried into execution in front of the county gaol, Clonmel, on Michael Ryan (Goshby) and Thomas Ryan (Cody) who were convicted at the last assizes of the murder of sub-constable Crowdey. The ropes being adjusted in the press room, and the caps placed on their heads, they walked out on the drop, and in a moment were dead. Neither of the unfortunate men made a declaration as to their guilt or innocence.

More Barbarous Murders.—On Wednesday (last week), the house of a man named Kelly, at Knocksonny, county Limerick, was attacked by an armed party, who knocked at the door and demanded admittance. Kelly, who was sitting at the fire, eating his supper, rose, with one of his children in his arms, for the purpose of opening the door, when the persons outside fired, and shot him dead. The child's legs were broken, as well from the effects of the shot as from the father falling on them. The murderers, in their hasty escape through the bog, and have not since been taken. The cause of this terrible deed is said to be something about land. On Thursday, an inquest was held on the body of Kelly, and a verdict of "Wilful murder against persons unknown" returned. Two accomplices remained outside while this barbarous outrage was being perpetrated. Kelly died in a few minutes, and his nephew was removed to the hospital, where the ball was extracted. Kelly's brother was wounded by a pistol-shot the week before, by a fellow who came behind him and fired, on the public road, near Castle Connell. This miscreant was heard to express deadly vengeance against Kelly and his brother, and there is little doubt has thereby failed in the first attempt against the life of one brother, from a loose charge in the pistol, he was resolved to be doubly sure against the other, and in which the diabolical wretch unfortunately succeeded. This atrocious affair, Ryan (Pistol), has absconded.

A Family Burned to Death.—On the night of Monday, the 20th ult., a hut, which was erected by a man of the name of Leahy, at Ballyvercian, about two miles from Youghal, and which contained six human beings, viz., a woman, wife to Leahy, her mother-in-law, and four children of the former, two of whom, with the mother, were in fever, took fire, and every soul perished in the flames. What adds to the sad catastrophe is, that Leahy, who had been sent by his employer to the fair of Bartlemy, or Bartholomew's-well, and was on his return home at night, was the first person who discovered the conflagration, but did not arrive in time to render any assistance, as his whole family had perished, and the hut was all but consumed, before he reached the spot.

Extension of the South Western Railway to Hungerford-Bridge.—This great undertaking is rapidly progressing towards completion. The large arch that is to cross the Westminster-road has been commenced; the stone plinths are being laid, and the abutments already appear above the foundation. When completed, it will present a span of 80 feet, and an elevation of 17 feet. The arch crossing the Wandsworth-road is completed, and is 70 feet span. The arch at South Lambeth-road is a great curiosity; though it is 16 feet span on the square, and 33 feet square, and built over a sewer, it is constructed entirely of brick. The arch over Paradise-street, Lambeth, is to be a flat arch, and to consist of ten iron girders, of enormous size, being nearly 30 feet long, and of 3½ tons weight each.

Prorogation of Parliament.—At the Privy Council held by the Queen at Osborne, Isle of Wight, on Tuesday, Parliament was ordered to be further prorogued from Tuesday, the 19th of October, until Thursday, the 11th of November.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

We regret to hear by recent letters from Trebizond that the cholera morbus had reached that town. On board the Peninsular and Oriental Company's steamer Sultan, Captain Brooks, on her late voyage from Trebizond to Constantinople, several cases had broken out, in consequence of which she had been ordered by the health authorities at the latter port to Prince's Island to ride out her quarantine of ten days.

A very fatal disease, new to this country, has lately made its appearance among sheep. It is in the small pox of that animal, and in its first stages, more particularly, many fall victims to it. It was introduced by some Spanish sheep imported from Hamburg, and has already found its way into many flocks. Several sheep affected with it have also been exposed for sale in Smithfield-market. At the Royal Veterinary College experiments have been instituted, by which its infectious and contagious nature have been completely proved.

The last New York papers give accounts from New Orleans, from which it appears that the ravages of the yellow fever in the latter city exceed the fatal consequences of any such visitation during the memory of the oldest inhabitant. There were 1,000 deaths in August, and that out of a very thin population; while at La Fayette the mortality was still greater in proportion. The deaths in September, so far as reported, were from 60 to 70 every day.

On Wednesday a Court of Directors was held at the East India House, when Lieutenant-General Sir George Henry Frederick Berkeley, K.C.B., was appointed Commander-in-Chief of the Company's Forces on the Madras establishment.

A severe tornado struck the town of Cornwall (Canada) on the 5th of September. It lasted but a few minutes, but did an infinite deal of damage during that short time. It uncoofed about thirty houses, threw down many outhouses, killed some cattle, and drove a poor girl into the canal, where she was unfortunately drowned.

The Bombay papers mention the loss of the steamer Cleopatra with 300 persons on board, in consequence of having been sent to sea in an unfit state. Fifteen appear to be certain of the loss of the vessel, in addition to the rough weather in the middle of April last. She has not been heard of since that hurricane.

The Sydney papers of the 8th May state that the colony was in a flourishing condition. The shipping lists indicate an active trade with London, the South Seas, and New Zealand. Sir Charles Fitzroy opened the last Session of the first Legislative Council of New South Wales on the 4th May. His speech on the occasion is described as giving general satisfaction. It congratulated the members on the general condition of the colony—the abundance, cheapness, and excellent quality of all the necessaries of life, and the flourishing state of the revenue

Within the last few weeks locusts have been discovered in several parts of the kingdom. A few days since two very large ones were picked up on the Ipswich barrack ground. The largest measured more than four inches in length.

Affairs in Switzerland continue to be in a very excited state. At Berne, military preparations proceeding with considerable activity on the part of the Federal Government and the Sonderbund, and a collision is deemed imminent. The Canton of Zurich has demanded the speedy dissolution of the League, and, in imitation of Berne, has granted a considerable sum for the organization of the militia on a respectable footing. Lord Minto has arrived at Berne, and has assured the chief of the Vorort that Great Britain will not permit foreign intervention in the internal affairs of the Cantons

It appears from the official returns of the traffic on the Great Western Railway, that during the last 13 weeks the receipts have exceeded those of the corresponding 13 weeks of last year by no less a sum than £11,500, or nearly £1000 per week. A remarkable fact connected with this increase of receipt is, that, notwithstanding the depressed condition of the mercantile world, the Great Western Company have, during the last two weeks, carried more goods of a general description than they had ever previously conveyed in the same period. The goods' receipts for the week ending Sept. 25, amounted to £5260.

We have received Monte Video papers to the 23rd of June. They do not contain anything important Negotiations were still going on between the Government of Rosas and the English and French Ministers, and strong hopes were entertained by the latter of a favourable issue.

A letter from Dresden states that the Municipal Council of that city had decided to petition the Government against allowing capital executions to be public. The Municipal Council considers that, independently of such sights producing a bad effect on the spectators, they are in a manner connected with the course of criminal proceedings in Saxony, where all such matters are conducted with closed doors

A gentleman was robbed of £3800 on Sunday last, whilst listening to one of the local preachers, who, on each Sabbath, frequent the area in front of the Liverpool Custom-house. He has offered a reward, but no clue to the thief has been discovered.

We have received some West India papers to the 21st of August, but we find nothing of interest in them. On the 15th of that month two smart shocks of earthquake had been felt at San Lucia, of which the second, which came on after a momentary interval, was the more severe.

The accounts from the Highlands regarding the potato crop continue to be of such a character as to set at rest all fears as to a potato failure.

We learn from Normandy that for a long time past the crop of apples has not been so abundant as it is this season. The trees have borne the weight of the fruit, and in many cases the branches have broken from not being propped.

The Augsburg Gazette mentions that the Russian capital had recently undergone a general valuation of property. The statistical tables show immoveables to the amount of 8493, and valued at 88,509,555 s. r. Previous to that official valuation, the total amount was supposed not to exceed 53,900,000 s. r., thus showing an increase of more than 60 per cent.

The Russian Ambassadors to the Great Powers have been called to attend a diplomatic meeting at St. Petersburg, for what reason has not transpired. The Prince of Prussia will also be present. It is supposed that very important matters will be discussed.

The electric telegraph has during the week been brought into operation at Liverpool. At present it is only capable of being worked in communication with Manchester, and there is no connection along the London and Birmingham line beyond Rugby. The workmen, however, are actively employed in laying the wires for the remaining distance

The ship Stalkart, laden with 103 brass guns and other military trophies taken in the Mesnee War, was chartered by the Government for the purpose of conveying the guns from India to England. On the 28th of July, when off Middleton Point, near Sangor, she unfortunately missed stays and drove on to a reef, where she fell over on her broadside, and became a wreck. After considerable difficulty, and work of several days, nineteen guns were fished up.

The sister of Schiller, Madame Reinwald, died recently at Meiningen, in Germany, at the advanced age of 90.

The Weser Zeitung, of the 17th ult., states that a rich collection of Hebrew books, consisting of 5000 printed volumes and 800 MSS., forming the library of M. Michel, of Hamburg, has just been purchased by the British Museum

The Chinese American factory has received a severe loss in the death, on the 29th June, of their Commissioner, Mr. Everett. He had only arrived in Canton a few days with his family, to take possession of a new house in Canton.

Letters from Hamburg announce, that never since the revolution has the city been in such a state of agitation as at this moment. The arrival of every courier from England is looked forward to with evident alarm, for the disasters which befallen the Commerce of Great Britain, and those which are expected at Hamburg, cannot fail to produce a most fatal reaction on the principal cities of the Continent, and, above all, on such a place as Hamburg, where commercial interests are so nearly allied with those of England

A widow woman named Marshall, residing at Thornhill, near Glasgow, aged ninety-six, has this, as on former seasons, cut her corn and barley, binding and stooking it single-handed. She has also dug the potatoes on her ground, as she was afraid they would be stolen, and she is now engaged thrashing out the barley in her barn.

Mr. James Fisin, father of the Royal Society of Musicians, died last week, at his residence near Colchester, aged 85. He had been a member of the society for sixty-five years. The present senior member is Mr. Francis Cramer, who was elected in 1794.

At a Court of Common Council on Tuesday, Sir Peter Laurie stated that he did not at present intend to press his motion for a grant of money in aid of the fund for the erection of a Monument to Shakespeare. One reason which weighed strongly with him was, that the Committee for purchasing what was called "Shakespeare's House" at Stratford, had appealed to the public; and he was unwilling to interfere in any way with that body.

On Wednesday the American vessels in the port of Liverpool were decked out with flags and streamers, in honour of the victories gained by General Scott.

The number of passengers between England and Boulogne, during the week ending 26th of September, was 2305. The number of passengers during the same week between England and Calais, was 264, a number less by 144 than that of the corresponding week of last year.

Lord John Russell has kindly and considerately presented to Mrs. Thom, mother of the late Robert Thom, Esq., Consul at Ningpo, China, two hundred and fifty pounds out of the Queen's Bounty Fund.

The block printers of Lancashire and the adjoining counties have adopted a resolution of presenting to the Queen a beautiful specimen of their handiwork, in the hope that the use of it by her Majesty will infuse a larger and more generous spirit of competition into the trade with which they are connected. The present consists of a piece of cashmere, or mousselin-de-laine, 24 yards in length, which has been printed by blocks.

The vessel Falcao, of Portugal, has arrived at Blackwall, from Lisbon and Oporto, with 130 oxen. No previous arrival of the kind has taken place from Portugal at the port of London.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

THE RIGHT HON. SIR JOHN BERNARD BOSANQUET.

This learned Judge, who sat on the Bench of the Common Pleas for twelve years, from 1830 to 1842, received his education at Christ Church, Oxford; was called to the Bar in 1800: obtained the Coif in 1814; and became King's Sergeant in 1827. In 1835 and 1836, he was one of the Commissioners for executing the office of Lord Chancellor.

Sir John Bosanquet descended from an ancient family of Languedoc. His immediate ancestor, David de Bosanquet, sought refuge in England at the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes; and married, in 1697, an English lady, Elizabeth, daughter of Claude Hayes, Esq. By her, he left several children, the eldest of whom, David Bosanquet, Esq., a merchant of London, gained distinction as an antiquary, many of the most valuable of the Greek Medals in the Hunterian Museum were collected by him, during his travels.

This gentleman's next brother, Samuel, of the Forest House, Essex, was father of Samuel Bosanquet, Esq., Governor of the Bank, A.D. 1792, who, in that year, presided at the memorable meeting of the merchants, bankers, and traders of the City of London, held for the purpose of declaring their attachment to the British Constitution, as established in 1688, in opposition to the republican principles of the French Revolution. This eminent banker died in 1806, leaving, by Eleanor his wife, daughter of Henry Lanney Hunter, Esq., three sons: Samuel, of the Forest House, Essex, and of Dingestow, co. Monmouth; Charles, of the Rock, Northumberland; and John-Bernard, the learned Judge whose death we record. His Lordship married, in 1804, Mary Anne, eldest daughter of Richard Lewis, Esq., of Llantilio Crossenny, and had one son, Lewis Bernard, who predeceased his father, without issue. Sir John Bernard Bosanquet died on the 25th ultimo, at his seat, The Firs, Hampstead.

MADAME ALBERTAZZI.

This favourite vocalist, whose maiden name was Howson, was born in 1814, and was placed by her father, a teacher of music, under Signor A. Costa, where she met with M. Albertazzi, to whom she was married at the early age of fifteen. After residing abroad for several years, she made her début at her Majesty's Theatre, the 19th April, 1837, in Rossini's "Cenerentola," and was highly successful. She sung frequently at the Ancient and Philharmonic Concerts, and in 1840, she was engaged at Drury Lane. She last year sung at the Princess' Theatre, but, in consequence of indisposition, her voice frequently failed her, and, at length, she was obliged to relinquish all her dramatic engagements. Madame Albertazzi's voice was a mezzo-soprano, inclining to the contralto, of a very extensive compass; and her style of singing, when in her zenith, was of the florid school. The manner of her execution of "Non più mesta," on her appearance at the Italian Opera, created a perfect sensation; audiences were in raptures, and the press was loud in her praise. Madame Albertazzi died on the 30th ultimo, at her residence in St. John's Wood, aged thirty-three, after a lingering illness, which ended in rapid consumption. She leaves a husband and family to lament her loss.

RIOTING AT MILAN.

Letters from Milan of the 10th ult. state that after the festivities which took place on Sunday the 5th, on the occasion of the solemn entry of M. Romilli, it was proposed to renew the rejoicings and illumination on the 8th, the festival of the Virgin. A grand illumination in gas was prepared on the Fontana-square, under the windows of the Archbishop's palace. The new pastor was greeted by reiterated acclamation in the commencement of the afternoon. Towards ten o'clock some young men began to cry, Viva Pio IX! and wished to chant the Pope's Hymn, which the Austrian police had forbidden. The police guards having been excited by a commissary named Count Bolza, a Milanese generally disliked at Milan, rushed in a brutal manner on the persons who were singing, and struck them with the flat side of their sabres. The people, exasperated by such conduct, attacked the police, and much confusion ensued. The guards withdrew into the court of Bishop's palace, and that prelate having exhorted the people to remain tranquil, the disturbance ceased.

On the 9th, the police having been informed that a crowd was to proceed that afternoon to Fontana-square, and that a species of conspiracy was arranged to attack and take revenge on the guard wherever they could be found, determined to put a stop to the disturbance. Milan was consequently, occupied by a large military force. Strong detatchments of infantry and cavalry were posted in the principal streets. Several arrests were made, and many civilians were ill-treated by the soldiers. At the hour of the mail, much excitement prevailed amongst the population, and it was feared that serious disturbance would ensue; happily, however, these fears have not been verified by the subsequent accounts from Milan.

THE EMPEROR OF AUSTRIA.

The present excited state of Italy indicating—at least, as is the hope and belief of the British people—that the hour so long desired of the political regeneration of that fair land, is at hand; and the different attitudes assumed in so trying a crisis by her various rulers, invest those Royal personages with a passing interest, which renders a few observations respecting the personnel of the more conspicuous of them not untimely.

Foremost among the Italian dynasties, as well from the influence wielded, as from the extent of territory possessed by it, in the Peninsula, the reigning House of Austria presents itself. There are few of the Royal Families of Europe, after the Bourbon, that can boast a right Royal lineage of prouder prestige, or more ancient distinction than the Imperial House of Hapsburgh. Its founder, as far as Imperial Sovereignty is concerned, was Rudolph, Count of Hapsburgh, or Habsburgh, a domain on the banks of the Aar, in modern Switzerland, who was descended, on the male side, from the once powerful House of Alsatian Landgrave. He was born in the year 1218, and having, by the death of his uncle, in 1264, succeeded to the possession of a large tract of territory, including the greater portion of the modern cantons of Aargau, Berne, Lucerne, Zurich, Zug, &c., he displayed such administrative talents and wisdom in his extended sphere of Sovereignty, that he secured the friendship of the powerful Werner, Archbishop of Mainz, who saw in him qualities which he deemed worthy of the Imperial Throne of the West; and, accordingly, when the period of the election which was to elevate some one of the Princes of the Empire to the dignity of the Purple arrived, the Imperial diadem of the Cæsars was, through the influence of the potent Churchman, notwithstanding the opposition of Ottocar, King of Bohemia, conferred on Rudolph by the Electors at Frankfurt, anno Domini 1273. He was immediately afterwards crowned King of the Romans, at Aix-la-Chapelle, and his election to the Imperial dignity being acknowledged by the then Pope, Gregory X, he became at once firmly established in the power and authority of Emperor of the West. The successors of Rudolph improved on the good fortune of their great progenitor, and added not a little to his wide domains, as is evidenced in the style and title of the present representative of the Imperial House—viz., Ferdinand (I.)-Charles-Leopold-Joseph-Francis-Marcellin, Emperor of Austria, King of Hungary and of Bohemia, King of Lombardy and of Venice, of Dalmatia, Croatia, Sclavonia, Galicia, Lodomeria, and Illyria. He is son of the late Emperor Francis I., by his second Empress, Maria-Theresa-Caroline-Josephine, daughter of the late Ferdinand I., King of the Two Sicilies; and was born the 19th of April, 1793. He was crowned King of Hungary, Sept. 28, 1830; King of Bohemia, Sept. 7, 1836; King of Lombardy and Venice, Sept. 6, 1838; and succeeded his father on the Imperial Throne, March 2, 1835. Married, Feb. 27, 1831, Maria-Anna-Caroline-Pia (born Sept. 19, 1803), daughter of the late Victor-Emmanuel, King of Sardinia.

The present Emperor presents a wide contrast, in intellectual capacity and energy, to the illustrious founder of his race—Rudolph. He is, in fact, little better than a faineant Sovereign, of the true type of the old French Monarchs, being a mere puppet in the hands of the wily, narrow-minded Metternich, who, in our day, reproduces in perfection the character of the maire du palais of long past times.

THE KING OF SARDINIA.

The House of Savoy, to whom the sovereignty of the Sardinian States belongs, has been for ages remarkable for the able rulers it has furnished to North-Western Italy; and the present representative of that illustrious family, King Charles-Albert, forms no exception to the general character of the Princes of his Royal line. By their personal ability and exertions they have united into a consistent whole the various and heterogeneous parts which constitute the Sardinian Monarchy, and have infused into the different populations a degree of national spirit, which could be scarcely expected where no natural bond of common nationality existed.

Much obscurity hangs over the origin of the House of Savoy. By some it has been derived from Witikind, the great Saxon Chief, and opponent of Charlemagne; by others from Adelbert, son and colleague of Berengarius II., Marquis of Ivrea and King of Italy. The first historical member of the line, with respect to whom all authorities are agreed, is Humbert "of the White Hands," Count of Maurienne, son of a great feudal Lord in the kingdom of Burgundy, Berthold who lived about the commencement of the eleventh century. Humbert, in recompense for the valour and talents which he had displayed in the German armies, received from Conrad, Emperor of the West and King of Burgundy, the investiture of the territories of Chablais and Valais. He died about the year 1048, and was succeeded by his eldest son, Amadeus, who, dying shortly afterwards, left his father's inheritance, viz., Savoy, Maurienne, and Valais, to his brother Otho, who, by his marriage with Adelaide of Susa, the daughter and heiress of Manfred, Count of Turin and Marquis of Italy, acquired the territories of Susa, Turin, Pignerol, &c., as far as the Po, and became master of the principal passes of the Western Alps, including those of Mont Cenis and Mont Genevre; the Great and Little St. Bernard, with the valley of Aosta, being already within his Burgundian jurisdiction. Otho died about the year 1060, and was succeeded by his son Amadeus II. This is the trunk of the official genealogy adopted by the House of Savoy.

The present King, Charles-Albert-Amadeus, is of the younger branch of the House of Savoy, being descended from Thomas-Francis, Prince of Carignano, brother to Victor-Amadeus I., who succeeded his father, Charles-Emmanuel I., in the kingdom, on his decease in July, 1630. The late King, Charles-Felix, dying without issue, in April, 1831, the elder branch became extinct, and the Crown devolved upon the Prince of Carignano Charles-Albert the reigning King. He was born in October 1798, and succeeded, on the death of his father, in August, 1800, to the possessions of Savoy-Carignano; he married, in 1817, Maria-Theresa-Frances, daughter of Ferdinand, the late Grand Duke of Tuscany, and has issue, the Prince Royal Victor-Emmanuel, Duke of Savoy, and Prince Ferdinand-Mary-Albert, Duke of Genoa; the former, married in 1842, to the Archduchess Maria-Adelaide, daughter of Renier, Archduke of Austria, has several children.

Charles-Albert has shown himself, in many respects, a liberal and enlightened monarch, and a friend to progress. He has introduced several useful reforms in the administration of his kingdom, and in the municipal and judicial systems. He is a great promoter of historical studies, and has caused a collection to be formed of old chronicles, charters, diplomas, and other valuable documents of the middle ages, the first volume of which has been published in folio, under the title of "Monumenta Historiæ Patriæ Scriptorum."

If, as is generally expected, he will stand firm by the Pope, in opposing the schemes and encroachments of Austria in Italy, a death-blow will be struck, in that country at least, to the oppressive system of that despotic power.

The possessions of the King of Sardinia comprise—1. The Duchy of Savoy; 2. The Principality of Piedmont; 3. The Duchy of Genoa; 4. The County of Nizza; and 5. The Island of Sardinia.

EMEUTE IN THE CORSO DEI SERVI, AT MILAN.—(SEE PRECEDING PAGE.)

DEPARTURE OF SIR HARRY SMITH FOR THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

DEPARTURE OF SIR HARRY SMITH FOR THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

Every incident connected with this gallant hero, since his arrival in England, has been so anxiously sought after, that we have thought the departure of the veteran for another sphere of action, a fit subject to commemorate by illustration.

Our Sketch of Sir Harry Smith embarking at Portsmouth, for the Cape of Good Hope, is taken at the time the hero is turning round in the barge which conveyed him to the Lightning steamer, to acknowledge the parting salutations of the thousands who crowded the Victoria Pier, and the walls and beaches adjacent, on the morning of Thursday week.

In the barge with the veteran were his lady, nephew, brother, and a few private friends of all, who were anxious to accompany him to the ship destined to convey him to the Cape.

On this occasion, the Victoria Pier, the Platform Battery, and the beach on either side the harbour, were crowded with military and civilians, anxious to testify their respect for the worth and renown of the great soldier.

At twelve o'clock, precisely, Sir Harry left the George Hotel, where he had been located during his stay in Portsmouth, in the carriage of Lord Frederick Fitzclarence; and, amidst the plaudits of the congregated inhabitants of the three towns of Portsmouth, Portsea, and Gosport, proceeded to the Victoria Pier, on which his old friends, comrades in arms, and a brilliant assemblage of ladies and gentry, were collected. Here, also, were the combined bands of the Royal Marines, the 32nd and 43rd Light Infantry: the former greeted Sir Harry as he passed by the most hearty cheers and waving of handkerchiefs, and the latter struck up "See the Conquering Hero Comes." The noble old soldier could only bow his thanks uncovered, his heart being evidently too full for utterance; but, the tear in the eye, and the firm squeeze of friendship, when the palm was held out, told what the lips failed to utter. On entering the barge, the bands played "Should Auld Acquaintance be Forgot." One combined tremendous cheer from the hundreds on the pier, conveyed the wishes of the throng for the safety and welfare of the brave Sir Harry, which cheer was quickly caught up by the men on Blockhouse Fort, on the Gosport shore, the Round Tower, the Platform, and beach, and the spectators who everywhere crowded the walls of the garrison; and, with this unanimous burst of heartfelt approbation, did he quit his native shores, and embark in the Lightning steamer, which immediately got under way, and put her illustrious freight on board the Vernon Indiaman, at Spithead, which fired a salute of 17 guns.

On Thursday, the ship sailed from Spithead, but did not finally lose sight of that anchorage till the following night.

Our Artist has sketched the scene from the Platform at Portsmouth, at the moment of the boat being pushed from the Victoria Pier. The large building on the left is Haslar Hospital; in the centre is Blockhouse Fort, with the new Round Tower, lately added to it; on the right of the Fort is the entrance to the Harbour, with the York convict hulk, and Gosport in the distance. The old Round Tower, and the Batteries connected with it, are also shown in the view

SHRIMPING.

The locality chosen by Mr. Duncan for his Illustration of this minor British Fishery, is on the sands at the mouth of the Thames, off "The Bligh," where he shows us several "Barleymen," busy shrimping in their hatch-boats—such as may often be seen off Southend, Gravesand, and Northfleet. The scene abounds with the characteristic spirit of the Artist's pencil, and forms by no means the least interesting of his illustrations of "The British Fisheries;" though we believe, strictly speaking, it is not usual to apply the term "fishery" to the taking of the Shrimp, delicious crustacean though it be.

THANKSGIVING FOR THE ABUNDANT HARVEST.—The Gazette of last night contains a Royal Proclamation, ordering Sunday, the 17th day of October, to be set apart as a Day of Thanksgiving for the abundant harvest.

STOPPAGE OF RAILWAY CALLS.—A public meeting of the merchants, bankers, and traders of Manchester took place on Thursday, at the Town Hall, at the instance of many of the leading firms in the town, "to consider whether any and what steps can be taken in order to limit the drain upon the floating capital of the nation, occasioned by continued railway calls, and to diminish the pressure which is now so injuriously affecting the trade of the district." This Chairman was Elkanah Armitage, Esq. Mr. Thomas Bazley, President of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, proposed a resolution, to the effect that, owing to the failure in the potato crop, and the general deficiency of the harvest of the year 1846, there was not sufficient available capital to meet the demands now made for railway purposes. The resolution was seconded by Mr. Alexander Ireland, and was unanimously agreed to. Another resolution, deprecating any attempt to carry out, at present, the large number of railway projects sanctioned by the Legislature because to do so would be to increase the derangement of our monetary affairs—was carried without any dissentient. A resolution was then proposed, recommending all railway Companies to defer commencing new works, and was also agreed to.

ITALY.

Letters from Naples, of the 21st ult., give information calculated to allay the gloomy forebodings in regard to that city. It was stated on good authority that the King of Naples has resolved to grant a general amnesty to all insurgents who shall immediately lay down their arms; and, in order to establish the tranquility of the kingdom on a more sure and permanent basis, has determined to effect in the Government numerous administrative reforms. The Minister, Pietra Catella, is ordered to prepare a project in accordance with these designs.

Another gratifying circumstance is, that an agreement has been entered into between the Pope and the Austrian Government, respecting the occupation of Ferrara. The Pope stipulates that that town shall not have a National Guard, and that its garrison shall consist not of citizens of the Roman States, but Swiss.

The present at Leghorn has not subsided. The civic guard, instead of the police, who were hostile to reform, and probably instigated by Austrian influence, having, on the night of the 20th ult., attacked a group of young men whose liberal opinions were well known, the population of the city rose and compelled the police to leave the town. After being further excited, the people proceeded to arrest a number of persons charged with being opposed to reform and progress, to the number of about fifty. These disorders caused the local authorities to call out the National Guard, and to issue a proclamation, which had the effect of restoring tranquility.

NORWAY

A letter from Christiana (Norway) relates that on the 11th ult., between four and five in the afternoon, the immense rock which hung over the vast domain of Hielmigrund, and which for several days had been split in many places, came suddenly down and covered an immense space, crushing beneath its weight 34 dwelling-houses and their inhabitants, estimated at 230 in number. Attempts were immediately made for their release, but they were labouring for a week, when the latter was written, only two bodies had been reached—one of a woman, and the other of a child, seven years old, both lifeless. Only 13 of the inhabitants of the place have escaped this tremendous disaster, which has occasioned a loss of property estimated at £32,000.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

ELECTION OF LORD MAYOR.

Wednesday being Michaelmas Day, the election of Lord Mayor for the ensuing year took place at the Guildhall.

Shortly after seven o'clock the Lord Mayor arrived, accompanied by a large number of Aldermen, the Sheriffs, Under-Sheriffs, and other City functionaries, and immediately proceeded to attend divine service at St. Lawrence Jewry, where a sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Cobbold, chaplain to the Lord Mayor, from the 10th verse of the 4th chapter of the First Epistle of Peter, "As any man hath received the gift, even so minister the same to another, as good stewards of the manifold grace of God."

Shortly after one o'clock they returned to the Guildhall, when the Lord Mayor took the chair. There was a good deal of cheering for Mr. Alderman Wood, but with that exception there was no demonstration of feeling.

After the usual formalities and an address from the Recorder, the Common Sergeant proposed the names of the Aldermen in rotation, and subsequently announced that Sheriffs Graham and Carter had been elected, and Messrs. J. K. Hooper, Esq., Alderman and Vintner and Sir James Duke, Knt., Alderman and apostable maker.

The Mayor and Aldermen then withdrew to the Court of Aldermen, and after the absence of a few minutes they returned, and—

The Recorder announced that they had selected Mr. Alderman Hooper, citizen and vintner, to fill the office of Lord Mayor for the ensuing year.

The announcement was received with loud cheers.

Mr. Alderman Hooper then briefly addressed the livery, returning his sincere and heartfelt thanks for the honour which had been conferred on him in returning him to the high and distinguished position of Chief Magistrate of the City of London. It only remained for him to assure them that in accepting the office they had conferred upon him, he would endeavour to discharge its responsibilities, and that he should use his best abilities to enable him properly to discharge the duties. None of the rights and hospitalities pertaining to the office of Lord Mayor which he had been elected should suffer any diminution, and the rights and privileges of London should be respected and preserved in his hands.

Votes of thanks to the late Sheriffs, and also to the Lord Mayor, were agreed to.

SWEARING IN OF THE SHERIFFS OF LONDON AND MIDDLESEX.

A Common Hall was held on Tuesday, for the purpose of swearing William Cubitt, Esq., citizen and fishmonger, and Charles Hill, Esq., citizen and spectacle-maker, into the office of Sheriffs of London and Middlesex for the ensuing year. Sir Thomas Farebrother has been appointed Under-Sheriff to William Cubitt, Esq., and Mr. D. W. Wire, Under-Sheriff to Charles Hill, Esq. The Lord Mayor, the Sheriffs, the late Sheriffs, and several members of the Corporation, partook of a splendid breakfast at Fishmongers' Hall, and afterwards proceeded in state to Guildhall. On their arrival, shortly after one o'clock, the usual ceremony of administering the oaths and investing the new Sheriffs with gold chains and other insignia of office was performed. A vote of thanks was given to the late Sheriffs, Mr. Alderman Challis and Mr. Kennard, who briefly returned thanks. Headed by the Lord Mayor and the usual functionaries, the civic party returned to the Council-Chamber, where the assignment of the prisoners in custody in the City prison was made in due form by the late Sheriffs to their successors, and thus the proceedings terminated.

The newly elected Sheriffs were on Thursday, agreeably to ancient custom, presented to the Curator Baron (G. Bankes, Esq.,) in the Court of Exchequer, and received in the usual form her Majesty's approbation of the choice the Livery of London had made.

The Recorder introduced the new Sheriffs to the Curator Baron in a very complimentary speech; and also passed high encomiums on the late Sheriffs, Aldermen Challis and Mr. Kennard), for the satisfactory and courteous manner in which they had performed the arduous duties of their office.

The usual ceremony of counting six horse-shoes and sixty-one hob-nails, and chopping two bundles of sticks (in pursuance of which custom the Corporation of London hold certain estates in Shropshire), was then performed by the senior Aldermen who had not passed the chair.

THE ANTI-GOLD LAW LEAGUE.—A meeting, having for object the formation of an association with the above title, to promote monetary reform, took place on Wednesday evening, at Anderton's Hotel, Fleet-street. The chair was taken by Mr Bannes. Mr. Stoddart moved, and Mr. Cockburn seconded, a resolution to the effect that the currency of the realm should consist of Exchequer notes of the amount of £1 and upwards, such notes to be issued with the consent of Parliament, to the amount of the sum of the bullion now held in the country, or by the Government in liquidation of their current expenses, and thus to become a legal tender. The resolution also provided for the establishment of a bullion office where gold and silver should be received, and paid for in bullion notes, such notes to rise or fall in value according to the fluctuations of the Exchange. This resolution gave rise to a long but rather rambling discussion upon the currency question generally, and opposition being manifested to the resolution, it was withdrawn. Another resolution, however, proposing the formation of a league, but without pledging the meeting to any particular plan, was carried.

SANATORY IMPROVEMENTS IN THE METROPOLIS. At a Court of Common Council, held on Tuesday, Mr. R. L. Jones brought up a report from the Committee appointed to effect Sanatory Improvements in the City. The Committee detailed the steps which had been taken to remedy bad sewage, and to improve ventilation, and stated that the Commissioners had agreed to recommend the Court to apply to Parliament in the next session for an act to amend and extend their present powers, with such additional powers as are necessary to meet the public requirements, and had directed a bill to be prepared for these purposes, which bill, when ready, would be reported to the Court.—Mr. Anderton said, he had never heard any report read in that Court which had given to him anything like the gratification he felt at the document which had just been read, and he was convinced the public would entertain just the same opinion. It was calculated to show that, whatever the general opinion might be with respect to the ideas of the citizens of London, as to sanatory reform, the Corporation were determined to do everything in their power to accomplish so great an object. There were two detestable nuisances, which required their active and immediate exertions the interment of the dead within the City of London, and the execrable atmosphere of smoke. (Hear, hear.) Towards the latter the last attempt at abatement was abolished by Act of Parliament, had been long afflicted by it, and were now enjoying all the advantages of a salubrious atmosphere, while London seemed to be the arena in which it was deemed to flourish without check or restraint of any kind (Hear, hear.) The report was unanimously agreed to

DISCOVERY OF OLD COIN IN ST. GILES'S.—On Tuesday a number of gold and silver coins, of the reigns of Henry VII. and VIII., and several spade guineas and gold seven-shilling pieces, were found by some labourers removing the ruins of some old houses that recently fell down in Dudley-court, St. Giles's. The coins are in a fine state of preservation, particularly the guineas of George III., and were purchased for a mere trifle by a clothesman, who happened to come up whilst the labourers were examining them, and before they had had time to ascertain their actual value

BIRTHS AND DEATHS IN THE METROPOLIS.—The total number of births during the week ending September 25th, was 1260, of which 635 were males and 625 females. This number exceeds by 98 that of the preceding week. The number of deaths was 1023 (498 males, and 504 females); this number exceeds the weekly average by 119, and is less than the number of the preceding week by 177. Twenty-two deaths from small pox occurred. None of the persons who died had been vaccinated.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE BRIGHTON RAILWAY.—On Monday (last week) an inquest touching the death of J. W. Carter, at the Railway Tavern, New Cross, and to the death of James Griffiths, aged thirty-seven, a fireman on the Croydon line of railway. William Mitchell, also a fireman belonging to the company, stated that, on Thursday morning last, about seven o'clock, he was on the platform at the station at New Cross, Deptford, and the deceased was at his engine, which was going to Croydon, trimming his buffer lamps. He was quite well and sober. About ten minutes before the train crossed one of the lines, apparently to go to a shed on the other side, when at that instant the Brighton express train came down from London, and the engine struck the deceased and knocked him down on one of the side tables. The train was going at the rate of forty miles an hour, and did not stop. Upon going to the deceased, he was lying doubled up, and his face covered with blood. He was quite dead. He had been in the employ of the company about two years, and had taught to have known the Brighton express train would be down; but he must have forgotten it, as it arrived at its proper time, but no whistle was blown. Mr. Anderson, the station-master, said that the deceased had a fracture on the top of the skull, and another on the forehead, which no doubt caused his death. The line was quite clear at the time, and there was no occasion for the whistle to be sounded; and as the steam was blowing off the deceased's engine, he probably did not hear the train coming. Verdict, "Accidental Death."

SERIOUS COLLISION ON THE SOUTH WESTERN RAILWAY.—Last Saturday morning, about four o'clock, a serious collision occurred between the up-mail train and a portion of the goods train, which resulted in the destruction of three or four of the trucks of the goods train, and the loss of life of one of the guards of that train. The occurrence took place about three hundred yards on the London side of the Wimbledon station, at a spot which, from its low and marshy situation, is favourable to fogs, one of which prevailed at the time. The up goods train, an unusually long and heavy one, consisted of a Nine Elms ballast-box between three and four o'clock, but when it arrived at the above spot, the carriages came uncoupled, the engine proceeding on with about three-fourths of the train, and leaving nine or ten trucks or vans behind. In one of those left behind was one of the guards, named W. Sawyer, who is supposed to have been asleep. At nearly four o'clock the metropolitan police on duty near the railway heard a loud crash in the direction of the line, followed by shrieks and cries of human beings. Sergeant Golding, 30 V, and a body of constables, were soon on the spot, and having roused up the station agent, policeman, and porter, who were in bed, they hastened to the scene of the accident, when it was found that the up mail-train, which consisted of nine carriages, propelled by the Hornet, a very powerful engine, had run on upon the vans and trucks with such velocity and force as to almost double up and crush in the end and two following ones, and strew the line with fragments. Neither the Hornet engine, the driver, the fireman, nor the guards and passengers were injured; but the under guard, (William Sawyer) was found bent double against a chest, with a load of goods bearing him down. The poor fellow had evidently made desperate struggles to extricate himself, but was unable to do so, and was crushed to death. He deceased had been a guard about twelve months, and was twenty years of age. Fortunately he was unmarried. At the inquest, the Jury returned a verdict of "Accidental Death."

DEATH FROM READING IN BED.—On Saturday morning, at a quarter before three o'clock, loud cries of "Fire" were heard to proceed from the house of Mrs. A. J. Pochin, a lady of property, situate at No. 17, Lower Seymour-street. The police on duty soon entered the house, when the whole of the bedding and drapery in the second floor front were found in a blaze. The engines having arrived, the firemen set to work, and succeeded in getting the masses of the flames out, but unfortunately, not until Mrs Pochin was so frightfully burned that the flesh upon some portions of her body when touched peeled off. A medical gentleman was promptly in attendance, who did everything that the nature of the case required, but so seriously was she burned that she died on Monday morning. The premises and furniture were considerably damaged by fire and heat.

An inquest was held on Tuesday. The evidence was to the effect that the deceased had been in the constant habit of reading in bed by means of an unguarded candle placed on a table by her bedside. Her maid saw her safe in bed a little after eleven on Saturday night, and about the next succeeding hour was alarmed by the violent ringing of the bedroom bell. She hastened to answer it, and discovered the room to be on fire, but was unable to enter it, on account of the door being bolted on the inside. All the witnesses attributed the fire to the deceased. The Coroner (Mr. Wakley) commented on the danger of reading in bed, particularly on the part of aged and feeble persons, and said the practice was invariably attended, sooner or later, by fatal consequences. Verdict—"Accidental Death."

SUPPOSED MURDER OF A MARRIED WOMAN. An adjourned inquest was held on Monday night, at the Green Man, public-house, Poplar, before Mr. W. Baker, jun., respecting the death of Mrs. Eliza Rayment, aged 36 years, a married woman, who was found drowned in the River Thames on the 17th ult., with her throat cut. The case is at present involved in great mystery, and the police have been actively engaged in endeavouring to discover whom she was last seen, but without success. Mr Bain, a surgeon, said he had made a post mortem examination of the body, which was very much decomposed, and appeared to have been in the water some time. There was a large quantity of extraneous matter on various parts of the scalp on the right side of the head, which could only have been caused during her life-time. There was a wound under the chin, about four inches in length. The wound was about an inch in depth, and the important arteries were divided. The division of the arteries would cause an immediate and great loss of blood. It was possible that the deceased might have inflicted such an injury, but a person using the right hand would not naturally make the incision on the left hand side. He (Mr. Bain) attributed death to the loss of blood from the wound, coupled with concussion of the brain, which is likely to have taken place from the effusion of blood upon the brain. The Jury returned a verdict of "Found drowned with her throat cut, but by what means there was no evidence before the said Jury."

SUICIDE.—Mrs. Rayner, landlady of the Red Lion, Great Wild-street, Lincoln's Inn, on Thursday poisoned herself. She had had words with her husband, and was heard to make a remark about killing herself. Being missed, a search was made, when the unfortunate woman was discovered in her bedroom in a dreadful state, having taken essential oil of lemons. Medical assistance was sent for, but it was of no avail, as she shortly after expired.

DEATH OF A LADY FROM STARVATION. An inquest was held on Tuesday evening, at the Wheatsheaf public-house, Strand, before Mr. Higgs, on the body of Cecilia Maria Watkins, aged sixty-four. The body lay at No. 42, Holywell-street, in a room containing no more furniture than an old sofa and two broken chairs. The deceased, as appeared from the evidence, had been for some time only connected, and, for three years previous to July last, kept a lodging-house in Howard-street, Strand. The last year of her residence in Howard-street, she was in the deepest distress; all her furniture was seized for rent. She would often have been without food for days, if it had not been for the kindness of one of her friends, Mrs. Longmore, of No. 35, Arundel street. She was, besides, very reluctant to make her wants known. In July, she removed to No. 42, Holywell-street, and there continued to live upon the charity of her friends, and a little money which had been sent to her by her brother, a clergyman, and one of the minor canons at Chichester, and an allowance she received for rent. Her husband, Solomon. On Friday (last week) one of her friends found her at home without any food, and only 1½d. in money at her disposal. This, and more that was given her, was expended in food and fuel, but the deceased was then so ill that she could not leave her bed, and on Sunday morning last was found dead. Mr. Farquhar, surgeon, said that the cause of death was pulmonary consumption, accelerated by want of proper sustenance and attention. Had she been found some letters, showing that she had recently received post-office orders from her brother, who had also arranged to make her a regular allowance, but it was believed that she expended the money in pawning her clothes. Had she could not leave her bed, and on Sunday morning last was found dead. Mr. Farquhar, surgeon, said that the cause of death was pulmonary consumption, accelerated by want of proper sustenance and attention. Had she been found some letters, showing that she had recently received post-office orders from her brother, who had also arranged to make her a regular allowance, but it was believed that she expended the money in pawning her clothes. Verdict—"Died from disease of the lungs, accelerated by want of sufficient sustenance ACCIDENTAL DEATH OF MR. WALTER, OF THE POPLAR.—An inquest was held on Wednesday, at the Red Lion, William Carter, Esq., at the Purley Oaks Station, Sandhurst, near Croydon, the residence of Mr. John Walker, as to the death of Mr. Richard Walter, aged fifty, for many years the landlord of the King's Head Tavern, in the Poultry.—W. Turner Lewis, a servant in the employ of Mr. John Walter, stated that on Friday evening (last week) the deceased left his master's, the Purley Oaks Farm, about ten o'clock, as witness supposed to return to town. The horse which he was riding was steady, and the deceased perfectly sober Witness went out afterwards near the Castle, when he saw a horse with a bridle and saddle on in a deep gravel pit. There was a road cut of which they had been drawing the gravel, and he went round by it to get the horse out. While he was in the act of getting the horse out he saw a gentleman lying by the side of a ditch in the road, with his head doubled up under his shoulder. The deceased, who seemed quite dead, was conveyed to his brother's house. Mr. Bincastle, of Croydon, surgeon, gave his opinion that the deceased had fallen from the horse, and that concussion of the brain had been caused, which produced death. A verdict of "Accidental Death" was returned.

ALARMING ACCIDENT ON THE EDINBURGH AND GLASGOW RAILWAY.—About half-past one o'clock last Tuesday morning an accident of a most serious nature occurred at the Queen-street terminus, Glasgow, of the above railway line. A luggage-train from Edinburgh, on coming down the incline from the Cowlairs Station, acquired such a velocity, while passing through the tunnel, that the men stationed at the breaks had not sufficient power to arrest its progress. The train, with the fearful momentum it had acquired, penetrated about fifty feet into one of the railway company's stores, situated above the Star Hotel, bringing down, in its headlong career, a thick stone gable and two stone partitions, and entering into two of the offices connected with the store. A scene of ruin here presented itself; three breaks, with a number of trucks, lying piled above one another, and covered with the stones of the gables and partitions, and the beams, rafters, and flooring of the storehouse, were lying together in one mingled mass. There were four or five men on the trucks at the time; three escaped with their lives, although two of them are severely injured, and two are still missing, one of whom, James Macarthur, a married man, was seen on the forenoon break immediately before the collision took place; and there can be little doubt that he has met his death among the rubbish. One of the guards leaped off the train as it emerged from the tunnel, and escaped with a slight cut on the head and a few bruises; the other two who have been found were lying among the ruins senseless, covered with large stones, but recovered in about twenty minutes after, so far as to be able to speak. They are both very severely bruised.

A WOMAN KILLED BY HER HUSBAND NEAR MANCHESTER.—On Saturday evening last, a woman named Eliza Crawley, living at No. 6, Swallow's-court, Davies-street, Ancoats, went home much intoxicated. Her husband, who was sitting by the fire getting his tea, reproached her with not having been at home to get tea ready for himself and their children. A quarrel ensued between them, in the course of which the husband desired his wife to hold her tongue; she refused and made faces at him. He then thrusted at her knock her off the chair if she made faces at him, to which she tauntingly replied, "Do then." He immediately jumped up as if with the intention of striking his wife. A neighbour who had been looking on during the quarrel, then interposed, and took hold of his arm, in order to prevent him hitting his wife; in this, however, she was only partially successful, as the hand of the husband in descending, grazed the temple of his wife. He then kicked his wife on the body; she screamed violently, and fell bleeding to the ground. The husband, who seemed struck with remorse at having ill-used his wife the moment he had done so, then took her up and laid her on a sofa, saying, "Oh, Eliza, how I hurt thee?" She replied, "Be off with thee; I don't want thee." As she was apparently in great pain, and crying out for a doctor, her husband set off for one, before doing which, however, he again went to look his wife and told her how sorry he was for what he had done. Some medical men were promptly in attendance, and did everything in their power for the unfortunate woman, who, however, sank gradually from the effect of the blow she had received, and consequent loss of blood, and died in about three-quarters of an hour after its infliction. A Coroner's Jury have since returned a verdict of "Manslaughter' against Crawley.

BANK OF ENGLAND.—The Special Court of Proprietors convened for the purpose of electing three Directors in the room of Abel Gower and Sir J. R. Reid, disqualified, and of Mr. Prescott, who has been appointed Deputy-Governor, was held on Wednesday. At four o'clock the ballot terminated in favour of the gentlemen recommended in the "house list," viz., Mr. Alderman Thompson, Mr. Christopher Pearse, and Mr. John G. Hubbard.

FESTIVITIES AT KNOWSLEY.

THE fine old Hall and picturesque Park of Knowsley, about six miles distant from Liverpool, have just been the scene of "loud festivity," in celebration of a most important and gratifying event, connected with the Derby family, namely, the coming of age of the Earl of Derby's grandson the Hon. Edward Henry [illegible]. The young nobleman is the eldest son of Lord Stanley, and attained [illegible] entry on the 21st of July last.

"The invitations for the fête extended," says the Liverpool Mercury, "not only to the more immediate friends of the head of the House of Knowsley, but embraced within their range a numerous party of noblemen and gentlemen, of rank and influence, resident at a distance. Really to describe the splendid and costly dinner parties and balls, a variety of athletic games and old English sports, in which the village rustics might engage, were provided; and all, from the highest to the lowest, were thus enabled to take a part in the joyous proceedings, and render the event what it was intended to be—a general jubilee. The like sity displayed at the Hall was such as to bring forcibly to the mind the universal hospitalities of the olden times, in which the 'Lord of the Castle' and the 'Ladye faire' were wont to take so auspicious a part."

The Festivities commenced on Monday, with a sumptuous banquet in the grand dining-room of the Hall. There were about forty guests, the Earl of Derby presiding. On his Lordship's right and left, sat Lord and Lady Stanley, the Hon. Mr Stanley (eldest son of Lord Stanley), and Lord Skelmersdale, the maternal grandfather of the youthful hero. Amongst others present, were also Lord Clive, Lord Anson, Colonel Stanley, the Earl of Wilton, the Hon. Mrs. Wodehram, Lady Hopwood, Mr. Penrhyn and Lady Charlotte Penrhyn, Admiral Hornby, Colonel Hornby, &

Early on Tuesday morning, the bells of all the neighbouring churches commenced ringing merry peals, flags were also hoisted on the church towers, and displayed from the roadside inns; which rendered the scene one of great animation. Several of the noblemen and gentlemen at the Hall, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, passed the morning in shooting in the Park, but Lord Stanley and the Earl of Wilton were not of the party. The cricket match was postponed, owing to the unfavourable weather. In the evening, there was a grand dinner at the Hall, to about seventy guests; when the display of gold and silver plate, and the profusion of delicacies, was very great

On Wednesday, an excellent dinner was given to the labourers and dependants connected with the Knowsley estate, at which their wives and children were also invited. The place appropriated to this purpose was a spacious tent, or marquee, erected on the lawn in front of the Hall. It was covered with striped calico, and extended 320 feet by 40 in breadth. The dinner was served on three long tables, subdivided so as to admit of 32 dishes on each. The bill of fare consisted of 37 rounds of roast beef, 15 ditto boiled ditto, 15 legs of mutton, 30 ornamental pies, 15 pieces boiled beef, 70 plum puddings, 35 suet ditto, 15 suet puddings, 26 Yorkshire ditto, 78 dishes of potatoes, 26 ditto greens, 26 ditto turnips, 26 ditto carrots. About 758 individuals partook of this substantial repast. Mr. Hamilton Gell, steward, and the able direction of Mr. Newberry, the Earl of Derby's principal Steward. Lord Stanley was present, with his son, the Hon. E. H Stanley, and the Earl of Sefton; and the Rev. H. Hopwood, and the band of the latter regiment stationed outside the tent.

After dinner, the cups were filled with some of the Stanley ale, (seventeen years old,) brewed expressly to celebrate the important occasion, when Captain Hornby proposed the health of the host in the name of Stanley. The Honorable Edward Henry Stanley. It was received with three times three and one cheer more, and drunk with the greatest enthusiasm. The Hon. E. H. Stanley returned thanks in a few words, and proposed the health of the Earl of Sefton mounted the centre table, and proposed the healths of the Earl of Derby and Lord Stanley. The toast was drunk with tumultuous applause, the band, in the mean time, striking up the appropriate air of the "Old English Gentleman." After the excitement had in some measure subsided, Lord Stanley rose and returned thanks, and concluded by drinking the healths of all the company present in a bumper of the Stanley ale, which he completely drained, and inverted the cup in a very significant manner, to show that he had done ample justice to the toast. The Earl of Derby was then drawn through the tent in an easy chair, amid the most boisterous plaudits. His Lordship bowed repeatedly to the numerous party by which he was surrounded, and appeared to feel deeply the congratulations showered upon him.

The company now adjourned to the lawn in front of the hall, where they amused themselves with cricket, foot-ball, and rustic sports, in which Lord Stanley, and many of the distinguished guests who were with him, took a prominent part. The old English sports were of the usual character, including pig races, climbing, &c.; the most amusing of the latter feats was a stout competition for a shoulder of mutton, a joint of beef, and a purse containing 10s., placed on a greasy pole. Our Artist has engraved the scene of rustic joy on the lawn.

In the evening, the Earl of Derby entertained about eighty-six guests at dinner. He was the case of the banquet, Lord Sefton rose and proposed, in marked and appropriate terms, the health of the Hon. E. H. Stanley. The toast was responded to by the youthful scion, with much good feeling; after which the Earl of Wilton proposed the health of the Earl of Derby. Lord Stanley then proposed the health of the Lord Stanley, and his Lordship replied with heartfelt eloquence.

On Thursday, another grand dinner was given to the guests staying at the hall; and in the evening, a ball took place in the large ball-room, which was most gorgeously fitted up for the occasion. The apartment is 100 feet in length by 35 feet in breadth; and 33 feet in height. It is lined with pink and white drapery, and several large mirrors, and were lighted with gas, in three burnished gilt chandeliers. At one end of the room were emblazoned the arms of the Earl of Derby, and at the other those of Lord Stanley. On the same side was the orchestra, in which were stationed Horahm's excellent band. This gorgeous room was fitted up and decorated by Messrs. Rossall and Goodwel., of Bold-street Liverpool, with the able assistance of Mr. W. Rawford, of Colquitstreet.

The Hon. E. H. Stanley opened the ball, leading off with the Countess of Sefton. We have seldom seen a finer display of the beauty of the sex than on this occasion. The Earl of Derby entered the apartment while this quadrille was being danced The Noble Earl were his full uniform as Lord Lieutenant of the county of Lancaster, and looked remarkably well. The ball kept up without intermission until after twelve o'clock; when a supper of the most superb character was served in the banqueting room. The festivities were subsequently renewed with great spirit, and it was past six o'clock on Friday morning when the ball closed with the good old dance of "Sir Roger de Coverley," in which there was scarcely one of the house party who did not join.

We regret that we have not space for a list of the distinguished company present at this magnificent réunion.

The main feature of the hospitalities of Friday was the dinner to upwards of 400 of the tenantry, in the commodious tent on the grand ball had been given on the previous evening. At half-past three o'clock, an entertainment, comprising every delicacy, was served; the guests entered and took their seats, the district band of the Cheshire Rifle Militia playing "the beat Beef of Old England."

The Earl of Derby presided at the cross table, having Lord Stanley upon his right hand, and his grandson, the Hon. E. H. Stanley upon his left. The Earl of Sefton and the Earl of Wilton sat to the right of Lord Stanley, and Lord Skelmersdale and the Hon Colonel Wilbraham to the left of Mr. Stanley. Among the other noblemen, and gentlemen at the table were Viscount Clive, Viscount Anson, Hon. Colonel Stanley, Hon. Mr. Herbert, Hon. G. Herbert, Sir Watkin W. Wynn, Colonel Hornby, Captain Windham Hornby, R.N., Mr. Towneley Parker, M.P., Mr. Talbot Clifton, M.P., Mr. Towneley (of Town Head), Mr. Hopwood (of Hopwood), Mr. Wilson Patten, Mr. Penrhyn, Mr. Assheton (of Downham), Rev. J. G. Hopwood, Mr. Stanley (of Cross Hall), Mr. R. Ecrle, Rev. W. Hornby (of St. Michael's), Mr. H. Grenfell, Mr. C. Grenfell, Rev. Geoffrey Hornby (of Bury), Mr. J. Hornby, Mr. L. Penrhyn, Rev. R. Masters, Rev. R. Marsden, Rev. Mr. Hulton (of Hulton), Rev. J. E. Abraham (of Bickerst.-ft). &c.

The dinner having been concluded, Lady Stanley, accompanied by the Countess of Wilton, the Countess of Sefton, and the other ladies of the house party, entered the orchestra, which had been reserved for their accommodation. The presence was the signal for a burst of cheering from every part of the room. Prominent among the group were the youthful brother and sister of Mr. Stanley, and the beautiful young family of the Ear. and Countess of Sefton.

Grace having been pronounced, after a short pause, during which a very liberal supply of wine and several bowls of punch were placed on the table, Lord Stanley rose, and in an appropriate speech proposed the health of the Queen, "with a rattling three times three." The toast was drunk with the utmost enthusiasm

The next toast, proposed also by the Noble Lord, was that of the Queen Dowager, Prince Albert, the Prince of Wales, and the rest of the Royal Family. The band having played the "Coburg March," the Earl of Sefton then, in an eloquent address, proposed the toast of the day, "Health, long life, and happiness to the Hon. Edward Henry Stanley," calling on the company to take the time from him, and remember his instructions. The Noble Earl's appeal was most enthusiastically responded to, and the toast was drunk amidst a perfect hurricane of applause, the ladies in the orchestra waving their handkerchiefs and joining in the general manifestation. The Hon. Mr. Stanley returned thanks, and resumed his seat amidst long and continued applause. Mr. Robert Neilson (of Halewood) then, in an enthusiastic address, proposed the healths of Lord Derby and Lord Stanley, and may God bless them.

This toast was drunk with a degree of enthusiasm almost equal to the last. The venerable host bowed his acknowledgments to all around, and appeared much gratified at the exhibition of feeling towards himself and his noble son. The band having played the air of "The Old English Gentleman," Lord Stanley thanked the company, and concluded an address of much fervour, thus emphatically:—"In the name of my father, as a landlord, I thank you as a body, for the manner in which you have come forward to second those efforts which, without presumption, I may say he has largely ventured, to encourage your industry and to promote your prosperity. The earnest wish of my heart—as I am sure it is that of the heart of him whom may God long preserve as your landlord—is, that as the fathers and the grandfathers of many whom I now see, have been, for generations past, the tenantry—the honest, industrious, I believe I may say, the attached, tenantry of the house of Stanley—so, for generations yet to come, may the same be still connected in the local history of this place with our family, and that the descendants of those whose predecessors made it their boast that they held under the house of Stanley and of whom the house of Stanley was justly proud, as standing to them in that relation—may, for generations yet to come, continue to be the trusty, the prosperous, and thriving tenantry of our house, even long after those three generations now before you—the youngest of whom you have this day so kindly received—have passed away from this earth, and have left nothing behind them—nothing but that which I hope they will ever leave—the memory of a good name, and the character of honest men." (Immense cheering.)

The Earl of Wilton then proposed the health of Lady Stanley; Lord Stanley gave the health of the Earl of Sefton; the Earl of Sefton briefly returned thanks; and Lord Stanley having again risen and given "The Lancashire Witches," the word was taken a signal to retire. The usual honour was payed to the county toast, and the room was cleared, preparatory to the ball.

Meanwhile, a large party of the wives and families of the tenantry had been entertained at tea.

Shortly after the dinner party broke up, there was a splendid display of fireworks on the lawn.

The ball-room was then thrown open, and the guests (chiefly consisting of the wives and daughters of the tenantry) admitted.

At half-past nine o'clock, Lord and Lady Stanley, and the Hon. Mr. Stanley, with the rest of the house party, entered the ball-room. After very pretty dancing by the Hon F. A. Stanley, the Hon. Miss Stanley, and other children of the party, a country dance was formed, in which the Hon. Mr. Stanley led off with Mrs. John Towneley. The festivities now commenced in right earnest, and were kept up with great zest and spirit until an advanced hour in the morning.

Refreshments ad libitum were served to the company during the evening. Some idea of the hospitality dispensed, may be gathered from the fact that no less than 40 dozen of wine was disposed of before the party broke up.

On Saturday, a dinner was given to between 200 and 300 children, mostly educated at Lord Derby's expense; the feast was served in the marquee on the lawn. In the afternoon was played the Cricket Match, postponed from Tuesday, between the Knowsley and Edge Hill Clubs; the game was sharply contested, there being but five wickets to go down at the close.

On Monday, the festivities were brought to a close by a ball, given to 700 of the servants, their friends, and the tradesmen employed by the family. Supper was served at twelve o'clock, and dancing was continued until half-past five on Tuesday morning, when the band played the National Anthem, and the company separated. The decorum which marked the whole entertainment was so obvious, that it must have left a pleasing impression on all who were present. Thus terminated the festivities at Knowsley Hall—festivities which, we venture to say, for their princely hospitality, have had no parallel in this part of the county for many years.

THE GRAND BALL.

THE WAR IN MEXICO.

PUBLIC-HOUSE AT THE VILLAGE OF ACAJETE, BETWEEN JALAPA AND PUEBLA.

THE Caledonia, which left Halifax on the 18th ult., brings an account of a sanguinary battle between the American and Mexican forces, in which the latter were completely defeated, with great loss. An armistice was agreed upon, the proposition for which, it is said, was made by General Scott, and is supposed to have been at the instance of the British Embassy. The following is the official account of this engagement:—

"Washington, September 14, P M.

"Despatches for the Government have this moment been received. The intelligence heretofore received is fully confirmed.

MEXICAN GENTLEMAN.

HEAD MULETEER AND MAN.

"On the 20th ult., the American forces, consisting of 7000 men, met the enemy at Charbusco, three or four miles from the capital. The Mexicans were 32,000 strong, and posted behind an immense battery of heavy artillery.

"After two hours' bloody conflict, our gallant troops swept everything before them, mainly at the point of the bayonet. The American loss was less than a thousand, while that of the Mexicans is estimated at five thousand, and amongst the killed are many distinguished men, both generals and civilians.

"The armistice was agreed upon, and five Commissioners appointed on the Mexican side, at the head of whom was Herrera. The Commissioners had two meetings, and were to hold a third on Monday, the 30th. Valencia escaped with two companies to Tafuca, and has since pronounced against Santa Anna and peace."

The American papers supply some interesting details of this engagement, from which it appears that, on the 14th of August, a reconnaissance made by Colonel Duncan having satisfied General Scott that a road for artillery could be cut from Chalcoa to San Augustine, General Worth's division moved in that direction on the 19th, followed by General Quitman, Pillow, and Twiggs. By this move a new line of operations was taken on the southern and western sides of the city of Mexico, and the strong works of Panon and Mexicalingo, on which Santa Anna had bestowed especial care, were turned and rendered useless.

On the 16th of August, General Worth marched as far as the hacienda of San Gregorio, when a halt was ordered by General Scott, as General Twiggs had met a large force of the enemy at Chalcoa. General Twiggs promptly ordered the heaviest guns to be unlimbered, and after a few discharges the enemy were dispersed, with a loss of six killed

On the 17th, General Worth resumed his march over a terribly bad road, but by eight o'clock in the morning he was in sight of the dome and spires of the capital, without any opposition, except that rocks had been rolled into the road and ditches dug, evidently showing that General Scott had stolen a march on Santa Anna. On reaching this point, however, a scattering fire was opened by a force stationed in an advantageous position, which was soon silenced by Colonel Smith's light battalion of 2nd Artillery, under Major Gale. Another attack was shortly after made, but again the enemy's pickets were driven in without loss.

At seven o'clock, on the 18th, General Scott arrived at San Augustine, and at ten o'clock General Worth was in full march for the city of Mexico by the main road. Majors Smith and Turnbull, Captain Mason, and other engineer officers, were sent in advance, supported by Captain Blake's squadron of dragoons, to reconnoitre, when a masked battery was opened on them, and the first ball from an eighteen-pounder killed Captain Thornton, of the 2d Dragoons, besides seriously wounding a guide. Colonel Garland's brigade was ordered to occupy a position in plain sight of the enemy's batteries at San Antonio, while Colonel Stark's brigade and Duncan's battery took another station in the rear, close by.

A party was then sent out to reconnoitre, to ascertain the practicability of finding a road by which the village of San Angel could be reached, and the stronghold of San Antonio thus turned. This party had a skirmish with the enemy, killing five or six, and taking as many prisoners, without losing a man.

The result of the reconnaissance was favourable, and it was ascertained that a road could be made. The Mexicans were plainly seen in force near Cronteras, and at a council held that night, it was determined to attack them in the morning. While this reconnaissance was going on, General Worth had established himself at the hacienda of Bureva, from the windows of which countless numbers of the enemy could be seen at work upon the batteries of San Antonio.

About noon they opened upon the hacienda with round shot and shell. Nearly every shot took effect, but did no damage except to the buildings. Late in the evening they were again opened, but were silent during the night. Had the fire been kept up the hacienda might have been torn to pieces, and the entire command compelled to retire.

At eight o'clock on the morning of the 19th the batteries again opened on General Worth's position. So hot was the fire, that the troops were compelled to gain shelter behind the buildings, but did not give up their position.

About nine o'clock, the division of Twiggs and Pillow ordered to march in the direction of Cronteras; and, by ten o'clock in the afternoon, were in plain sight of the enemy's batteries and within range of the heavier guns. The brigade of Colonel P. T. Smith was ordered to attack the works on the enemy's works, while that of Colonel Riley moved towards a small village at the right, and thus cut off reinforcements which might be sent to Valencia from the city. An incessant fire was opened on Colonel Smith's command, and soon the Rifles were engaged with the pickets of the enemy, driving them in.

The twelve-pounder batteries of Captain M'Gruder, and the mountain howitzer batteries, now commanded by Lieut. Callander, of the Ordnance department, were pressed forward and opened on the enemy, but were so much exposed to a fire from heavier guns that many were soon silenced. Lieutenants Johnson and Callender were seriously wounded.

At three o'clock General Cadwalader was ordered out to support Colonel Riley, heavy reinforcements having been seen on their way out from the city, whilst General Pierce was sent to sustain General Smith. The firing from the enemy's batteries was incessant

About four o'clock General Scott arrived, and, seeing the immense strength of the Mexicans, at once ordered General Shield's brigade to support Riley and Cadwalader, and prevent, if possible, a junction of the forces coming out of the city with those of Valencia. But few of the movements of our own troops could be seen, though every motion of the enemy was visible. The order of the battle of Valencia was most imposing. His infantry was drawn up to support the batteries, whilst long lines of the enemy's cavalry were stationed in the rear, as if awaiting the shock of the battle. The repeated charges of the latter were distinctly seen to be repulsed by Colonel Riley, until night had fairly closed in. The firing from the enemy's batteries had not slackened; it had been a continuous roar for nearly six hours.

General Scott retired to San Augustine about eight o'clock, in the midst of a hard rain, and General Twiggs and Pillow came in about eleven o'clock, completely exhausted, not anticipating the great strength of the works of the enemy. It was thought that the batteries could be taken at a dash, and that the troops would be comfortably quartered at San Angel for the night. Instead of this, a large portion of them were compelled to bivouac without blankets in the midst of a pitiless storm.

On the morning of the 20th General Worth was ordered to move a part of his division, Garland's brigade, to aid in the attack on Valencia, for to force this position was deemed indispensable.

At seven o'clock a few discharges of cannon were heard, and the rattling of musketry, and some even said that in the distance horses of the enemy could be seen flying towards the city, yet few deemed that the batteries had been stormed and carried. Yet it was so

General Scott, accompanied by General Worth, started for the scene of action, when they were met by Captain Mason with the joyful intelligence that Valencia had been completely routed, after a terrible struggle. The attack upon his works was planned by General Smith, and resulted in the capture of 15 pieces of artillery, and some 1500 prisoners—among them, Generals Blanco, Garcia, Mendoza, and the notorious Salas. He also captured all the ammunition and camp equipage, whilst the road of those who fled was strewed with muskets. No less than 700 of the enemy among them many officers—were left dead on the field; whilst the number wounded was far greater

The works of Cronteras were completely in the power of the American army.

General Scott at once ordered General Worth to fall back on San Antonio, to turn and capture that work, then push on towards the capital by the main road, whilst the main body of the army moved on towards San Angel and Coboycam. General Twiggs had scarcely moved half a mile beyond the latter village, when a rattling fire of musketry announced that it was actively engaged with the outposts of the enemy, and the heavy booming of cannon now gave token that the noted second division had fallen on another strong work.

A few minutes more, and a tremendous firing from the right made evident that General Worth's division was also actively engaged. He had completely turned the strong works of San Antonio, and, while doing so, the enemy had abandoned the place, with a loss of three heavy guns, and had fallen back on a second stronger line of works. It was now one o'clock in the afternoon, and about the commencement of the battle. Such a rattling of fire-arms had seldom or never been heard on the American continent. Accompanied with such booming of artillery, and this continued over two hours, when the enemy was completely routed from every point, and until those who were not killed or taken prisoners were in full flight for the capital.

The strength of the enemy at this battle is known to have been at least fifteen, and many say twenty thousand, all fresh troops, and in a position of uncommon strength. Opposed to them were about 6,000 Americans, jaded and broken down by marches and countermarches, and incessant toil at Charbesco. The Mexicans say that Santa Anna commanded in person, but that he retired early. The young men of the capital, from whom so much was expected, nearly all fled without firing a gun.

The loss on our side has fallen most heavily upon the South Carolina and New York Volunteers, the 6th Infantry and Smith's battalion, and the batteries of Captain M'Gruder and Taylor. The South Carolina regiment was nearly cut to pieces.

Thirteen Mexican Generals were killed and wounded.

More ammunition has been captured than General Scott has used since he has been in the country.

The Caledonia brought New York papers to the 16th ult., but they do not contain any domestic news of interest. There was much excitement in commercial matters, owing to the announcement of the failure of Messrs. Prime, Ward, and King, of New York

We have engraved Four characteristic Scenes of Mexican Life, from Mr. Mayer's clever Sketches. They show an Escort of Cavalry, a specimen of the equipment of the national troops; a party of ladies halting between San Martin and Puebla, at a shop where is sold pulque, the fermented juice of the aloe, and the common drink of the country. The Mexican gentleman has been sketched from the capital; the Real Mulero and his Man, from the mountains; and the fourth scene—at a village public-house shows us the ordinary mode of travelling; the locality, between Jalapa and Puebla. The four illustrations are faithful and spirited portraitures of Mexican character—in short, the every-day life of the people

RUGBY SCHOOL.—In consequence of a request from the School, her Majesty has graciously passed to give the boys a whole holiday, in honour of her passing through Rugby, which was fixed for Wednesday (Michaelmas Day.)

MR. COBDEN AT MOSCOW.—Mr. Cobden is still at Moscow. He came from Nishni Novgorod, where he had been attending the Fair. On the road between Novgorod Mr. Cobden visited several manufacturing districts. "Here we have manufactures in full perfection," he exclaimed at Wochna, where it was well known that silk goods to the value of several hundred thousand pounds are annually manufactured. At Moscow, also, several manufactures have excited his astonishment and admiration. Mr. Cobden assured M. Gutsahkow, the proprietor of calico printing-mills, that he had nowhere seen so completely organized a manufactory of this kind. In the cloth-factory of M. Kotow he was especially pleased with the order which prevailed, and the admirable combination of the isolated divisions of the manufactory Mr. Cobden said, "You need not be afraid of any competition; cloth-weaving is in the most favourable state in Russia, and all circumstances combine to bring this branch of industry to the highest perfection." He expressed his satisfaction, and his desire to become better acquainted with the state of the manufactures and of the labouring classes.

THE THEATRES.

SADLER'S WELLS.

On Monday evening "Macbeth" was revived at this theatre, with all the usual care bestowed upon the plays brought out here: indeed some of the effects and stage arrangements have never been surpassed even in the Italian Operas, for the first time for many years—we had almost written centuries—the interpolated musical pieces are omitted; and the poetical portions of this tragedy, not latterly acted such as the soliloquy of the Porter, the scene at Macduff's castle, and that in which the old man discourses of the prodigies—restored to the stage. Possibly the omission of the music tends to increase the effect produced on the imagination by the witch scenes The strange rude rhymes, distinctly spoken, have more of the supernatural than elaborately-concerted music occurring in the midst of dialogue; and the introduction of the Shakspearian intentionally knitted the Weird Sisters to the mystic number of three. Of the new effects we must not omit to mention the vanishing of the witches in the opening scene, which was most excellently managed, by a clever continuance of different layers of gauze. The vision of Kings in the Witches' cave, and the battle in the last act, were also worthy of notice. There was, as usual, an attentive, although a crowded Monday night audience, who took the warm and judicious Mr. Phillips to their hearts. Macready has not been played at Sadler's Wells, if we remember aright, since Mrs. Warner's secession from the company. On this occasion the character of Lady Macbeth was sustained by Miss Laura Addison

MARYLEBONE.

The management at this little theatre has no reason to complain of lack of patronage, and, on the other hand, the audience show by their attendance that they consider the entertainment provided for them by Mrs Warner deserving of support. "The Winter's Tale" and "The School for Scandal" have proved the most attractive plays. The first we fully noticed when the season commenced; the second has been brought out with the same care, and played with equal success. We think, however, the company is likely to succeed best in tragedy; and we would also suggest the occasional representation of a new farce, instead of pieces with which the public is already familiar. The audiences are exceedingly respectable; and the Marylebone Theatre is evidently looked upon as an agreeable resort for the inhabitants of Paddington and St. John's Wood.

SURREY.

On Monday night Mr. Bunn commenced his operatic campaign with signal success. The house was crowded to excess, and some pugnacious episodes took place in the course of the evening, as an obligato to the "sweet sounds" on the stage. Balfe's "Bohemian Girl" was played by an orchestra of about twenty-four players, the élite of the late Drury-Lane band, was conducted by Mr. Tully. The chorus was gleaned also from the defunct troupe, but, numerically, neither band nor chorus were sufficient for the size of the house. The cast included Miss Romer, Miss Rebecca Isaacs, Messrs. Harrison, Rafter, Borrani, and H. Horncastle. The lady vocalists had not appeared before in London in their respective parts, and Mr Rafter sustained that exacted formerly by Mr. Diddear, and afterwards by Mr. Harley. The characteristics of the singers we have named are now well known. Miss Romer is as energetic and enthusiastic as ever; at one moment the most exquisite tones are heard from her powerful organ, and at the next one is annoyed by some slovenly piece of execution, Mr. Harrison's nasal defects do not mend, nor will they so long as audiences are found to encourage him in vulgar clap-traps, and pass over the better portions of his singing without notice. Borrani's intonation does not improve, nor is his angular action less grotesque. Mr. H. Horncastle's burlesque vocalisation is beyond a joke. Mr. Rafter has a gentlemanlike method, but he must live in England.

We wish Mr. Bunn every success, and, with the attractions he has promised in his programme, at the present tariff, he must command it; but it would be idle affectation to conceal our opinion that the actual condition of our English operatic market for singers, is one to be proud of. Unless some of our concert artists come to the field and take to the stage, the prospects will be most gloomy.

ASTLEY'S closes this week. A little elephant introduced to the sawdust on Monday, did not exhibit the usual docility and intelligence of his race. We believe he is the smallest ever seen alive in England.

VAUXHALL shut up its doors on Tuesday; and CREMORNE, and the SURREY ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS do the same this week. M. Laurent takes his band to the Casino, which has been entirely re-decorated. He has engaged M. Tolin, the leading cornet à-pistons player at the famous Jardin Mabille, in Paris.

The HAYMARKET opens this evening with the "School for Scandal," as we announced, strongly cast; the new appearances being those of Mr. F. Wigan, as Sir Benjamin Backbite; Mr. Henry Farren, as Charles Surface; and Mr. Cresswick, as Joseph. The old favourite burlesque of "The Invisible Prince" will also be performed

George Cruikshank's admirable series of pictures—"The Bottle"—has furnished the playwrights of the minor theatres and saloons with a subject, upon which they are engaged in half a dozen quarters.

DRURY LANE opens with Promenade Concerts on the 8th The appearance of the house will be very elegant. The decorations are all in white and gold, and the ceiling has been admirably painted to look like a dome. The Concerts will only continue a month, as the stage will be wanted by that time for the rehearsals of the opera and pantomime.

The ADELPHI must bring something forward without loss of time, to cope with the opposition in all quarters. It is the only theatre the bills of which, at present, do not announce any striking novelties.

The OLYMPIC looks exceedingly forlorn; and we do not hear of anything likely to be done there with much prospect of success. In fact, it would be difficult to find a company at present.

MUSIC.

GLOUCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The artistical and financial triumphs of this meeting have exceeded the most sanguine expectations. The collection at the Cathedral doors, on Friday morning, when the "Messiah" was performed, amounted to £92 2s. 9d. Thus, in four days, the total has been £630 6s. 9d., for the exclusive benefit of the Charity

About £150 more than at the gathering of 1844. The Fancy Ball at the Shire Hall, on Friday night, which terminated the celebration, was well attended, and the dancing, to Mr. T. Adams's quadrille band, was kept up with spirit until a late hour. Complaints were made as to the refreshments, both as to quantity and quality. The third and last concert, on Thursday night, was rendered remarkable by the enormous success of Mdlle. Alboni

On the whole, this meeting was full of interest. It was judicious to have introduced Mendelssohn's "Elijah," and his exquisite pieces. "The Walpurgis Night" and "The Midsummer Night's Dream." The selections generally were unexceptionable. The only objection we can make is to the miscellaneous nature and immoderate length of Thursday's programme at the Cathedral. Mr. Amott, the organist and conductor, was zealous and painstaking; but we should strongly recommend the managers of these celebrations to engage the services of a trained conductor, and let the organist exercise the functions of "musical director." It is too much to expect that a provincial performer can assume the bâton once in three years, to the satisfaction of all parties. We are glad to find that the "Choral Society" in the town is making way. With proper practice, and due direction, their services may be turned to account, at the Festivals for the future, to strengthen London choirs, which, by the way, ought to have been more numerous in the orchestra. We hope the residents of Gloucester will assist the Festival, and not suffer the gentlemen who undertake the office of stewards to stand the entire risk. At present, the townspeople seemed more disposed to extort as much as possible from the visitors, than to encourage their future advent by moderate charges. Open house was kept by the Rev. Sir John Seymour and Dr. Evans, of College Gardens, both active in their exertions on behalf of the Festival.

MADEMOISELLE ALBONI.—Mr. M. Carroll, a professor in Brighton, gave a Morning Concert at Town Hall on Saturday, which was crowded to suffocation, the attraction being Mdlle. Alboni, who sang "Una voce," and the Tyrolean air from "Betly," and was encored in both, giving the "Il Segreto" the second time for "Una voce." Mdlle. Alboni has received the palaces from "Linda" and John Parry, in both his comic songs. Mr. Lindsay Sloper was the accompanyist. Mdlle. Alboni quitted London yesterday (Friday), for Paris. She has refused engagements offered to her, at Vienna, Berlin, and the Palaces from the Royale; but it is not improbable the Parisian amateurs will have the opportunity of hearing her, at a concert at the Académie, M. Escudier, of the France Musicale, having been despatched to Brighton by M. Duponchel and Gerbeau, to offer her a lucrative engagement for three concerts. From Paris, Mdlle. Alboni departs for Pesth, in Hungary.

M. JULLIEN.—The new lessee of Drury Lane Theatre arrived in London, from Italy, on Wednesday, and has already put forward his programme for the Promenade Concerts. His operatic season will begin in December. He was unable to secure Miss Birch for the Surrey Gardens. The concerts took place, we understand, such terms to Madame Pauline Garcia Viardot (sister of Malibran), that it is not improbable she may yet appear first at Drury Lane Theatre, to sing in English, after the manner of the Italian, Spanish, French, and German lyrical stages, in the different languages

JENNY LIND.—Mdlle. Jenny Lind sang at three concerts in Norwich, last week, and was received with the utmost enthusiasm. On her passage to and from St. Andrew's Hall, in which the concerts were held, and on Friday, when she visited several of the charitable institutions of the city, her carriage was followed by crowds of persons, who cheered her heartily. The concerts took place on Wednesday and Thursday evenings, and Saturday morning. The musical arrangements were under the direction of Mr. C. F. Hall, late one of the leaders of the Drury Lane band. Mr. Balfe was the conductor, and Mdme. and Signor F. Lablache, and Signor Gardoni, were the vocalists in addition to Mdlle Lind. About £300 were attributed to the three concerts; the receipts amounted to about £3500, out of which Messrs. C. F. Hall and Gerrans, the gentlemen who got up the concerts, will net £1400. After her brilliant reception at Norwich, the Swedish Nightingale sang on Monday at Bristol, and on Tuesday at Bath, with her customary triumphs. She received £600 for these two concerts, and refused £1000 for two concerts in Dublin. She sings to-night at Exeter Concerts have been given this week at Weymouth, Southampton, Ryde, &c., by Madame Dulcken, the pianiste, at which John Parry was engaged.

MR. COSTA.—The conductor of the Royal Italian Opera, and of the Philharmonic Society, left town on Tuesday, for Paris, on his way to Germany and Italy.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.—The Italian Opera in Paris will commence its season this evening (Saturday), with MOZART'S "Don Juan," thus cast:—Donna Anna, Grisi; Donna Elvira, Mdlle. Corbari; Zerlina, Madame Persiani; Don Ottavio, Signor Mario; Marotto, Signor Tagliafico (these artists all belong to the Royal Italian Opera Company in London); Don Juan, Coletti; and Leporello, Labische (from her Majesty's Theatre). Madame Castellan, Mdlle. Brambilla, the contralto, Gardoni, and Ronconi, are also engaged by M. Vatel, the Director. At the Académie Royale, Bordas, the tenor, has appeared in Halévy's "Reine de Chypre." Mdlle. Masson has not confirmed the favourable opinion of her début in the Favorite. Madame Hébert-Massy has failed in Lucie. Poultier, the cooper tenor, has reappeared in Mosaniello. Miss Birch is to make her début in Matilda, in "Guillaume Tell" Barbot, a new tenor, is to appear in Rossini's Barbiere, and St. Leon are in the débuts in a new ballet, the music by Pugni, early in October. Verdi's "Jerusalem" ("I Lombardi") altered in active rehearsal. Auber's new opera is in active rehearsal, at the Opera Comique; Roger and Mdlle. Lavoye have the principal parts. The preparations for the opening of the National Opera are active An occasional piece has been written by MM A. Royer and Gustave Vaez; for which Adolphe Adam has composed an overture, a quatuor, and a duo; Mdlle. Lauters, an air for soprano; Caraffa, an air for a baritone; and Halevy, a quatuor, and a romance for a tenor. Donizetti is on his way to Italy, but his state of mind is not improving. Wagner's "Rienzi" and Verdi's "Macdaff" are preparing in Berlin for Jenny Lind. Verdi's "Macbeth" has been at last successful at the Argentina, in Rome, sung by Mdme. Boccabadati, the soprano, and Gnone (Macbeth); Bernabei is the tenor. Mdme. Gazzaniga, Frankini (the Basilio), and Parri (bass), are stars in Lucca. Massol, the French tenor, is at Cremona.

THANKSGIVING FOR THE HARVEST.

[Her Majesty held a Privy Council on Tuesday, at Osborne House. A form of Thanksgiving for the late abundant harvest was ordered.]

Songs from the Nation's lips impart
Their joy to the Most High!
And Peans from the People's heart
Soar upward to the sky!
As gold is garner'd from the field,
Where late the harvest trod,
Loud let the grateful millions yield
The glory unto God!

HARVEST HYMN.

Lord! Thou hast blessed the people,
And made the tree of bread
To spring where'er beneath Thine eye,
Fair Nature's seed was spread.
Earth's thirst drank Thy dew, Thy fresh'ning rain,
Earth's bosom wooed Thy sun,
Beautiful grew the golden grain,
Like prize of labour won!

Lord! Thou hast been the watcher
Of those who reaped the store,
Till Plenty, as Thy Angel, glides
Within the poor man's door—
To wake the pious praising hymn
Where rang the voice of strife,
And prop the weak and weary limb
With holy Staff of Life!

Lord! Thou hast sent Thy Harvest forth,
Bright harbinger of good;
With Love, that shines from south to north,
O'er all the human flood.
From south to north, from west to east,
So, at this solemn hour,
Glad millions bless Thee for the feast,
And glorify Thy power.

The little children praise Thee, Lord!
With prattle of the glad;
And Crime, that counts its want of food,
Half ceaseth to be bad!
The two extremes of good and ill
Are bowed before Thy shrine;
And gratitude flows, like a rill,
For mercy so divine!

Lord! all the people hail Thee,
Their Hallelujah sing,
As with a voice that sings to Heav'n,
And praises while it sings.
The old and weak—the young and strong—
Sound full the blessing tone;
The music of their Harvest Hymn
Is thrilling round Thy throne.

FASHIONS FOR OCTOBER.

(From "Berger's Ladies' Gazette of Fashion.")

CHAPEAUX.—The forms of chapeaux and capotes have not yet varied, nor do we think that there will be any very great change in them. We have heard that this year the crowns will be raised, and the brims deepened, but we know that as yet nothing is decided. Satin is in great request for chapeaux. We may cite also chapeaux of paille d'Italie, the interior trimmed with coques of velvet in full colours, and the exterior with velvet ribbon to correspond, and straw coloured feathers, tipped or shaded in the colour of the velvet. Chapeaux of paille de riz are still adopted. their garnitures are either velvet flowers, or ribbons of full colours. Several are trimmed with ribbons of the richest kind, striped, shaded, or figured in full colours. Fruit de soie chapeaux of green, pink, and blue, trimmed with black lace and velvet flowers, are much in vogue. Black lace will be more than ever in favour for trimmings.

PARDESSUS EN.—In plain walking-dress, visites, and mantelet-écharpes, of black moire or pouit de soie, will be very extensively seen, trimmed with passementeries or rich lace. China crape shawls of gaudy colours will also be worn in morning dress. Others, of the most magnificent kind, will be in vogue for the promenade. Cashmeres will also be justly in favour. Visites, trimmed with swan's-down, will be introduced. The new materials—the cashmir satin and satin de chine—will also appear The greatest novelties of the season are the manteau-pliver, intended for walking-dress or travelling. It is a large comfortable cloak, composed of satin, and trimmed with passementerie: the manteau Reine Marguerite, destined for the carriage or promenade. It is of velvet, of a small size, and may either be trimmed with black lace or swan's-down The mantel Malmoret is quite of a different style, and is really of a noble appearance; it is made entirely without a seam, both the mantle and its hood, so that it has the advantage of being quite novel, and is really also both comfortable and becoming ROBES will soon be made entirely of silks, cashmeres, and some new materials, composed of silk and wool. The pelisse form is still in favour. Corsages are in general quite high; those open in front are more numerous as the time for the close ones. Dresses are shorter in front, but their length behind is the same, or rather increased. If the dress is made as a robe, it is trimmed with flounces, or it has no garnitures at the bottom: at present, those with flounces are rather in a majority. A new material has just appeared for travelling dresses and robes de chambre, it is called the Chatoyante; it is grey woollen chine; the pattern is a large square of red or orange silk, or else deep blue satin. The pelisse-robe is also in vogue in morning home dress; the form is that of the the redingote amazone, but the waste not quite so long. India muslin, and mousseline de soie, are still in equal vogue with taffeta and pouit de soie in dinner dress. Silk robes have corsages, half high, right to the shape, and decorated with lace or berthes, in corresponds: the sleeves are always short, and the trimming, if any, is composed of flounces. The materials for half-dress are taffeta, organdy, and taffeta, the latter always of light colours, as blue, pale pink, and that brilliant shade of green called Vert lumiere.

HEAD DRESSES are either caps, or, as they are termed, demi-coiffures, composed of lace lappets and flowers. Ball head-dresses are always of hair, ornamented sometimes with ribbons, but more generally with flowers.

COLOURS. We cannot yet announce any decided change, but autumnal tints are creeping in; the colour of the dead leaf is added to the other shades of green; dark blue, ruby, brown, lavender, and various shades of orange have also appeared.

Next month we shall have truly startling novelties to announce in every department of costume. Our artistes are busy preparing designs of the most elegant description.

OVERSEERS FINED FOR NEGLECT OF DUTY. A great number of cases of disfranchisement have occurred during the present registration for the City of London, entirely in consequence of the remissness or neglect of the functions of the overseers. On the hearing of these cases, Mr. S. Smith took occasion to submit to the revising barrister, and to the gentleman on the overseers, and Mr. M'Christie reserved giving his decision upon that point till he had duly considered the matter. On Monday morning, Mr. M'Christie called the attention of the agents to this subject, and said, that he was prepared to dispose of the question with respect to fines to be imposed on those overseers who had been guilty of neglect of duty He considered it absolutely necessary that some defined rule of proceeding should be laid down in reference to fines on overseers, as had been done in the case of costs for groundless objections taken by the agents or those whom they employed. The learned gentleman then adverted to the cases; and, after minutely noticing the facts, fined the overseers of several parishes in sums varying from £2 to £4, for their neglect of duty.

The Man in the Moon.

DOMBEY AND HIS WIFE.

It was not in the nature of things that a man of Mr. Dombey's mood, opposed to such a spirit as he had raised against himself, should be softened in the imperious asperity of his temper; or that the cold hard armour of pride in which he lived encased, should be made more flexible by constant collision with the mighty heart of darkness. It is the curse of such a nature—it is a main part of the heavy retribution on itself it bears within itself—that while deference and concession swell its evil qualities, and are the food it grows upon, resistance, and a question swell its exacting claims, foster it, too, no less. The evil that is in it finds equally its means of growth and propagation in opposites. It draws support and life from sweets and bitters; bowed down before, or unacknowledged, port and life from sweets and bitters; bowed down before, or unacknowledged, it still enslaves the breast in which it has its throne; and, worshipped or rejected, is as hard a master as the devil in dark fables.—Dombey and Son.

CHARACTER OF CHARLES I.

In a commercial country, likewise, the swindling propensities will always tell against him, and his insatiable desire to obtain money, under false pretences, was quite unworthy of his exalted station, or, indeed, of any station that that where the police are paramount. It is true, that his subjects would have kept him rather hard up for cash; and he often declared that the Long Parliament reduced him repeatedly to very short commons. Hume has endeavoured to give Charles the reputation of being a man of "probity and honour:" but it must have been the sort of honour said to prevail among thieves, for when he could not get money by honest means—which he seldom could—he never scrupled to rob for it. In person, Charles had a sweet but melancholy expression, a sort of agro dolce, which made his portrait not quite a Carlo Dolce to look upon. His features were regular, but he was not vain; and he would often say or think "that he would not care about a regular nose or chin, so that he could make both ends meet by having a regular salary." He was an excellent horseman; but it is one thing to be skilful in the management of the bridle, and another to be adroit in holding the reins of power. His equestrian accomplishments would have been useful to him had fate thrown him into another circle, where his favourite Buckingham, as clown to the ring, would also have been in his proper position.—Comic History of England.

A WELSH IRON VALLEY.

There, then, it lies beneath our feet. We can see into the very streets and house-row spaces that straggle through the bottom of it: some portion of a true picture of Wales, and life in Wales, surely we shall attain to. There it lies, in the splendour of an autumnal sun. How beautifully small it is! How miniature-like, somehow! A gently-curving sweep it is between these two low mountain-ridges, which, leaving the skirts of the high bleak common on the verges of it, which we stand, approach to form it. The roots of the two ridges seem to dip into each other, down there, at the far end; but their tops remain apart, giving sight to a remote mountain with the white dot of a cottage far away, and no other object visible. For mere is a crystal clearness in the air, to-day, that makes the distant present; bringing localities, usually considered out and beyond our own, somehow, for the nonce, unto the very midst of us—associating the whole family of hills around into one peaceful brotherhood of neighbours.—Douglas Jerrold's Shilling Magazine.

MRS THIMBLEBEE'S "CHESTERFIELD HOUSE."

Mrs Thimbleb'e's, at Turnham Green, was no ordinary establishment. It was the boast of both ladies that no vulgar tradesman's daughter had ever polluted the exquisitely refined atmosphere of "CHESTERFIELD HOUSE" even though they had had several advantageous offers upon the "mutual advantage" system. Indeed, they referred with great pride to their heroic refusal to allow the eldest girl of a highly fashionable butcher at the west end to mingle in their select circle notwithstanding her fond parent had generously consented to estimate the blessings and graces of French and Italian, Music and Dancing, and Berlin-the blessings and graces of French and Italian, Music and Dancing, and Berlin-wool work, at several hundred pounds—of beef and mutton per quarter. No! the Misses Thimbleboe were in no way anxious to devote their energies to the rearing of young plebeian "mushrooms," though nothing on earth would have given them greater pleasure than to have bestowed their talents upon the training of budding floral "strawberry-leaves." At Chesterfield House, young ladies rehearsed the parts they were intended to act at Almack's. There the rough block of the child of nature received its finishing touches, and was converted into the highly polished statue of fashionable society—fit for an ornament to any the highly polished statue of fashionable society—fit for an ornament to any drawing room. There the grave of departed nature was adorned with all kinds of artificial flowers; and there, Woman—tutored in all the fascinations of the art—was taught to shine at night like the glow-worm; in order to attract her mate by the display of a brilliance that had no warmth in it.—From Whom to Marry, and How to Get Married; a new work by the Editors of The Greatest Plague of Life.

THE MOVEMENT IN ITALY.

Certainly the advent of the new stalwart Pope marks a new era in the history of modern Rome. There is all to hope, and much to fear. The abuses to be reformed, and the improvements necessary to be made, are multitudinous; and the materials his Holiness has to work with are of the worst description. The only part of the old iron men of Romels quite rotten; nothing remains in the Eternal City but the turba Rem at all times the vilest and most villainous mob in the world. The nobility are brutally ignorant and brutally debauched; the clergy are church-The nobility are brutally ignorant and brutally debauched; the clergy are church-men sans are, for the most part, ignorant, bigoted, superstitious, and sold to Foreign Powers, who abhor the notion of liberty at Rome. Still, Ferretti's is a tremendously high office, and the appointment of such a man to it at such a period, consecrates an augury of better days for Italy. The appointment was by an unanimous vote; and it was contrary to all precedents peradventure, except one; and it seemed as though it were auspicated and ushered in by no vulgar augury and it seemed as though it were auspicated and ushered in by no vulgar augury and service subservicency to antiquated superstitions—the blast of the last trumpet.—Dublin University Magazine.

FAMILY WINE.

At the Rectory, when the bottle of port wine was opened after dinner, the young ladies had each a glass from a bottle of currant wine. Mrs. Rute took one glass of port—honest James had a couple—unanimity but as the father grew very sulky if he made further inroads on the bottle, the good lad generally refrained from trying for more, and subsided either into the currant wine, or to some private gin-and-water in the stables, which he enjoyed in the company of the coachman and his pipe. At Oxford, the quantity of wine was unlimited, but the quality was inferior; but when quantity and quality united, as at his aunt's house, James showed that he could carry his head then indeed; and hardly needed any of his cousin's encouragement in draining off the second bottle.—Vanity Fair.

AN OLD WAITER.

The waiter was an ancient man best nearly double; with a few hairs, of a pepper and salt tint, scattered about his head. His cuffs hung over his hands, and no one could see into what obscurity the ends of his dingy white neckcloth retreated after their mission of forming a knot had been accomplished. The soles of his shoes and the oil-cloth of the coffee-room had worn out one another for thirty or forty years; so that he was old in the service when Gudge and Ford met him; for he was the same Bob. And since then he had never but once had a holiday, which he had passed in the coffee-room of an adjacent hotel, going to see a brother waiter, and folding the napkins and filling the cruets for him, against a large dinner which was coming off next day; the pleasantest few hours, as he afterwards asserted, that ever he remembered to have passed. Christopher Tadpole.

ODD LOCALITIES.

There is, in Leicester-square, a remarkable establishment, appropriated to many purposes in its different compartments. It was once the repository of Miss Linwood's needlework—a popular exhibition which, however, we never saw ourselves, nor, remarkably enough, did we ever know anybody, who being driven to the point, could say he had either; but which is believed to have been immensely popular with well-regulated country families visiting London once a year as a compulsory pleasure. At that time a little Turk upon horseback used to trot across large panes of glass in one of the windows every half minute to the delight of the passengers, especially the boys, who always enter heavily into everything exhibited for nothing. But when the needlework went, the Turk went with it, and then the establishment became so divided by different interests, that few could tell whether it was a theatre, a wine vaults, a billard room, a coffee-shop, a gunsmith's, or a Royal Academy; or, if they could, they never knew how to find the ascending and descending steps and doors and passages, which one must take to get anywhere. The Egyptian Hall is as mystic in this respect as is the interior of the Pyramids. Nobody ever went to see Tom Thumb without finding himself amongst the Ojibbeways by a wrong door; and the visitor to the Model of Venice, having been so confused as to pay separately for the Speaking Machine, or the Fat, or Mysterious Lady, ultimately, never got there at all.—Bentley's Miscellany.

THE PRASLIN TRAGEDY.

There always have been, and now are, many such wives in France, as the murdered Madame de Praslin; but we believe it were difficult to find in any country, however barbarous, another such husband. Since the beginning of the world, we have no account of any man, whether husband or lover, hacking, hewing, and cutting the mother of his ten children in pieces. This unparalleled crime had never taken place had the demand of the Duchess for that separation which she was entitled to by law been acceded to, and they who interfered by pandering to the passions of their proper sentiments, must now feel pangs of bitter anguish. The French people have been stigmatised by a writer in a daily paper, who evidently knows nothing of France, for being suspicious of the intentions of the French Government, and unjust to men in power, in reference to the Duke de Praslin. But French men and French women well know that, in the case of the President d'Entrecasteaux, a young man of a distinguished family of the robe, a president of the Parliament of Aix, and who murdered his wife with circumstances of peculiar atrocity, that the Government ostensibly demanded the delivery of the criminal wherever he might be found. He was detected and secured at Lisbon, when a private letter to the French Minister disarmed his release, and permitted his escape from further punishment. Fraser's Magazine.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

During the current week there were three days' racing at Newmarket; and, as yachting is at an end, and cricket somewhat on the wane, there were people with nothing to do who went down to Suffolk to accomplish it. But it would not require much trouble to follow them on their visit; so we take the liberty to try another tack. In face of all manner of foul usage in the Money Market, and evil doing at the hands of legs and hunters, the age of autumnal handicaps are setting in a-pace. Transfer books of considerable substance (as regards the material of their construction) have, since Doncast r, been opened on the Cesarewitch and Cambridgeshire Stakes; and, for the former, a terrific field has been almost ready backed with astonishing spirit—and "pluck." We shall have occasion presently to speak of those horses; in the present instance, it will be convenient to deal with the Derby for next year "in form and pressure." The "odds" for that event for 1847 consist of Day's Scott's, Dawson's, Stebbing's, and Kent's at Newton, Swiss Boy, Sylvan, The Pet of the Fancy, Wood-Nymph, Hurricane, and Athelstone.

Dawson's.—Eveling colt, The Spaniard, Margery colt, Emigrant's dam colt, Darlington, Otterburn, Glvendale, and Emilius colt.

Kent's.—Surplice, Loadstone, Mastiff, Fallow-Deer, Propeller, Blackthorn, Chippeway, and Procrastinator.

Among these are included the majority of those nominations which have found favour with the public—but not all. Beverley does not rate, for example, as one of Stebbing's team; nor is the name of his trainer given in Dorling's list of the great stakes for the forthcoming year. Of the 217 colts and fillies named, with a very few exceptions, the force is in winter quarters favourable to its taking the field with éclat in the spring. The training grounds are in the four divisions of the kingdom—and the science and skill occupied in the process, are furnished by the most eminent artists in the line to be found in the world. The raw material is derived from the peerless studs of this land of the wood: vast capital is lavished on its production and adaptation to the course—and, with what result? A handful of individuals who make the Turf a business, and to whom it has not even been a source of honest betterment, with the Dunsbury Hero as an advance-guard, an animal bought for the price of a donkey. This year, Mr. Pedley—a professional turfite, won the Derby and Mr. Drinkald, the Chester Cup, with an old screw, repudiated by Mr. Crockford as one on dit went. Now, these very modern instances are adduced to show the folly and purpose of the very modern Turf. Success upon it, as aforeshown, forms and purpose of the very modern Turf. Success upon it, as aforeshown, must have arisen from either good luck or good guidance. None of the race-horse—quoted as great winners in the last two years are breeders of the race-horse—upon any scale to merit the name. They managed well; this by means or an accomplished trainer—that by means of a lucky handicap.

For this reason policy should be the watchword of the speculator. Mankind just now are crazed upon two matters, racing and railroads. They will have their lotteries and their lines. In their Turf investments, then, they will do well to weigh when they wager upon, and not what. In some sort or other, so it affects the public, every popular racing issue is now made a job. The St. Leger is always a job generally a bad one—for the miscellaneous Ring. Ditto, the Chester Cup; ditto, almost always, the Derby; and the Oaks, if less obnoxious to suspicion, is only so because it is not an event over which speculation ranges for any length of time. Give your adversary fifty private racing stables, and take yourself five public ones; so shall your book at least furnish negotiable names. It is well at the beginning of hostilities to counsel those likely to be assailed. Of all forlorn hopes, the most desperate is that volunteered by the backer of a horse who selects him on his merits. Let him shut his eyes to pedigree and performance, and be wide awake to men and measures.

> In other days—when men and things were "slow —
> Money, they say, would "make the 3 fly go;
> With power augmented now, it makes the colt
> Or fast or slow, run fleet, or fall—"both."

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY. A dull market, and no material change, except in War Eagle, who was in more favour for the Cambridgeshire than for the Cesarewitch; and Rob Roy, who sprung several points, and, at the close, was as good a favourite as anything, bar War Eagle.

THE CHAMPIONSHIP OF THE THAMES.—THE MATCH BETWEEN COOMBES AND NEWELL.

This four-and-a-half mile match, from Putney to the Ship at Mortlake, for £100 aside, and for the title of champion of the Thames, came off on Wednesday, under most favourable circumstances, and in the presence of a very large assemblage of aquatic amateurs and the public. For two or three hours previous to the time (half-past four) named for starting, every conveyance by land and water from London to Putney was crowded by persons repairing to witness the contest. One steamer, the Childe Harold, carried the umpires and referees and partisans of Coombes, and another, the Lalla Rookh, bore the friends of Newell. Between them continuous volleys of what is called "chaff" were kept up, which were allayed by the tasting defiance of bets, 5 to 4 being offered on Coombes, and in many instances being accepted by the friends of Newell. Lager odds, however, were required to make the betting general. The boats of each weighed under 40lb., and were 30 feet 6 inches long; the men have been for the last month in active training, and latterly such speed had been attained by them that it was found necessary (in order fully to test their qualities) to bring well-manned four-oared cutters against them. The condition of each seemed excellent the weight of Coombes was 9st., that of Newell 9st. 13lb.; the age of the former, 38; of the latter, 36. Newell had the advantage in weight, strength, and youth; but up to the day of the match had been regularly engaged in his occupation, as corn porter; this, added to the severe exercise required in training, may in some measure explain the result of the contest. Coombes, who is a hawker of coals, could afford leisure and such a system of training as would reserve his strength for gaining the important prize of £100.

Precisely at ten minutes to five the men started themselves from Putney-bridge, Coombes taking the Middlesex side, and Newell the Surrey. They acted very evenly, the sculls dashing simultaneously through the water, and for the first fifty strokes wapped through like lightning, neither seeming to have gained any advantage. Coombes, off Batchelor's, had forced his boat a foot in advance. Newell, at Searle's, had, by dashing rowing, spurted up to his opponent's sculls, and presently shewed slightly in front. Both men now settled well to their work, and off Fiselder's a splendid scull-and-scull race ensued—both men too much on the Surrey side—when Coombes cleverly altered his course, and by superior steerage succeeded at the Point in drawing his best clear of Newell. The cheers for both men were now perfectly deafening, and, stimulated to fresh exertions, Newell put on a terrific spurt, and at the Crab Tree nearly ran into Coombes, but was obliged to alter his course, and by so doing lost ground; and Coombes, inspired by a dawning hope of victory, rallied again, and fairly had his boat a clear length ahead The pace up to this point had been so tremendous, that many thought the stamina and constitution of Newell would carry him through successfully. But Coombes, much ahead, husbanded his powers, increasing his lead almost imperceptibly, and at Hammersmith-bridge was three lengths ahead; and though Newell never appeared to relax efforts that were almost painful to witness, Coombes shot by the flag-boat at Mortlake seven or eight boats' lengths ahead. The match, which was rowed in a strong spring tide, and with a leading wind, south-east, was accomplished in the very short time of twenty-three minutes and thirty seconds.

H. R. H. PRINCE ALBERT LANDING AT THE ALBERT PIER.

THE PORTSMOUTH, PORTSEA, AND GOSPORT HOSPITAL.

MONDAY last was the day appointed by his Royal Highness Prince Albert for the interesting ceremony of laying the Foundation Stone of the above Institution. The weather was beautiful throughout, and the event drew vast crowds of spectators.

The arrangements for the ceremony were admirable. At half-past three o'clock, a guard of honour from the 52nd Regiment, accompanied by its band, arrived at the Albert Pier, Portsea, where the Prince was expected to land, for the first time. There were also present, to receive his Royal Highness, Admiral Sir Charles Ogle, Lord George Lennox; Mr. Grant, Chairman of the Committee of Management of the Hospital; Colonel Lewis, who, as senior officer, attended for Lord Frederick Fitzclarence; Captain Chads, Major White, and the Deputy-Chairman (Dr. Scott), the Secretary (Mr. Ford), and the Directors of the Pier Company. Within two or three minutes of the appointed time, the Fire Queen arrived alongside, commanded by Lieutenant Johnson, and his Royal Highness was received with salutes from the battery and the Victory, whose yards were manned, the band playing the National Anthem. The Prince having entered his barge, was received by the gentlemen already mentioned, and conducted to Sir Charles Ogle's carriage, which awaited him at the gate. Upon his arrival at the Common Hard, the immense multitude welcomed his Royal Highness with the most hearty cheers as he entered the Admiral's carriage, accompanied by his two gentlemen in waiting. He proceeded through St. George's-square, St. James-street, Lion-gates, Union-road, and Commercial-road, to the site of the Hospital, near All Saints' Church. On arriving on the ground, his Royal Highness was received by the Mayor of Portsmouth, Benjamin Bramble, Esq., the Aldermen and Councillmen, the Warden of Winchester College, the Dean of Winchester, the Vicar of Portsmouth, the Rev. J. P. M'Glue, a large body of the local Clergy, Lord George Lennox, Mr. Grant, and the heads of departments. On ascending the platform, the Prince was greeted with three hearty cheers, after which the Mayor read a congratulatory address from the Mayor and Corporation of Portsmouth, to which the Prince replied as follows:

"I have received with much pleasure your address. I very willingly consented to lay the first stone of the hospital in your borough, for nothing can be more gratifying to my feelings than to be able to promote and encourage the useful and charitable institutions of the country; and no undertakings can be more deserving of such a description than those that provide refuge, assistance, and medical skill for sufferers under the combined misfortunes of poverty and sickness."

The Warden of Winchester College, (the Rev. R. S. Barter, D.C.L.) then offered an appropriate prayer. At its conclusion, Mr. Grant handed to the Prince an elegant silver gilt trowel; the other requisites being handed to the Prince by Mr. Absalom, the contractor, in the absence of the architects, Messrs. Owen and Livesay. The Prince then proceeded with his work; and the stone having been laid with the usual formalities, the following prayer was pronounced by the Warden of Winchester:—

"We thank Thee, O Heavenly Father, that Thou hast enabled us to lay the foundation-stone of this building, sacred to Thee, and to the wants and sufferings of Thy people. Be pleased to watch over its progress, to protect those who shall be engaged in it, from all accidents, and to bring it to a happy end; and, as Thou hast put into the hearts of Thy servants this good desire for the relief of the sick and needy, so of Thy free mercy bless and reward them for that which Thou hast Thyself inspired. Bless, O Lord our Gracious Queen, grant her a long life, and a peaceful and happy reign. Bless the illustrious Prince, her Royal Consort, who has given himself to this good work, remember him concerning this, and be to him a strong tower of defence, against every enemy. Bless Adelaide, the Queen Dowager, Albert, Prince of Wales, and all the Royal Family. Counsel and defend this Church. Most gracious nation, O God, fearing Thee, adorning the profession of Thy Son, and spreading it over all the world. Bless our fleets and armies, and defend us from all dangers. Let Thy special blessing rest upon these towns, that their inhabitants may be happy and prosperous, agreeing in the truth of Thy Holy Word, and living in unity and Godly love. O God, save Thy people and bless Thine inheritance through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen."

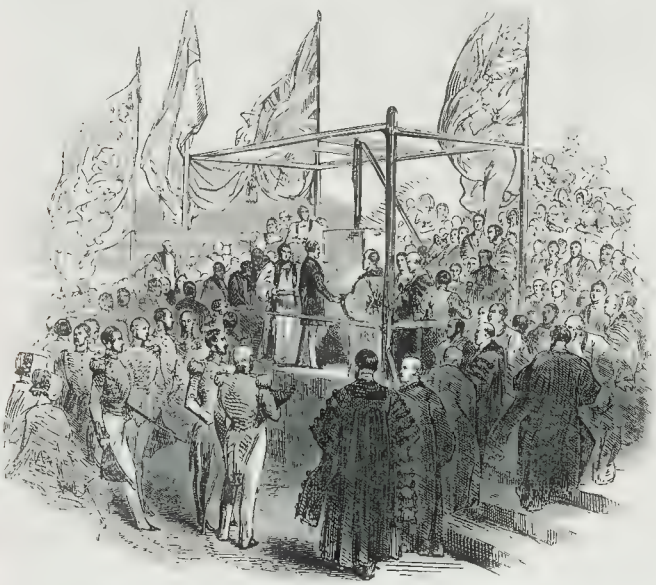
His Royal Highness, with his cortege, then left the ground, and embarked for Osborne on board the Fire Queen, which left the pier under similar salutes with which she approached it.

The whole of the arrangements were very satisfactory, and the amount taken for tickets must have been considerable, as the various platforms and sittings were capable of accommodating about a thousand persons, and all appeared crowded. The excellent band of the Royal Marines was on the ground, and played several airs.

MONUMENT TO THE POET, CRABBE.

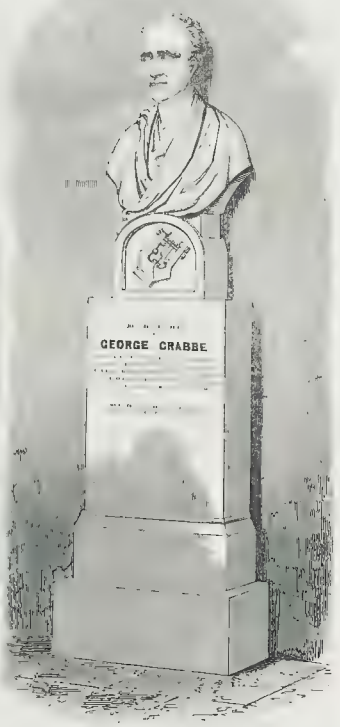
THIS artistic Memorial to the Rev. George Crabbe, "the Poet of the Poor," has just been placed in the church of Aldborough, in Suffolk, his birthplace. The Monument consists of a marble bust from the chisel of Mr. Thurlow, jun., of Saxmundham. It stands upon a stone plinth, bearing a sculptured unstrung lyre of antique model, and the following inscription, from the pen of the Rev. J. Mitford:—

To the Memory of
GEORGE CRABBE,
The Poet of Nature and Truth, this Monument is erected,
By those who are desirous to record their admiration of his Genius,
In the place of his Birth.
Born, December 24th, 1754. Died, January 29th, 1832.



H. R. H. PRINCE ALBERT LAYING THE FOUNDATION-STONE OF THE PORTSMOUTH, PORTSEA, AND GOSPORT HOSPITAL.

The bust is admirably executed, the heavy eyebrows being strongly characteristic of the physiognomy of the Poet. The cost of the Memorial has been defrayed by public subscription—a tribute highly creditable to Crabbe's fellow townsmen.



MONUMENT TO THE POET CRABBE, IN ALDBOROUGH CHURCH.

The name of the sculptor, by the way, reminds one of Lord Thurlow's profane coarseness, when he presented Crabbe with two small livings in Dorsetshire; the Chancellor telling him, as he gave them that, "by God, he was as like Parson Adams as twelve to the dozen."

FONT IN THE CHURCH OF ST. JOHN, WESTMINSTER.

THE elegant Font of which the annexed is a representation, has lately been presented to the Church of St. John, Westminster, and is erected at the western end of the centre aisle. The outline of the bowl of the Font is peculiarly elegant; its graceful form being enriched and varied by the introduction of winged angels, in devotional attitudes, at the four sides, one of them bearing a cross symbolical of faith.

NEW FONT AT ST. JOHN'S CHURCH, WESTMINSTER.

The ornamentation of the bowl is simple, but elegant; and round the rim a leaf moulding is introduced with good effect. The top of the Font is three feet two inches in diameter. The shaft supporting the bowl is fluted, and rises from a plinth of Sicilian marble; the Font itself is of statuary marble. Including the plinth, the Font is three feet ten inches high, and, standing on a step of Anster stone, is protected by a brass railing of very nice design and character.

To Charles Barry, Esq., jun., the merit of the design is due; whilst to Mr. J. Thomas, of Lambeth, great praise must be awarded for his skilful realization of the architect's design, especially for the exquisite delicacy of style in which the demi-angels are chiselled. The gift is a most beautiful one to the Church, and does honour to the taste and devotion of the donor.

THE ALTITUDE AND AZIMUTH INSTRUMENT.

The Royal Observatory, at Greenwich, was founded for the special purpose of making lunar observations, as aids to navigation, to enable persons at sea the better to determine the longitude. This object has been steadily kept in view from that time to the present, and the whole of the existing theories and tables of the moon are based entirely upon the observations which have been taken at Greenwich Observatory. Till the Astronomer Royal devised his Altitude and Azimuth Instrument these observations could be taken only whilst the moon was passing the meridian, so that she might be shining brightly for many hours, yet, if she were obscured by clouds during the few minutes she would be visible in the field of Telescopes fixed in the meridian, no observations could be taken: and thus, very many observations were lost. This was felt by the Astronomer Royal as a matter of so serious a nature that he has devised the above Instrument, which is found to have such a degree of solidity and steadiness that the moon can be observed in any part of the sky, and thus rendering this important series of observations more complete. We understand the Instrument is considered as a triumph in astronomy.

The following explanation of the different parts of the instrument has been received from the Astronomer Royal:—

The instrument is supported on a three-rayed pier of brickwork, built on a separate foundation from the walls of the Dome, and having no connection with it from the ground. This pier is raised to within a small distance of the floor of the Dome, so as not to be touched by the joists of the floor, which are supported entirely by the wall of the Dome. The internal diameter of the Dome is about 12 feet, and the sides of the triangle formed by joining the extremities of the rays of the piers are each about 8 feet. Upon the top of the three-rayed pier is planted an iron framework, consisting of three rays, connected at their extremities by three sides, welded in the same piece: this iron work thus forms a triangle, whose sides are about 8 feet, and which has pieces radiating from the centre in the same piece of metal. Upon each side of this triangle is erected an iron triangle, attached by screw-bolts to its angles, and rising above its plane about 11 feet. The points forming the vertices of these three triangles correspond to the three angles of another horizontal triangle, attached to them, but lying in such a position that its angles correspond to the sides of the lower triangle. The sides of this upper triangle are in one piece. In another piece are the three rays drawn from the centre to the angles of the triangle: they rest in forks at its angles, the ends of the rays being cut with screw threads, so that they can, by means of nuts, be drawn endways. At the centre, and welded in the same piece of metal, is the Y for the upper pivot of the azimuthal motion, into which Y the pivot is forced sideways by a piece of steel screwed upon it, whose spring insures perfect bearing.

On the centre of the rayed brick pier is planted a circular stone pier, three feet in diameter. In the top of this are inserted three solid metallic forks (one of which is seen in the drawing), which receive the ribs of the lower fixed circle. This circle is a strongly-ribbed frame of bell-metal, cast in one piece, 3 feet in diameter, and 6 inches deep, with a conical hole for the bearing of the lower azimuthal pivot, a racked ring for pinion-action, and a graduated ring at its circumference.

The lower part of the azimuthal frame consists of a strongly-ribbed flat of cast iron (the ribs being on its lower side, and 3 inches in depth), with a vertical pivot, having a hemispherical end to work in the conical hollow of the lower circle. The upper surface is planed. This basis carries the clamp-screw and the slow-motion pinion, and the four micrometer microscopes for reading the lower circle. These microscopes are cast in the same piece with the basis: they were bored out after being cast. The part of each microscope which sustains the pressure of the micrometer-screw is included in the same cast.

The two uprights consist of two semi-cylindrical pieces, with their upper and lower ends planed, each about 4ft. 6in. in height, its breadth about 2½ inches, and its depth 10½ inches. The semi-circular part is solid and strong: the flat side of the semi-cylinder is much weaker. One of these uprights carries four microscopes for reading the vertical circle, and blocks for supporting the levels transverse to the horizontal axis. Each also carries a bracket, on which the Y for the horizontal axis is fixed by one powerful screw, and blocks for the levels parallel to the axis. Each vertical, with the parts which have been mentioned, is cast in one piece. The vertical which does not carry the four microscopes, carries the circles in which the clamp-screw and slow-motion pinion act. The upper connection of the uprights is by a flat piece, 9 inches broad in the middle, ribbed, and carrying the upper pivot.

Upon the upper connecting piece are two levels parallel to the horizontal axis resting on blocks which are near to the outside extremities of the vertical pieces. Two additional levels, parallel to those just mentioned, are placed at the bottom of the vertical pieces.

Two levels transversal to these, and to the horizontal axis, are placed on the outside of the vertical which carries the four microscopes, resting on blocks attached as near as possible to these microscopes.

The part moveable in altitude may be described as a transit-circle of great solidity. It consists of a double cone, (each cone being widened to a flat at its base) a dated circle, its pivot, and the two ends of the telescope), is cast in one piece, and the rest in another piece. The axis of this part is horizontal: its pivots rest upon the two Y's carried by the brackets which are cast on the two upright sides. On the side opposite the graduated circle, and near to the eye-end of the telescope, are the clamp-screw and the head of the pinion for slow motion. The diameter of the graduated circle is 3 feet. The length of the Telescope is about 4 feet.

The Telescope has in its field six horizontal and six vertical wires.

Friction wheels are placed beneath the ends of the horizontal axis. The circular form of these pivots has been most severely examined by micrometer microscopes, which are placed opposite to their ends, and are made to observe two rectangular co-ordinates of the motion of a dot on the pivot, at small angular intervals, during a revolution of the vertical circle. The pier (screwed to the uprights) which carries one of these microscopes is constituted in the same case of stone.

By means of combinations of plane reflectors, the light of a large Argand lamp, supported by one of the uprights, is made to illuminate the fields of all the micrometers, and the two circles, while it directly illuminates the field of the telescope. A light-moderating apparatus is used for diminishing the intensity of the light in the field of the telescope, when it is found to be necessary.

The principal points which have been aimed at in the contraction of this instrument are the following:—First, to construct it in as few pieces as possible; all the important parts being united as far as possible in the same case of metal: in this respect it is remarkably different from the instruments made in late years by English artists. Secondly, to make no union of important parts by small screws. Thirdly, to have adjustments to be made by the observer; all the adjustments being effected as nearly as possible by fixing, and the observations being so arranged that the remaining errors can be determined from the observations themselves. In a word, firmness is the object to which nearly every part of the construction is directed

An instrument thus constructed is necessarily ponderous. The weight of the moving parts of this instrument exceeds three-fourths of a ton. But its motion is perfectly easy.

It is impossible for us here to enter upon all the technicalities of the astronomical use of such an instrument. It will be sufficient to state that if the azimuths both of a high star and of a low star be observed in both positions of the instrument (that is, with the graduated face of the vertical circle Right and Left), and if the altitude of each star also observed in both positions (the sidereal time being always observed), then every error of adjustment can be determined, and every observation of the moon or a planet can be made perfectly available.

In the drawing are also the steps useful for ascending to the upper part of the instrument. These steps run on wheels freely around the pier, being attached to it by a ring of iron fastened to them, and which encircles the pier. They are stopped in any required position by a bracket, of which the handle is seen in the drawing.

The upper or rotating part of the dome is drum-shaped, and moves on cannonballs. It turns with so great facility that it has been found necessary to attach to the bar used for giving it motion, a racked bar, which can be fastened to studs placed at intervals round the interior of the Dome

The levers are also exhibited, by which the vertical and horizontal shutters to the Dome are opened and closed.

The instrument has now been in use for some time, and seems fully to answer the design of its erection, having observed places of the moon or other bodies when at a distance from the meridian, comparable in accuracy with those deduced from observations made with meridian instruments of the best class.

FLYING SHEETS FROM A TRAVELLING CONTRIBUTOR.

MUNICH, September 24th.

If you ask an inhabitant of Munich, he will tell you that this city is, at the present moment, particularly dull; by which he means that every one of note in the fashionable and artistical world is spending the remnant of the autumn in the country, and that of this number there will be the usual quantity of absentees from the streets, for the customary stir in the gay world, for the full Munich quota of balls, public concerts, and private musical meetings, and all the other agreeable amusements wherewith the Bavarian capitalists contrive while away the time. So far he is right; because the King and Court are not here; even Lola Montez is rusticating at some bathing place or country seat; and, except that the National Theatre (for which operas and dramas are given alternately) has not yet opened, and that you hear from every house at night sweet sounds that indicate the extent to which music is cultivated here, there is nothing ostensibly going forward, to rouse me from that drowsy state of mind which I have myself so often censured in the people of Munich, and which I am afraid I shall myself be guilty of before I have done with them. Should it happen to be on opera night, he is in great luck, because for a florin (a. 8d. English) he can procure a stall, and hear the best music of the German, Italian, or French composers, admirably executed by a first-rate band, conducted by that Napoleon of Bandsmen, Lachner, and by a chorus of which we have not the superior in England: if the singers are not always quite so excellent as those to which we may have been accustomed at either of our Italian Operas. But if it be a night when the national drama only is performed, (and in Germany, they do perform the national drama), heaven help our unfortunate traveller! He has come here to "dig" Munich; until he has taken a coup d'œil of everything identified in it by his Murray, he remains spellbound in the place, be he ever so tortured by ennui. The Bavarians are a Bahlfleisch-eating and beer-drinking people; they dine at twelve or one, and sup at seven or eight, retiring to bed just at 10 o'clock: and our Anglishman wants to begin the night. He cannot go to the beer-houses as "late" men of all classes do here, because the thin beer disorders his well-disciplined English stomach, and the dense clouds of smoke suffocate him, so he sits at the public table of his hotel, and drinks brandy and water and smokes his cigar, till, although not wanting to sleep, he takes to his bed at about nine, as a mere alternation against positive inanition.

But to a man who loves art, and is interested in character, there is a mine of amusement, even in this "dull" season. Of course, it is quite out of the question to crowd into a single letter a description of the treasures this capital contains; let us go as far as we can at present, and leave the rest for another communication. First, for the external aspect of the place. There is enough of the ancient, with its quaint buildings, ruins of fortifications, and fine ancient city gates, to interest a lover of the antique, although Munich will not compare, in this respect, with other continental cities, and more especially with Nuremburg and Augsburg, in Bavaria itself. But the new city which surrounds, and to a certain extent interpenetrates a part of the old town, is really a congregation of massive and beautiful edifices, which has outgrown any thing I ever saw in point of architecture. The present King is the architect who has conjured up all this magnificence. He is a man with the grandest ideas, which he has realised in stone and marble. He has stamped the character of his mind upon his capital in indelible characters. There is no instance of the kind on record in modern history, if we except, perhaps, Napoleon's architectural embellishments of Paris; but, when we come to consider the means of the two men, we must yield the palm to Louis of Bavaria, who has thus, by the mere force of his will, raised a grand temple to the Arts—and especially to Architecture—in the midst of a country which may be called the Scotia of Modern Europe. Napoleon had the wealth of kingdoms at his command; he was supported and encouraged in all he has done by the enthusiasm of a great and highly civilised nation; but Louis of Bavaria has achieved these wonders out of his own private revenues, and in spite of the apathy of his surrounding subjects. Not that we would praise without discrimination. From the massiveness and uniformity of the houses which form the great streets of the new city (compared with which Regent street must almost be called small), there is an air of coldness on all this magnificence, and the streets want that busy life of life which renders London so interesting, as well as that perpetual and ever-varying elegance which makes Paris so beautiful. At first, from the enormous magnificence, by the yet uncompleted scheme, many of the finest streets and grandest buildings appear as if scattered without plan: they look like temples in a desert. If you take only a superficial view of them from a height, they have the air of a city of palaces only, which diminishes; but, contemplate them well, and they grow on the mind till they develop into a Belgravia of palaces, churches, and temples, but brightened and rendered gay and more elegant by the introduction of trees and the near proximity of that beautiful park-like congregation of all the beauties of the artificial landscape, called here the English garden. Rightly to judge Munich, you must remember that it is an embellished city—a garden in which some of the greatest objects only are realised, leaving the rest to the gradual work of time, and the necessities of the population. It is a city built for posterity: a new-created, not dug from the bowels of the earth. Of the magnificent street is there, or can there be, in the world, than the view of the Ludwigstrasse with its Palace, when the triumphal arch at the extreme end shall have been finished: a grand array of churches, of houses like palaces, of public buildings of nations, importance, and finished at the other end with that beautiful facade, by Gartner, in the Byzantine style, the erection of which, as an ornament also by Gartner, in the Byzantine style, the erection of which, as an ornament also by his city, is proof enough of the public spirit of the King. Breast all into detail, and there is food for untiring admiration. The Ludwigskirche, built in the Byzantine style, and with the interior exquisitely gilded and painted, in accordance with the custom of the age: remarkable for its architecture; the Theatinerkirche, a fine specimen, without and within, of the Italian style of church architecture: the chapel of All Saints, also Byzantine; the church of Maria Hilf Parche (in a suburb, and one of the most exquisitely perfect specimens of church architecture, and with internal decorations beyond criticism; the Glyptothek, or sculpture gallery, and the Pynacothek, or picture gallery (both rich with the finest productions of the respective arts); the theatre, the palaces, and numberless other great buildings too numerous to mention, but all which go to complete the rich grandeur of the whole. The only thing wanting to any one man could in his lifetime find the King is yet but sixty, having been on the throne 25 years) have found the time and the perseverance to carry through so many great designs. But he has his reward. Posterity will speak of Louis of Bavaria, not among the monarchs who have been the scourges of mankind, but as among the few who have been their benefactors. It will be enough to say of him—he built Munich, and made it the metropolis of German art.

As I said, my space in the present letter is not enough to dispose of half the subjects I had intended to write upon. The two great galleries, the Pinacothek and the Glyptothek, alone would occupy a letter of the arts as seen before its walls: the cartoons of the numberless beauties they develop to his view. In modern art, the treasures of Munich are mainly confined to the magnificent frescos, which adorn the public buildings, without and within; and the various works of sculpture which the munificence and nationality of the King have induced him to scatter freely over the city. For the best works in the other branches of art Munich is not the repository. The greatest pictures of Aachach, Hess, Flueggen, and others, are painted for private or public purchasers in other parts of Germany. But Munich, from the celebrity conferred on it by the King, has become a sort of University where, as it were, of modern art, where the professors receive those credentials which make their works in demand. But, at the same time, the seekers of those artists contain works on which they are engaged, or which are already finished, quite sufficient to give one the highest opinion of their talents. I speak more especially of Kaulbach, Hess, and Flueggen, in painting, and of Schwanthaler in sculpture. I shall devote a letter especially to the present state of Modern German art as exhibited in the works of those artists who study and paint at Munich. At present it is enough to say that each of the foregoing artists has produced works of the highest order, that would create much astonishment in England. There is also here a weekly exhibition of works by the Ritter Kunst-Verein, of the principal of our Art Union. Among them are one or two pictures of first-rate excellence. Perhaps the most wonderful thing in Munich at the present time is the gigantic national statue called the "Bavaria," modelled by Schwanthaler, and now being cast in bronze—half of the figure is complete. The whole will be 44 feet high! It is not more remarkable for its enormous size than for the elegance of the design, and the consistently beautiful expression on the face.

To night they produce at the great theatre a new five act German play, written [illegible]. All the world are going to see it. The only drawback is the temporary absence of the King; but he will be back in a few days, to preside at the annual exhibition called the Volks-fest—a thoroughly Bavarian exhibition, highly amusing, and characteristic of the people.

MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—A full average quantity of English wheat, or upwards of 4000 quarters, has come to hand for our market this week, and the show of samples to day was of considerable extent. Owing to some increase in the large quantities of foreign on hand, during sale, the demands for a limited number of wheat of home produce was heavy, [illegible]. Monday's quantities of flour is 7s per quarter. Foreign wheat.—The supply of which on offer was extensive—not a very slow inquiry, at is to 2s per quarter less money. Malting barley supported late rates, but grinding sorts continued quite as were very dull, and the turn lower. The trade for malt was steadily in retail, at late currencies. At the supply of foreign oats was great, viz., 40,600 quarters, the trade was very dull, at 6d per quarter decline—a Monday's prices. Beans, peas, Indian corn, small, and flour were very heavy, but not [illegible].

OATS, MALT.—English: Wheat, 4340; barley, 2730; malt, 2200; oats, 950. Irish: Wheat, [illegible]; barley, —; malt, —; oats, —. Foreign: Wheat, 25,760; barley, 6910; malt, —; oats, 50. Flour: 2910 sacks, 3640 barrels.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent red, 48s to 55s; ditto white, 52s to 59s; Norfolk and Suffolk, ditto, 48s to 56s; ditto white, 50s to 56s; rye, 32s to 34s; grinding barley, 22s to 24s; malting ditto, 32s to 35s; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 60s to 66s; brown do., 60s to 64s; ingoes and yorks, 62s to 64s. Chevalier, 67s to 68s. Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 17s to 21s; potato ditto, 22s to 23s. Yorkshire and Cork, black, 19s to 22s; ditto white 23s to 24s; Limerick, ditto, 20s to 23s; ditto, old, 26s to 28s; grey peas, 42s to 44s; maple 42s to 46s; white, 46s to 48s; beans, 46s to 50s, per quarter. Town-made flour, 47s; mashi 42s to 46s; Suffolk, 37s to 42s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 38s to 40s per 280lbs. Foreign.—Dantzig [illegible] to 46s; white, —s to —s; barley, —s to —s; beans, —s to —s; oats, 24s to 28s per barrel; Baltic, 24s to 26s.

The Seed Market.—Owing to the high prices demanded by the holders, the demand for [illegible] has been very limited, and the turn lower. The trade for all kinds, rape excepted, was dull, at late quotations.

Linseed, English, sowing, 50s to 53s. Baltic, crushing, 46s to 49s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 45s to 48s. Hempseed, 32s to 33s per quarter. Coriander, 18s to 21s per cwt. Brown Mustard seed, 6s to 10s; ditto white, 8s to 9s; tares, 3s to 4s 6d per bushel. English Rapeseed (new) £31 to £33 per last of 10 quarters. Linseed cakes, English, £13 to £13 10s ditto, foreign, £9 10s to £10 per 1000; Rapeseed cakes, £7 to £8 5s per ton. Carraway seed, 24s to 26s per cwt. Coriander, 18s to 21s per cwt. Canary seed, 44s per quarter. English Clover-seed, red, —s to —l cwts., —s to —s; white, —s to —s; extra, up to —s. Foreign, red, —s to —s cwts., —s; white, —s to —s; extra, —s per cwt.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the Metropolis are from 7½d to 8½d of household ditto, 5½d to 7½ per 4lbs loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 55s 8d; barley, 31s 10d; oats, 23s 0d; rye, 35s 9d; beans 42s 5d, peas, 44s 4d.

Six Weeks' Average.—Wheat, 55s 8d; barley, 32s 0d; oats, 23s 3d, rye, 34s 0d; beans, 45s 6d, peas, 41s 10d.

Teas.—At several public sales are appointed to take place on the 5th inst., the private contract demand is in a very inactive state, and, to effect sales, lower prices must be accepted. The quantity on offer is large.

Sugar.—In raw sugars a full average amount of business has been transacted since our last report, at very full prices. Refined goods are flat, at 54s to 56s 6d, for brown, and 58s to 59s per cwt for standard lumps. The stock in warehouse is not very large; but the future arrivals are expected to be extensive.

Coffee.—For most kinds, the demand is rather heavy, and, in some instances, the quotations have a downward tendency.

Rice.—Owing to the lightness in the corn trad, rice is very dull, and decidedly cheaper to [illegible].

Provisions.—During the whole of the present week, the inquiry for Irish butter has been in a very dull state owing chiefly to the large arrivals, and prices are not supported. Carlow, Cromwell, and Kilkenny, 86s to 88s; Cork, 84s to 86s; Limerick, 82s to 82s; Waterford, 80s and 82s, 60s to 82s. And Tralee, 80s to 83s per cwt. On board, next to nothing is doing, at 2s per cwt less money. Slugs may be quoted at 82s to 84s; and Barlow and Clonmel, 76s to 78s per cwt. Dutch butter is in good supply and 4s to 4s per cwt lower. Fine Friesland, 98s to 102s; and other sorts, 78s to 96s per cwt. Bacon is in good supply, and 5s to 7s per cwt cheaper. Fine Dorset, 102s to 104s; middling and good, 92s to 98s; fine Devon, 96s to 100s per cwt; and fresh, 10s to 10s per dozen pounds. Beef is in a dull state, at 4s decline for the curtail. Mess, 70s to 75s per tierce. Hams are very dull, at almost nominal currencies. Prime bladebrand 70s to 80s per cwt. Pork is in moderate request, at late rates. Lard is very dull, at 2s per cwt decline. Prime leaf, and the best qualities of English cheese, are quite as dear.

Tallow is very heavy, and quotations are lower.

Tallow.—On the whole, the market is firmer, and a few parcels of very superior new fat have produced 46s 6d per cwt. Town tallow, on the spot, is 46s 6d to 46s 9d; and, for forward delivery, 46s 3d to 46s per cwt.

Oils.—There is a moderate business doing in most kinds of oil, at fully last week's quotations.

Spirits.—Jamaica Rum moves off slowly, at 3s 8d to 4s for low and middling, and 4s 2d to 4s for good and fine. East India is in 11d per proof gallon. Corn spirits dull, at 10s 6d nett.

Hops.—Friday.—For all the leading descriptions of Kent and Sussex hops, a fair amount of business has been done, and the turn in favour of the buyers. The few prime Sorts, &c., on offer moved off steadily, at full last week's quotations. Sussex hops were rather heavy sale, 2ls 6d to 3ls per cwt. Weald of Kent, ditto, 42s to 45s; Mid and East Kent, ditto, [illegible] to 4ls; Farnham, [illegible] to 4ls; Bavarians, [illegible] to 4ls; Sussex, [illegible] to 4ls;

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY-LANE.—M. JULLIEN'S [illegible] which, possessing a more permanent interest, must be reserved for [illegible] and Theatre Royal, Covent Garden, he will have the power of carrying out these [illegible] arrangements which he conceives to be desirable for the proper accommodation of the public, and, at the same time, to secure to himself a suitable fund for his future [illegible]. M. Jullien is fully aware of the arduous task upon which he has entered, and of the very serious responsibilities he has incurred in becoming the permanent Lessee of an English National Theatre; but, by providing during the season a variety of Entertainments, and by producing each with the same excellences and completeness which he trusts has characterised his former works, he hopes to secure that approbation and consequent success with which he will compensate him for all his labours and anxieties.

M. Jullien leaves for future advertisements a detailed exposition of his general plans, and in this page merely to announce that his ANNUAL SERIES of CONCERTS, for 1847, will commence on FRIDAY, October 8, and continue for One Month.

The Orchestra will, as heretofore, be complete, and include the most distinguished members of the Orchestras of the Ancient Concerts, the Philharmonic Society, the Royal Italian Opera, and her Majesty's Theatre.

The selections of Music, in addition to that of a lighter character, will embrace the Grand Compositions of the Classical Composers, the gradual introduction of which at these Concerts, and the unanimity manner of their performance, have, it is generally admitted, contributed in some measure, to raise the genius, standard of musical taste in the metropolis.

During the recess M. Jullien has spent some months in Switzerland, and has there composed a NEW DESCRIPTIVE QUADRILLE, to be entitled the SWISS QUADRILLE.

In this will be introduced several purely National Swiss Melodies (many quite new to this country), and also the celebrated RANZ DES VACHES, Sung by those wild Mountaineers on the Alpen Horn, and other rustic instruments of the mountains, collected by M. Jullien during his tour. His SERENTADE of MUSIC for DANCE contains various other novelties, which will be produced during the series.

Many important alterations have been effected in the building, with a view to afford in greater accommodation to the visitors: the Dress Circle has been considerably enlarged by the addition of an open Amphitheatre at the back, and the Private Boxes and Saloons have been rendered more convenient. A new and substantial flooring has been laid down, and the panelled and ornamental [illegible] former counties Chancellor replaced by one more suitable to the Theatre. These arrangements, and the entirely NEW DECORATION of the whole of the interior, have been made in so [illegible] the Superintendence of Mr. GRIEVE and Mr. TELBIN.

THE PRICES OF ADMISSION WILL BE AS USUAL, VIZ.:—

Promenade and Boxes	.. ..	7s. 0d.
Dress Circle	.. ..	5s. 0d.
Private Boxes, 10s 6d; 21s; and 31s. 6d.

The BOX-OFFICE is under the superintendence of Mr. O'REILLY. The REFRESHMENT ROOMS under the management of Mr. Payne. The ILLUMINATION of the House under the care of Messrs. Fairbrain and Co.

The Mouldings and Ornaments employed in the DECORATION are executed by Mr. C. Blakelock, of Wellington-street, by his new patent machine.

FULL PARTICULARS WILL BE DULY ANNOUNCED.

M. Jullien begs respectfully to state that the CONCERTS will continue but for ONE MONTH ONLY, the Theatre being required for the Rehearsals of the GRAND OPERA, the first representation of which will take place on October 30.

ASTLEY'S ROYAL AMPHITHEATRE.—First week of the [illegible] season, and first appearance of the new Dramatic, Equestrian, and Ballet Company Mr. HATTY has also entered into an engagement with the most daring and fascinating Equestrian Artiste, Mademoiselle [illegible] Valentine, who will perform her wonderful Act of Leaping Horses. ANNULAR ECLIPSE OF THE SUN, ON SATURDAY NEXT.

CHART OF THAT PORTION OF IRELAND, WALES, ENGLAND, AND FRANCE, TO WHICH THE SOLAR ECLIPSE OF OCTOBER 9, 1847, WILL BE ANNULAR.—(FROM THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON ALMANACK FOR 1847.)

On Saturday, October 9, a total and annular Eclipse of the Sun will take place, and which will be visible in London and in the south of England.

By reference to the above Chart, the limits within which the Eclipse can be seen annular in Ireland, Wales, England, and France, are shown. It will be seen that the northern limit at which the Eclipse ceases to be annular, passes through Dundalk, London, a little south of Gloucester, a little north of Cardigan, Wexford, and Limerick.

The Eclipse will be both central and annular at all places situated on the line marked "Central Limit of Annular Appearance," and which line passes through Chalons and Rouen, in France, and extends across the Channel from Havre, passing across Cornwall, and just below Cape Clear on the southern coast of Ireland; and will exhibit, at all those places, a beautiful ring of light round the Sun's circumference.

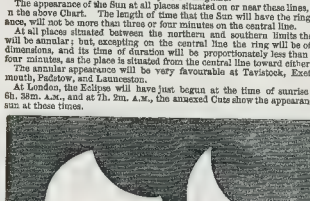
The line of southern limit of annular appearance passes through or near Orleans, &c., in France, and lies wholly below England.

The appearance of the Sun at all places situated on or near these lines, is shown in the above Chart. The length of time that the Sun will have the ring-appearance, will not be more than three or four minutes on the central line.

At all places situated between the northern and southern limits the Eclipse will be annular; but, excepting on the central line the ring will be of uneven dimensions, and its time of duration will be proportionately less than three or four minutes, at the place situated from the central line toward either limit.

The annular appearance will be very favourable at Tavistock, Exeter, Plymouth, Padstow, and Launceston.

At London, the Eclipse will have just begun at the time of sunrise; and at 8h. 38m. A.M., and at 7h. 2m. A.M., the annexed Cuts show the appearance of the sun at these times.

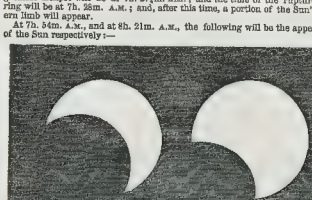


At 8h. 38m. A.M. At 7h. 2m. A.M.

APPEARANCE OF THE SUN BEFORE THE MIDDLE OF THE ECLIPSE.

It is doubtful whether, at some places in the vicinity of London, the Sun may or may not have the appearance of a ring of very uneven dimensions. As the errors of the Lunar Tables may be such at the time, as to cause the limit of annular phase to be several miles in error, and, therefore, the predictive limits generally may be erroneous to this amount. Should the tables be nearly correct, then a ring will appear around the Sun at the southern parts of London, but not at the northern parts. If a ring should be formed, the time of the beginning of this appearance would be a few seconds before 7h. 37m. A.M.; the time of the greatest Eclipse will be at 7h. 27½m. A.M.; and the time of the rupture of the ring will be at 7h. 28m. A.M.; and, after this time, a portion of the Sun's northern limb will appear.

At 7h. 54m. A.M., and at 8h. 21m. A.M., the following will be the appearances of the Sun respectively:—



At 7h. 52m. A.M. At 8h. 21m. A.M.

APPEARANCE OF THE SUN AFTER THE MIDDLE OF THE ECLIPSE.

And at 8h. 48m. A.M., the Eclipse will end.

At all places beyond the limits in the above Chart, a partial Eclipse will only take place. At all places north of them, as in England and Scotland, a large partial Eclipse will also take place. A portion of the upper part of the Sun will be visible, forming a fine crescent with very sharp cusps; and, at all places south of them, a portion of the lower part of the Sun will be visible.

The times at which the several successive steps in the phenomena happen are mentioned below for different places.

The beginning of the Eclipse can only be observed near the eastern extremity of the country—as at Canterbury, Dover, Margate, Norwich, Ramsgate, Sheerness, &c.

A total and annular Eclipse of the Sun, at any particular place, is an event of very rare occurrence. The accounts of those which have been seen are discordant in several particulars; probably owing to the sudden and unexpected appearances that have presented themselves. The difficulty arising from this circumstance, with respect to the phenomena that may be expected in future eclipses, is much increased from the want of drawings to represent the exact appearances that have been seen. As much, however, are much more readily understood than any written description, we refer to the "Illustrated London Almanack" of this year, where all those that have been hitherto made have been collected and described.

For the purpose of observing the Eclipse with a telescope, one of a very moderate power is best. If, in addition, the observer possess a common wa ch, showing seconds, the time of beginning of annularity and end of annularity should be observed, to determine its duration. Particular points of physical interest, to which attention may be directed, would be the fact of the appearance of what Mr. Baily has called "beads" and "threads."—(See "Illustrated London Almanack.") Whether such beads appear steady or waving, disappearing and reappearing, and the number of them. Whether, before and after the formation of the threads, the Moon's dark disc is elongated towards the point of contact What mountains exist at that part of the Moon's limb. The exact intervals of time elapsed between the first and last complete contact; the time of first and last formation of beads, or other irregularities, may be noticed.

For the purpose of observing the Eclipse without a telescope, dark glasses should be used to defend the eye from the intensity of the Sun's light. A piece of smoked common window glass prepared as follows will do:—First let it be wiped dry, and warmed by the fire, as it may crack when applied to the flame of a candle; secondly, draw it gently through the flame, and repeat the same operation, leaving a small portion at one end untouched, and darken the other end the most, and then gradually less and less towards the untouched end. The tings at one end should be the slightest possible; and, at the other, so dark that the flame of the candle cannot be seen through it. Then a darker or lighter part of this piece of glass can be brought before the eye, according as the brightness of the Sun may need it.

Should any person observe, by means of the telescope, any of the preceding, or other phenomena, we should be glad if he would give a description of such.

FINE ARTS.

ELEGY WRITTEN IN A COUNTRY CHURCHYARD. By T. GRAY. Illustrated by the ETCHING CLUB. Published for the Club, by J. Cundall, Old Bond-street.

Gray's "eminently tasteful" Elegy, the top-beam of his poetical reputation, has been, doubtless, chosen by the Etching Club, for the natural scenery, and the exquisitely descriptive passages, which it presents for illustration. Thus, they have found in it ample scope for the genius of landscape-painting, and the portraiture of scenes of ordinary existence, such as readily reach the heart by their touching truth and simplicity. The subjects are twenty-eight in number; and are by Creswick, Stonhouse, Redgrave, Townsend, Cope, F. Taylor, Bell, and Horsley. The Plates present varied excellence of design, as well as skill in transference by etching. The landscape will maintain the superiority of the English school, in this class of composition: the illustration of the first stanza, by Creswick, is full of the characteristics of the poem: the distant church-tower, the lowing herd winding slowly o'er the lea, and the darkening sky, are alike eloquent of parting day: in short, a more poetic picture it would be difficult to conceive. The glimmering landscape, and solemn stillness, of the second stanza, are finely rendered by Stonhouse; and there is a Rembrandtish effect in Creswick's ivy-mantled tower, and moon. The Churchyard is another fine scene, by Creswick, the "rugged elms that yew-trees shade," and the mouldering heaps of the "rude forefath.ers," with the moon glimmering on the church tower and roof, and lighting the distant landscape, are very beautiful. Redgrave has depicted the blazing hearth and the watching housewife—a charming little scene: the children and returning sire, by Townsend, lack distinctness. The Harvest Field, by Cope, is pleasing; as is, also, the felled woods, "beneath their sturdy stroke," by Creswick.

The paths of glory lead but to the grave, is a clever episode of war, by Frederic Taylor: in the foreground, the dying warrior is being borne from the sad scene, while, in the distance, the combat and the pursuit are raging. The "village Hampden" is personified by Cope as a sturdy farmer, with his man, blocking out "the little tyrant" whose game has run into the farmer's fields. The wading "through slaughter to a throne," is rendered by Townsend as the placing of the body of Charles I. in his coffin: the weeping aged shows, by Bell, is poetical. The "longing lingering look," and "the parting soul," are portrayed by Horsley, with much pathos, as a dying son reclining on his mother's breast: on her knees lies the opened book of life. The "peep of dawn," and the nodding beech and bubbling brook, are two exquisite scenes by Creswick and Stonhouse. The "sad array," "in the church-way path," is by Horsley: "the stone beneath you aged thorn" is by Redgrave.

It may be as well to mention that a large number of impressions of these etchings having been lately destroyed by an accidental fire at a bookbinder's, collectors will do well to secure copies early.

PRESENT TO THE PRINCE OF WALES.—During her Majesty's late visit to Scotland the Countess of Erroll had the honour of presenting to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, in the name of her son, the Hereditary Great Constable of Scotland, a Highland sword, denominated a claymore. In virtue of the distinguished office held by the Earl of Erroll, which was granted by Robert Bruce in the year 1315 to his ancestor, his Lordship is, by birth, the first subject in Scotland; and, in right of this privilege, on all State occasions where the Sovereign is present, appears at the right hand, and takes precedence of the entire Peerage of Scotland.

INTENDED ASSASSINATION OF LORD HOWDEN AT MONTE VIDEO.—As Lord Howden, on the 16th of July, was leaving her Majesty's ship Raleigh, to proceed to Monte Video, in order to take official leave of the Provisional Government, a signal was made by Mr. Consul Hood, from the barracks to the ship, in these words:—"The French Minister and the Monte Videan Ministers earnestly entreat the English Envoy not to come on shore, as his life is threatened by the foreigners." Amongst the most barbarous tribes the character of an Ambassador is held sacred; but this universally recognised principle seems unknown to the armed banditti of Monte Video, in whose hands, as indisputably proved by the above signal, is the complete command of the town.

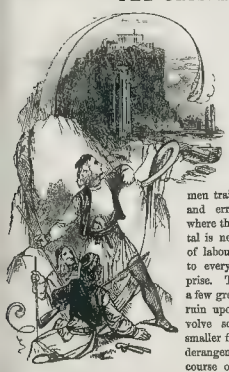
THE CRISIS.



GOING from one system to another is always a process of some peril. Between the abrogation of one and the settlement of the other, there cannot but be a period of embarrassment and uncertainty. The new order of things has to be administered by men trained in another school, and errors are unavoidable where the competition of capital is nearly as keen as that of labour; it rushes in masses to every new field of enterprise. The miscalculations of a few great houses bring down ruin upon them, and they involve scores of other and smaller firms in their fall. The derangement of the usual course of commercial affairs increases, till it becomes what is known as a crisis, a panic, and there is a "pressure," and "tightness" in the money market, one half of it being the effect of opinion, not the absolute absence of means; which continues till the City article of the morning papers becomes only the preface of the next day's Gazette.

It is unfortunate that this period of embarrassment should be coincident with the first developments of the relaxation of commercial restrictions; among those who are hostile to the policy, and with that far greater portion of the public that will not take the trouble to trace things to their real causes, our present difficulties will all be ascribed to the abolition of the Sliding Scale, and the suspension of that moderate duty on corn left after that first and greater abolition. But we have only to recal similar, and even greater crises, which occurred during the time the Protective policy was in all its vigour, to be convinced that a free importation of corn cannot be the sole cause of it, though the necessity for that importation must be admitted as being one of them. The fact is that, whenever a nation spends in a certain period more than it can in that period create by its labour, it must suffer for the excess by embarrassment. What form or direction the expenditure or speculation may take varies with the age and time. Under Sir Robert Walpole, England and France believed that the El Dorado of the Earth was the trade of the South Seas, which now, a century after that madness, is merely a coasting, uncertain, half-buccaneering traffic, carried on by adventurers, not merchants. Yet, visionary as was that old dream of wealth, it sufficed to shake the commercial credit of the two greatest nations of Europe, to demoralise society, and spread a ruin so wide and deep, that two generations scarcely brought a recovery from it. From the middle of the last century, the growth of our manufacturing system seems to have engrossed that energy that must have employment. From the beginning of the Revolutionary War we had no time or money for anything but fighting, or paying for fighting; and armies, expeditions, and foreign subsidies, drained us of our profits; an eternally borrowing Government swallowed all that could be brought to it. When that demand ceased, capital which accumulated found fewer outlets for employment, and then came the rage for foreign loans, which bled England of an incredible amount of millions, poured into the hands of falling Monarchies, or Republics at once rising and rotten—given to any State, in fact, that could pay a loan agent, and put out a prospectus. Of this epoch of madness the traces yet remain—in hundreds of families reduced from comfort to poverty; though these social wrecks are now almost covered by other and more recent, but very similar, instances of destruction. Another hurricane swept over the monied world in the mining mania. All these, periods produced "panics" and "crises," of equal, if not greater, severity than the present, when the general course of business is on the whole, sound, and the public revenue elastic. The departure from the restrictive system in the Corn Trade cannot, then, be the sole cause of our embarrassments.

We have, as of old, been spending too much; though it is with this redeeming circumstance, that we have spent most of it among ourselves. We have not filled foreign treasuries with our gold, or sunk it in the shafts of Mexican mines; it is built into railroads and earthworks, and tunnels. It will, at some future time, create profits; but, at present, it is taken out of the field of commercial transactions; everybody wants money, almost everybody having entered into engagements beyond what they can meet from their ordinary profits. And, in addition, we have had to buy food to the amount—according to Mr. Baring—of eight millions sterling. As neither nations nor individuals can have and spend at the same time, all are in the same difficulty, and all ask how they are to get out of it?

The natural process is to retrench, to work hard, produce and sell, in order to bring back by the course of trade the gold we have parted with. But this is a work of time, and involves a painful sacrifice: some think it better, then, to change our monetary system, and by making rags do the work of metal, and the paper-mill that of the mine, endeavour to solve the problem whether it is not possible to have and to spend both at once. At least, to make the same amount of gold enough for the ordinary business of the country, and added to that, sufficient for a universe of railways, and the occasional drain of a famine, would amount nearly to such a solution. An increase of paper is the only intelligible means of effecting this; the more moderate of the monetary reformers content themselves with claiming a release of the Banking interest from the restrictions of the law, leaving the issue of paper to the judgment of the Bank and the solvency of the traders, but preserving the principle of convertibility; the more extreme theorists soar into regions where we cannot follow them.

Of these two currency doctrines this may be stated; it may be conceded to the first that the law which fixes the proportion of paper issued to bullion and securities in the possession of the banks, has, perhaps, erred on the side of timidity; the Bank of England, for instance, has not, under all the difficulties, used anything like all its resources; it looked with suspicion on all securities, even the most unlimited; it positively refused to furnish one house with notes for silver bullion—an excess of caution that borders on the absurd. And it is exceedingly difficult to distinguish, in the proceedings of the Bank, what it is compelled to do by law, and what it does as a large banking firm, judging the applications for discount by the same rules as other houses. From its constitution, the short term of office of its Chairman, and the fact that so many of them in the last twenty years have been insolvents, we question if, in those things in which it is left free, its policy is marked with absolute wisdom. Certain it is that the observers of our present condition are neither discouraged nor greatly alarmed. The reaction towards improvement has begun, and, as the exchanges increase in our favour, will become confirmed. The Bank itself is relaxing, and opening its hand—one finger at a time. Beyond the over-speculations in corn, and the drain of railway calls, which alone explain most of the recent failures, it is asked—what is the cause of so much embarrassment, when there is neither social nor political alarm? "Is the Constitution of the country in peril? Are we in hourly expectation of a hostile invasion? Is the whole social economy of the State threatened with violent disruption? In common, we believe, with the rest of the world, we are quite unconscious of the imminence of any of these great misfortunes. Descending then to a lower order of evils—Has some desperate suspicion of the resources and solvency of the Bank of England taken possession of the public mind? Has a foreign demand for gold reduced the metallic treasure of the country to the brink of exhaustion? Does an inveterately adverse Foreign Exchange compel the Bank Directors to guard the integrity of the legal standard by most severe restraints on their business of discount? Decidedly not. There is no discredit attaching to the Bank; there is no foreign drain; and, so far from their being an adverse exchange, the quotations have already turned the stream of the precious metals in our favour." Such are the questions asked by the Correspondent of a contemporary. Greater freedom of action for the Bank, it is said, is all that is needed; but is it consistent that great body with more liberty would have been more bold or liberal? That is the point, and brings us, as in many other things, from institutions to men, in whose ability and wisdom the true value of institutions mostly resides. If it can be proved that the law ties the hands of the Bank from a wise course of action within the limitsof prudence, the establishment ought to have fair play, by being released from its fetters. No theory of the currency is involved in such a course as this; and, therefore, the paper doctors despise it, and can see safety only in a total change of our system, in which we can by no means agree with them.

RUSSIAN COURIER.

INTELLIGENCE has just been received, by private letters (in the Times) of the 24th of September, stating that the cholera continued to advance, and nearly by the same route by which it appeared in 1831. It had reached within the environs of Toula, distant forty miles from Moscow. Its intensity differed according to the localities. As formerly, the greater number of victims belonged to the poorer classes—above all, those addicted to the use of spirituous liquors; but it also attacked persons in easy circumstances. It was believed in St. Petersburg that none of the persons who might be condemned for the insurrection in Galicia would be executed; but the reserve of the Emperor to exterminate the Polish nation by indirect means was fixed.

The Portrait Illustration upon the preceding page is from the characteristic pencil of M. Manuel. It represents one of the Imperial Russian Cabinet of the Emperor of Russia. They wear a military uniform, with official epaulettes, according to their grade. There are constantly a certain number of these Couriers in attendance at the chamber of the Imperial Palace, to be dispatched as occasion may require. These are confidential persons, and they receive their orders direct from the Emperor; and at any hour of the day or night they are ready to receive instructions for departure, or for delivery of their despatches. At each post, there are relays of horses specially kept for these Couriers, whose approach is announced by a bell, suspended from a circle above the head of the conductor.

They travel with suprising rapidity, and they often receive large sums of money for their services.

The Illustration shows the Courier seated, and the mode by which he carries the despatches—in a leather bag: the car, driver, and horses, are alike characteristic portraitures.

IRELAND.

THE REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—At the meeting of the Repeal Association, on Monday, Mr. John O'Connell remarked upon the state of the country. He said the Lord-Lieutenant, in his replies to public addresses, had thrown out something like a challenge to the Repeal Association to argue the question with him. He (John) did not see why they should not have an address to his Excellency, setting forth the state of the country, and showing that nothing but the Repeal of the Union could permanently serve it. (Cheers.) Let them show that there was nothing for the salvation of Ireland to say, and England too—but the restoration of the Irish Parliament. (Cheers.) Let his Excellency look to the present state of England—the most extensive merchants breaking every day—insolvency and bankruptcy overtaking her manufacturers and traders—her railways likely to be stopped for want of means to carry them on in short, a panic such as had never been witnessed there before. (Hear, hear.) There were other signs of the times which by England should not be disregarded It was their duty to place all these facts before the Lord-Lieutenant, and show him the advantages that would accrue to both countries from the Repeal of the Union. (Hear, hear.) He had respect for the private character of Lord Clarendon, but he did believe he was profoundly ignorant of Ireland. He was surrounded at the Castle by what was called the Irish Whig party—men who knew no other course than to bark in with every ignorant prejudice, in order the better to pay their court to him and the Ministry with which he was connected. The Association rent was £66.

MID-DAY MURDER NEAR CAHUEL.—On Saturday last, Mr. William Roe, J.P., barrister, was murdered at mid-day, near his place at Rockwell, adjoining Boyounagh, three miles from Cahuel. He was an excellent country gentleman. His father-in-law, Mr. Clarke, of Nenagh, was murdered about two years ago. The cause assigned for this murder is, that Mr. Roe had ejected a man named Lonergan, who had refused to pay him any rent for a considerable period. Lonergan has absconded. Four men have been arrested on suspicion of being concerned in the murder, and committed to gaol. An inquest was held on the body of the deceased, on Monday, when a verdict was returned of "Wilful Murder against person or persons at present unknown." The body presented an awful spectacle. There were eleven slug wounds upon it, two of which penetrated the heart, two the back of the ear, which came out through the cheeks, and the rest in various parts of the body.

MURDER IN FRANCE BY THE COUNT DE GOMER.—The French papers state that Count Gustave de Gomer, who resides at the château of Wolphus, Ardres, near St. Omer, has murdered a child under the most atrocious circumstances. He was out shooting in his wood of La Montoire, when he perceived a poor child in an oak tree, occupied in breaking off and collecting the branches of dead wood. He went to him, crying, "Wilte cqui tout fait on a ramé de ratou," and a long time ago I promised to fire at you, and now I will do it!" The child wept, begged for pardon, and promised that he would ascend the tree no more. But without applying any attention to his prayers, the Count withdrew some steps in order to take a better aim, and pulled the trigger of his gun, as if he were simply shooting at a head of game. The child fell riddled with shot, and bathed in blood. Some persons who were at work in the vicinity, attracted by his cries, and the report of the gun, hastened to give him the assistance which his state called for.

LOSS OF A FRENCH AERONAUT.—A letter from St. Petersburg, of the 21st ult., says—"On the 12th instant, at five in the afternoon, M. Ledet, a young Frenchman, ascended from this city in a balloon, and from that hour to this (nine days) no news of him or his balloon has been received, except that on the following morning, some men, who were fishing in the lake of Ladog, saw a balloon floating in the air above the lake." A St. Petersburg letter, of the 23rd ult., states that no news had, up to that time, been received of the young aeronaut, but his balloon had been found on the Lake of Ladoga by some fishermen. The men, seeing it moving a little above the lake, put off in their boats to the place where it seemed likely to fall. They succeeded in dragging the balloon and car into a boat. The car was found to contain its ballast, but there was neither the parachute, nor the great knife, nor the pistols, which M. Ledet had taken with him. It is probable that the aeronaut had tried to descend with the parachute, on finding himself near the lake, but from nothing having been heard of him, it is feared that he has perished.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, October 5

Notice is given in the Moniteur of this morning that "the King's Government has just exchanged with the Government of his Sicilian Majesty the ratifications of a treaty destined to complete the clauses of the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation, concluded at Naples, on the 14th June, 1845." By virtue of the additional conventions, each of the two countries confers upon the other the national treatment as regards the rights of navigation, and the amount of the duties of importation and exportation on the produce of both kingdoms. Apart from this notification, and the appointment of M. R. Deffosses to the rank of Rear-Admiral, the only official document of last week is a Royal ordinance, dated the 26th ult., which decrees that the centres of population in Algeria may be erected into Communes when they have acquired the requisite importance. But, in this instance, the word Communes is far from having its ordinary meaning, as is proved by a previous ordinance, according to the provisions of which the Mayor and Municipal Council of the Algerine Communes are to be appointed by the King or the Governor-General of the colony. As regards Algeria, it is stated, moreover, that on the 30th ult. a diplomatic communication was addressed, by M. Guizot, to the Marquis of Normanby, in answer to a note of Lord Palmerston, demanding explanations relatively to the nomination of the Duke of Aumale as Governor-General. In this note, our Minister is said to set forth that the appointment of the young Prince implies no change of principles towards England in the question of our African possessions. Meanwhile, the new Governor-General is now on the eve of taking in hand the reins of his Government; for, on the 2nd inst., he was to leave Toulon for Algiers, on board the Labrador. His journey to Lyons has been marked by an unfortunate occurrence. As soon as the passengers of the steam-boat became aware of his arrival, they rose in a body, and the Duke's carriage, in coming rapidly up, struck one of them, named Méplain, and, knocking him down, drove over his body. The Prince at once alighted and paid every attention to the wounded man, whom he saw taken to a cottage by the roadside. He next left 300 francs for the use of the patient, 40 for the woman to whom the cottage belonged; and, upon arriving at Roanne, despatched a medical man to the spot. Although severely hurt, M. Méplain does not appear to be in danger of his life. Like the Duke of Aumale, almost all the members of the Royal Family had left St. Cloud in the beginning of last week; but, after a short visit to La Ferté Vidame, their Majesties, with the Duke and Duchess of Orleans and of Nemours, and their children, came back yesterday to their usual residence, where the King and Queen of the Belgians are expected to-day. As to the Duke of Nemours, he has proceeded to Compiègne there to command the manœuvres of a second camp, consisting of four cavalry regiments. Concerning other personages of high standing, it has been announced that Count Flahaut, the French Ambassador at the Court of Altenburg, had set out for Vienna, after being detained, for several days, in Paris, by the bad state of his health. On another hand, Count Walewski arrived at Brest, on board the Cassini, coming from La Plata.

One of the letters which were brought by the same ship, contains the following important intelligence: "Two days after his reaching Monte Video, Count Walewski was visited by M. Saint-Georges, the Paraguay, who was invested with a mission to him on the part of M. Lopez, the present Director of the Republic. M. Sandoz told him that the object of his journey was to demand for Paraguay the recognition and good offices of France, and he delivered up to him a letter from M. Lopez to the French Government. Count Walewski answered him, it is said, that he would forward to Paris the despatches of M. Lopez: and that, upon the purification of La Plata being over, France would be eager in opening, by a treaty, a course of friendly and regular intercourse with the Republic of Paraguay."

We read in the Phare de la Manche that Captain Page, who is appointed chief of the Bourbon station, and will shortly sail for the Indian seas with the frigate La Reine Blanche, has received instructions for the renewal of our relations with Madagascar, with Admiral Gloide seems to have been successful in knitting again. Captain Page will carry out an official letter with presents for Queen Ranavalo, which he is to deliver if circumstances admit.

I have but two or three unofficial reports to add touching foreign affairs. The Minister of the Navy is said to have addressed a circular letter to the commanders of our naval forces in the Mediterranean, enjoining them to keep a careful watch over their crews, and look to their remaining completely strangers to the events of Italy. To the same motives which have seemed to dictate this step of the Navy is to be referred a new measure of the Prefect of Police. The famous hymn to Pius IX., which was to be sung at the Château des Fleurs (a public place of entertainment) has been interdicted, on the pretext that France wished to remain neutral in the Italian question.

Turning to home affairs, I will mention, in the first place, a recent decision of the Minister of Public Instruction, whereby he awakes at last to the necessity of morally educating the people, as well as of instructing them. A resolution has been instituted by M. de Salvandy for the composition of a book of elementary reading and grammatical exercises, to be used in the primary schools; and, according to the programme, this book must contain such simple notions as may be best calculated to dissipate prejudices, impress young minds with the good order and the respect of the laws, &c., &c., from the up to the practice of all the duties of an honest man and a good citizen. The competitors are to close on the 1st of January, 1849, and a gold medal, worth 6000 francs, will be awarded to the author of the best work.

It is given out that an ordinance will shortly be issued to call together the Chambers on the 6th of December. Several papers are stating that, by a circular communication of the Keeper of the Seals, the Procureurs-General were lately instructed to transmit to them a report on the new association that is being formed against the payment of taxes. The French Society for the abolition of slavery is now at work: it awaits establishing abolitionist committees in the principal cities of the kingdom.

On Wednesday last, the interment of the remains of the ex-King of Holland, and of his son Prince Napoleon Louis Bonaparte, took place, with great pomp, in the Church of St. Leu-la-Forêt (Seine-et-Oise). In the middle of the choir was raised a magnificent platform, on which were placed the two coffins. A violet pall, with a border of ermine and a gold embroidered cross, surrounded by bees, marked the remains of the King; and upon this coffin was placed, besides, a cushion, with the emblems of sovereignty. Four great dignitaries were seated near the platform, one at each corner, holding the cords of the palls. Among the persons present at the ceremony, there were Prince Napoleon, son of Jerome; Princess Mathilde Demidoff Mdme. Wyse; General Artigli; Duke of Padova; Dr. Conneau, the friend of Louis Bonaparte who was confined at Ham; General Secrasky; a Duke; General Oliva, an Italian; and a female who served as a common soldier in the imperial Army, and obtained the decoration of the Legion of Honour in the battle of the Queatre Bras, at Fleurus, where she had received a shot which necessitated the amputation of one of her legs. When the Prince of Montfort quitted St Leu he was the object of the warmest acclamations: his carriage had to work its passage through the crowd which the National Guards and the veterans of the Imperial Army, drawn up in line, endeavoured in vain to keep back. At the sight of the Prince, whose resemblance to the Emperor is striking, all persons spontaneously raised their hats and cried out "Vive l'Empereur! Vive la liberté!"

The Bishop of Nismes has forwarded to the Irish Committee a sum of 7420 francs, the amount of collections made in the churches of his diocese. A further sum will quickly be sent. In the meantime, the names of the subscribers have been registered by our papers. The trial of M. Devrasse, responsible editor of the Courrier Français, upon the prosecution by M. Dumon, the Minister of Finance, and his colleague M. Cunier, for libel upon them, respectively, from the Independant of Brussels, was brought on yesterday before the Court of Assizes. The Advocate for M. Devrasse made an application for a postponement of the hearing for three days, on account of the indisposition of his client; but the Court refused to grant the delay, and the libel was read to the following effect:—"Much at this moment is being said about a certain inscription of 1000 francs ever given and ever withdrawn. Public opinion has, on the day of his marriage with the daughter of the Minister D. This present was made in acknowledgment for the concession of the Northern Railroad." M. Devrasse having made default, the Court proceeded to the hearing of the case, when the Advocate delivered its judgment, condemning the editor of the Courrier Français to twelve months' imprisonment, to pay a fine of 6000 francs, and all the costs of the prosecution.

The activity of our theatres is still on the increase. At the Grand Opera, Poullier, the ex-cooper, has made his re-appearance in the "Muette de Portici, after a long visit to Italy, where his voice seems to have acquired a little more power, without losing its former mellowness of intonation. In the divertissement of the same opera, Mlle Plunkett was greeted with much applause; and a new Spanish dancer, Mdlle. Josefa Soto, performed the "Jaleo de Xeres" with a genuine Andalusian fire. A new ballet ("La Fille de Marbre") is now being rehearsed for Certio. On the 2d inst., the Italiens reopened, as was announced, with "Don Giovanni." Mdme. Persiani, Mdme. Grisi, Persiani, Corbari, Mario, Coletti, Lablache, Tagliafico, all of whom received an enthusiastic welcome. Not quite so successful was the reopening of the Odéon, which commenced the winter campaign with a new drama, by upcoming students, and two new pieces, the more important of which, "Isabelle de Castille," is a tragedy by a dawning poet—M. Jules Baget.

FRANCE.

The Paris papers of Wednesday mention that the King and Queen of the Belgians arrived at St. Cloud on Tuesday, on a visit to Louis Philippe. The Presse says, it appears certain that two of the present members of the French Cabinet are to retire before the next session of parliament, but it does not mention their names. The same journal states, that the post of Governor of Invalides—one of the best in the gift of the Crown—has been offered to Marshal Soult and Marshal Sebastiani, and declined by both. General Petit will, it is said, be appointed.

The Duke d'Aumale arrived at Toulon on the 1st, and was to embark for Algiers on the 3rd. At Marseilles, where he received the members of the Chamber of Commerce, he entered very freely into conversation on the subject of Algeria, and expressed himself strongly in favour of reforms. He announced that the Government had resolved to grant no more mining or other privileges without the sanction of the Council of State. It will be remembered that gross abuse has been hitherto made of the Government patronage in this respect. The Prince also announced that important judicial reforms were preparing for the colony, and expressed a hope that all customs and other duties between the mother country and the colony would be soon abolished.

SPAIN.

The impression that the last Ministry would be of short duration turns out to have been well grounded. The Queen has appointed another Cabinet, at the head of which is General Narvaez. The new Ministry is thus composed:—

President of the Council and Minister for Foreign Affairs, General Narvaez.
Minister of the Interior, M. Sartorius.
Minister of Finance, M. Orlando.
Minister of Public Instruction, M. Roe de Olano.
Minister of War, M. Cordova.

The ordinance which constitutes the new Ministry was published in the Gazette of the 4th.

ITALY.

The news from Italy this week is of an important and gratifying character. There seems very prospect of a favourable arrangement of the chief point in dispute, as the Austrians gave up Ferrara on the 29th ult. to the Pontifical troops. The Grand Duke of Tuscany has changed his Ministers, substituting statesmen of well-known liberality for reactionaries, and has abolished the arbitrary power of the police. The leaders of the Calabrian insurgents have made a proposition to General Straniello to lay down their arms and to return to their allegiance, on condition of an amnesty and the assurance of political reform. In the meantime, however, a good deal of excitement prevails in some of the Italian cities.

On the 24th, and succeeding evening, large assemblages of people took place in Naples, on the Piazza Reale, the Largo della Carita, and the Piazza Santa Croce. Tri-coloured banners appeared, and cries of "Viva Pio IX.," "Italian independence," and "The Constitution," were heard. After these had been dispersed, the town exhibited all the appearances of a place in a state of siege the streets being constantly patrolled by squadrons of cavalry and detachments of infantry, and overrun by the agents of the police. The guards were everywhere doubled, and extraordinary measures of precaution adopted.

It was reported at Naples that Lord Palmerston had addressed a note to the Neapolitan Government, demanding the execution of the guarantees stipulated in 1815 by Great Britain in favour of Sicily. The King was said to have expressed much dissatisfaction at that communication.

Accounts from Florence of the 27th ult., mention the appointment of Count Serristori to be Minister for Foreign Affairs, and the Marquis Ridolfi Minister of the Interior. These measures enjoy the confidence of the people. Their elevation to office had produced the greatest satisfaction.

From Rome accounts are not less satisfactory. They prove the continued determination of His Holiness to assert and defend the independence of his States.

The Journal des Débats in speaking the affairs of Italy, says, "The minds of the people of the peninsula have become more tranquil, and the cause of pacific reform is every day making further progress. The accounts from Naples show that the Neapolitan Government has published very circumstantial reports, from which it appears that tranquillity is re-established in Sicily, as well as in the provinces of Naples; and that the chiefs of the insurrection have surrendered themselves."

The Prince of Canino was put under arrest in Rome on the 23rd ult. The Prince had arrived in Rome a few days previously from Venice, having been conducted to the pontifical frontier by an escort of Austrian Dragoons. His present arrest has been caused by a discovery of the proceedings of the 7th and 8th September. He had just returned from Vienna, from which he had been expelled for his speech in the Scientific Congress, and escorted to the frontier of the Papal States by Austrian Dragoons.

PORTUGAL.

Lisbon letters to the 29th ult., have reached us, but they bring very little news of interest. It seems that the difference between the Duke of Saldanha and the Conde de Tremar has been arranged, and the Electoral Committee of the former coalesces with that of Costa Cabral.

In consequence of the memorial addressed on the 14th ult., by the Liberal Electoral Committee, and the support given to it by the British Minister, the Queen's Government issued, on the 24th, a decree, instituting courts for the registration. This decree has not satisfied either the memorialists or Sir H. Seymour, and a new Ministerial crisis appears to be at hand, created, in a great measure, by the outcry of the Liberals and the remonstrances of our diplomacy.

The British fleet, after a short cruise, had returned to the Tagus, but Sir Chas. Napier was in the habit of making another brief excursion in the course of a few days.

The vintage of the year has commenced at Oporto, and it is pronounced all over the country to be the largest and best that has been known for years. The accounts of the maize harvest are likewise favourable. It is fast progressing, but the quantity will be only about one-half the last year's produce.

SWITZERLAND.

Our advices from Switzerland warrant the belief that a crisis is at hand.

Letters from Berne of the 28th ult. state that a great meeting was held on the plain of Rothenthurm, in the canton of Schwyze, on the 26th ult., which was attended by 8000 men capable of bearing arms, at which it was resolved that the canton of Schwyz would resist the decrees of the Confederation, were it even necessary to take up arms in its defence. It was expected that similar demonstrations would be made in the cantons of Uri, Unterwalden, and Zug. On the other hand, the cantons of Berne, Zurich, and Vaud, are equally determined to force the Sonderbund to submit

A serious affair has already occurred, which threatens to create a collision between the contending parties. It took place before the 18th inst. Some of the national militia of Friburg, returning in a large body from the capital of the canton, had crossed the frontier, and fired a volley of ball cartridge against the people of Albigan. This breach of the peace, had created an immense sensation throughout the country, and the Vorort had in consequence written to the authorities of Friburg that if a prompt satisfaction was not afforded, measures would be adopted to enforce it.

Lord Minto had recently a conference at Lucerne with the representatives of Switzerland, France, Austria, and Prussia. The English diplomatist wished to view with his own eyes the state of affairs, which had been represented to his Government by Mr. Monier and by Mr. Peel in diametrically opposite lights. It is said that he did not long remain in doubt, and that his judgment is entirely favourable to the cause of the cantons. In his official despatch from the English Minister of Foreign Affairs has made the Directory acquainted with the mission of Lord Minto. In this document Lord Palmerston uses terms expressive of great good will towards the Sonderbund cantons, and speaks in a manner most honourable to its President, M. Ochsenbein. His language bears no resemblance to that of M. Rois le Comte. England, it is said, will oppose every species of foreign intervention in the affairs of Switzerland and Italy.

GREECE.

The Malta papers state that the funeral of Colletti took place on the 12th of September, at the Church of Saint Trône His remains were accompanied by the whole diplomatic and consular body, the civil and military authorities, and the deputies and senators.

From the moment of Colletti's decease until his funeral took place, guns were fired every hour.

The funeral was conducted with great ceremony, in the presence of 50,000 people. The journals say that the whole population of Attica came to Athens to witness the solemnity. A Royal proclamation, issued on the 12th of September, prescribed a national mourning of five days.

The news previously received of the appointment of General Travellas, Minister of War, to the office of President of the Council of Ministers, M. Glarakis, Minister of Public Instruction, holds the portfolio of Foreign Affairs. Thus, it appears that no new name had been as yet introduced into the Cabinet.

THE WEST INDIES AND MEXICO

The Teviot steam-ship arrived at Southampton on Thursday, with the West India mail. She brings but little intelligence from Mexico to that received by the Caledonia. The Teviot left Vera Cruz 1st September. The American army were still about three miles from Mexico, awaiting the result of an armistice between Mr. General Scott. Several skirmishes were sent from the city to stipulate for peace, and it was generally supposed matters would be amicably settled. There is no further account of the battles, as the courier arrived at Vera Cruz, from the city, with the news just before the Teviot sailed; it was an English courier, and the Americans at Vera Cruz consequently rely upon the truth of the statement. The Teviot brings only 407,650 dollars, and an average cargo.

THE OVERLAND INDIA MAIL.

The Overland Bombay Mail arrived on Monday morning, with papers from Lahore to the 19th, from Delhi and Meerut to the 18th, Calcutta to the 20th, Madras to the 24th, and Bombay to the 21st of August.

The news is scanty; but it is of a pacific and gratifying character, generally. The country continues tranquil, with the exception of some slight encounters with the marauders on the frontier.

A portion of the Scinde Horse under Major Jacob, and of the Scinde Police under Lieutenant Younghusband, were appointed to watch the northern boundaries. The latter officer, at the head of a body of armed police, attacked a body of marauders about twenty miles from Kussoore. They were bravely received and soundly resisted, but the police specially carried every thing before them. Several of the enemy were left dead on the field, and a few number were taken prisoners. The police lost five horses; eleven were severely wounded. Four men were slightly hurt; no one on our side fell.

Sickness and mortality among the troops at Kurrachee. Hyderabad and Sukkur have been abandoned as European stations altogether. The most profound tranquillity reigns throughout the Punjaub, and the Durbar has just proclaimed the abolition of suttee and infanticide throughout their dominions.

Another most important measure has been resolved upon by the Durbar. Until within the last two years the Sikh army consisted of 60,000 men, with a park of some 300 pieces of artillery. They are now reduced to 34,000 men, 10,000 of whom are irregulars, with fifty guns.

An explanatory minute is just about to proceed into Chinese Thibet. Colonel Lawrence, being too sick to proceed to Lahore, has proceeded to Sanlah for his health; here he will have a parting interview with the Governor-General, who bids adieu to India in January, 1848. A large force is out in quest of the robber Dhoon-gur Singh—a number of whose confederates have been overtaken by Lieut Showers, and captured or shot. He gave much annoyance, but his career seems near its close. Throughout the rest of India profound tranquility prevails. Nearly the whole of the journals have been employed in discussing some recent practices in the Indian navy, the administration of which seems as imperfect as can well be imagined. Treats, cantonment dull. The monsoon was, apparently, almost over. The profuse fall of rain in June and July had not reached expectation, and the supply on the whole was short.

News from Bokhara is said to have reached India in various directions, to the effect that the King had put to death with his own hands the infamous Abdool Samud, by striking him on the head with a small axe, upbraiding him with having instigated him (the King) to take the lives of Stoddart and Conolly.

Sir C. Napier was to quit Scinde about the 12th or 15th of September, so as to join, as was supposed, the Oriental Steam Navigation Company's ship, with the mid-monthly mail, at Alexandria. He was to proceed from Kurrachee direct to Aden, without taking Bombay in his way; the principal portion of his staff were, it is said, to accompany him.

Some troubles have taken place in Nepaul. The ex-King sought to recover his crown, but has been defeated and taken prisoner. The disturbances in the Gumsur districts have been for the present quelled; but the unsatisfactory state of the province scarcely promises a continuance of tranquillity.

COUNTRY NEWS.

Queen's College, Birmingham.—The annual meeting for the distribution of the prizes gained by the students in this institution took place on Monday in the theatre of the college. Lord Lyttelton, the principal, presided, assisted by Mr. Spooner, M.P., the Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel, and Mr. Law, Esq. Among the prizes were two gold medals arising out of the interest of the sum of £1000 placed at the disposal of the institution by the Rev. Dr. Warneford for religious or scientific compositions. The first of these prizes was awarded to Mr. P. H. Bird, of London; the second to Mr. Whittal, of Leamington; to the former was also awarded the sum of £20 by Dr. Jephson, of Leamington, for the essay. The meeting was addressed by Lord Lyttelton, Mr. Spooner, M.P., the Rev. Vaughan Thomas, &c., and at the conclusion of the ceremonial of presenting the prizes, the Vice-Principal, Chancellor J. T. Law, divided the munificent sum of one hundred pounds from his private purse amongst the students who had gained the greatest number Currency Meeting at Birmingham.—On Monday evening, a meeting of bankers, merchants, and manufacturers of Birmingham, took place at Dee's Royal Hotel, in that town. Mr. Alderman Weston in the chair—upon the subject of the currency. Several long resolutions were unanimously agreed to. The purport of them was to condemn Sir R. Peel's Bank Restriction Acts, to which they attribute the present depression of trade and commerce. The resolutions also express the opinion at the meeting that the Executive Government will incur a serious responsibility, unless they at once propose and carry into effect some temporary measure calculated to restore the monetary means and the credit of the country to a sufficient state, and thus to relieve the commercial and trading classes. C. N. Newdegate, Esq., M.P., spoke in support of the resolutions. His sad conviction was that, unless some inquiry was instituted, there could be no prosperity, and a total destruction for property, and he trusted that, when the meetings at which these gave expression to their opinions, and entrusted the Government to save them and their families from ruin, the Minister would grant them at least the common justice of a hearing. (Cheers.)—Mr. Muntz, M.P., said he considered that the people had not been punished half enough as yet, or there would have been more of them present. Great as had been the calamity in the country, it was really the question of bread or no bread on which all their prosperity or adversity depended. Mr. John Taylor, of Bakewell, Derbyshire, then addressed the meeting.—Mr. Spooner, M.P., spoke in support of the resolutions. He sketched at great length the history of the present monetary system, stating, that all his experience since 1810 had confirmed him in the opinion that it was wrong. He asked them to look to the matter—a matter on which depended the happiness of their fellow-creatures, the safety of the nation—nay, he would tell them more, that the crown on the Queen's head was not safe, unless the Ministers took some steps to remedy the evil. (Hear, hear.)—Not more than three hundred persons were present at any time during the meeting, which was got up by the Currency Reform Association.

State of Trade in Lancashire.—The greater part of the cotton mills in Oldham and the neighborhood are working short time, and several manufactories are entirely stopped. The number of hands totally destitute of work is greater than it had been for several years, and the hatting business is equally, if not more severely depressed, than the cotton trade. The manufactures of flax and wool were scarcely ever at so low an ebb. The number of cotton manufactories which are in operation full time is extremely small, and almost daily on the decrease

Fatal Boiler Explosion at Leeds.—On Monday, a boiler explosion, attended with serious injury and loss of life, occurred at a machine-manufactory, formerly occupied by Messrs. Fenton, Murray, and Jackson, situate in Water-lane, near Victoria-bridge, Leeds. The occurrence took place about one o'clock just at the time when the workpeople were returning from dinner. The boiler house, a low brick building, contained two wagon-shaped boilers, one of which exploded, carrying away the roof of the building, and also demolishing the roof of another building, a few yards distant from the boiler-house. The whole of the larger of the boiler was torn from the bottom portion, and carried a distance of between twenty and thirty yards, knocking down the two roofs in its course. Two persons were killed, and three others more or less severely injured. One of the persons killed is the engineman, named Newton; the other is a girl, named Harris, who was going up an entry adjoining the boiler-house, when the explosion occurred. The present occupiers of the manufactory are Messrs. Beacock and Tannett, who have not had it more than four or five months. It is known as the "Round Foundry," and is said to be the oldest foundry in Leeds. An inquest was held on Wednesday, when a great deal of evidence was taken. The Jury found a verdict that "The deceased were accidentally killed by the explosion of a steam boiler, which explosion arose from a deficient supply of water." The Jury added to their verdict a recommendation that in future the boiler should be supplied with water by a common feed-pipe, and not by a force-pump.

An Artful Swindler at Manchester.—On Tuesday (last week), a person calling himself the Honourable Charles Walter Fitzclarence, arrived at the Albion Hotel, Manchester, and remained there until Saturday last. On Saturday morning he went to the Hulme Cavalry Barracks, and having stated that he was a Lieutenant in the 1st Royal Dragoons, then quartered there, and that his servant having deserted from that regiment, and entered either the 11th Hussars or the 69th Foot, he had come to Manchester in search of them, and applied for assistance in apprehending the deserter. He looked at several recruits who had newly joined the 11th Hussars, but not identifying any of them as his servant, he returned to the Albion Hotel, and Lieutenant Dallas, of the 11th Hussars, sent a mounted constable with him in searching for his servant. When the sergeant arrived at the Albion, the Honourable Lieutenant ordered him into the coffee room, gave him a glass of wine, and went out for the purpose of search of the servant of whom he was in search The pretended Lieutenant then went out to make some purchases, taking the sergeant with him. He first called at Mr. Syddall's, haberdasher, Market-street, where he stated that he was Lieutenant Fitzclarence, of the 11th Hussars, son of Lord Auckland, 41, Whitehall-gardens, London, and purchased several stocks, a dozen of shirts, which were to cost nine guineas, and a purse. The stocks and the shirts were to be sent to him at the Albion Hotel; the purse he took with him, as he said that he should want it, being about to get a cheque for £1000 cashed at one of the Manchester banks. The sergeant, seeing him accompanied by a sergeant of Hussars, ordered his representations, and allowed him to take the purse, and he also put the shirts in hand for making. Mr. Fitzclarence next went to the shop of Mr. Hamilton, saddler, Market-street, where he stated that he was Lieutenant as to who he was, and by the corroboration that was afforded to his statements by his being accompanied by the sergeant, he obtained a gold mounted whip, worth £4, and a pair of spurs. He also ordered a trunk to be sent to Mr. Syddall, in which the shirts and other purchases might be packed. In the course of the day, he told the sergeant that he was the nephew of Lord Cardigan, and desired the man to go to Sir Thomas Arbuthnot's and tell Lord Cardigan that Lord Fitzgerald wished to see him at the Albion. The man accordingly went to Sir Thomas Arbuthnot's, but did not find Lord Cardigan there. Mr. Hamilton, during the course of the day, conceived some suspicion as to the gentlemanly character of the pretended Lieutenant; and so, on looking at the Army List, he could find no such person as Lieutenant Fitzclarence in the 11th Hussars, he went to the Hulme Barracks to inquire if anything was known of him there. Not receiving a satisfactory answer, he went to the Albion Hotel, where he saw the Lieutenant, and under pretence of being about to put a five-guinea guard to the fore-carriage, for which Mr. Fitzclarence had ordered a pair of spurs, Mr. Hamilton got possession, and retained possession of his whip. The impostor, however, still kept the spurs. In the course of the evening Mr. Syddall, having also ascertained suspicions, sent one of his young men, named Burns, to the Albion, to tell Mr. Fitzclarence that he could not have his goods unless he previously paid for them. Fitzclarence said that he would pay for them, if Burns would find change for a £1000 note. Burns went upstairs, and having got the required change, returned to the Albion, when the swindler desired him to walk up into his bedroom, and he should be paid. The two then went up into the bedroom, and then Fitzclarence told Burns that he could hire a cab, and convey him (Fitzclarence) and some trunks, which, in fact, were not his, but those of a commercial traveller occupying the next bedroom, to the Hulme Barracks, he should be paid. Burns declined to do this, but went to the Town-Hall, and gave information, in consequence of which the impostor was apprehended by Inspector Mayburry. On being searched at the Town-Hall, a pawn-ticket was found upon him, which he contrived to obtain possession of and tear up before the officer had seen the name upon it. He had a German silver watch-guard round his neck, the end of which was inserted in his waistcoat-pocket, as if a watch were suspended to it; there was, in reality, however, only two brass seals upon it. He was examined by the magistrates on Thursday, when it was stated that he was not, as he had represented, an officer in the Hussars, but had formerly been a private in the Marines on board her Majesty's ship Victoria, whence he had deserted, and enlisted into another regiment, from which he had again become a deserter. The magistrates committed him for trial at the next borough sessions, for obtaining the whip and spurs from Mr. Hamilton.

Incendiary Fire.—The Cambridge papers mention the burning of a stack of straw belonging to Mr. Edward Boothe, at March. The act is supposed to have been done by an incendiary.—An incendiary fire, which did considerable damage, has also occurred at Papworth, the property of Mr. Allpress.—Some wheat stacks have been burned at Coleby Heath, Lincolnshire, the farmstead of Mr. Charles Lister.

A New Reading of an Old Quotation.—A correspondent of the Wexford Independent, describing the execution of Michael and Thomas Ryan, for murder, at Connel, thus concludes:—"Arrived at the fatal spot, with all the emblems of death in their view, the hangman quickly adjusted the fatal nooses with all the dexterity and skilfulness of an old practitioner, when the fatal bolt was drawn, and the wretched men passed into eternity. "Sic gloria transit mundi." has absconded.

FLYING SHEETS FROM OUR TRAVELLING CONTRIBTUOR.

Munich, Oct. 1.

Rain, rain, unrelenting rain, and a biting pitiless cold air—these have barred for many a day past all hope of pleasure here, covering with moving masses of inky cloud short deep blue sky, so beautiful that even one of the greatest Italian landscape painters is said to have preferred to draw from it his inspiration [illegible] except in brief and tantalizing intervals, it has been almost impossible to have an hour's walk, and all the dancing and out-of-door amusements with which the people of Munich are wont to pass away their time, are utterly put a stop to. The magnificent treasures of art which the capital contains, afford foreigners and travellers enough opportunity to spend their mornings; but, for the inhabitants, on whom such things seem to be thrown away, there is nothing but their business, which is little, and their beer, which is made, flowing copiously as it does, in innumerable breweries and gast-houses, from ten in the morning, about which time the people begin to drink, till eleven or twelve at night, when, excepting in brief intervals devoted to kalbsbraten, sausages, and sour kraut, they cease to do so. At night, fortunate are those who can obtain places in the crowded theatres, where congregate all classes, from the Princes of the blood down to the peasantry and the servants, either to hear and see the new opera by the music of Weber, Rossini, or Auber; or, at the more national Volks-theater, to laugh, as I never saw human beings laugh before, at the drolleries of Bavarian Keeleys and Buckstones.

Making the best of the bad weather, I have profited by the [illegible] case to see all the many objects which are here to be seen under shelter; not merely the great public collections of works of art, the Pinacothek and the Glyptothek, and the magnificent frescoes, about all which books might be written, but also the ateliers of the different living artists here. The results of my observation may not prove uninteresting to your readers.

I have already explained that it is not so much in Munich itself that the artists receive their patronage, as that their position stamps their character elsewhere, and they receive commissions from wealthy persons in the provinces. Of course, the King has purchased innumerable pictures in his time, which he still retains, and he still gives occasional orders; but the chief demand has been for frescoes and other works, forming the most magnificent embellishments of the city are of an historical and religious character; for which, when on a grand scale, those branches of art are the best fitted.

A great and brilliant exception, however, to the general rule is presented in the person of Wilhelm Kaulbach, the historical painter, whose name I have already mentioned as being decidedly the greatest artist, for poetry of conception, grandeur of design, drawing, colour, and execution, now in Germany. But that one fears to hazard that praise which anticipates the decision of Time, the only critic and consecrator of true genius, I would say that I know not of any artist, of any age, with whom, as an historical painter, Kaulbach might not be named in company. His grandest picture, the "Capture of Jerusalem," by Titus, is now in his atelier. It was painted for the King by desire, but the artist so clings to that labour of years, the most magnificent which of his works the city are of an historical and religious character; for which, when on a grand scale, those branches of art are the best fitted.

The betting-ring—always a mart for emptiness—is at present supplied with customers about whom, as well as their merchandise, there is no mistake. It is the last place on earth—not excepting the Stock Exchange—where any man in his senses would be seen with cash or credit. Every one knows that the commercial panic will do good, by putting people on their guard. Nothing will ever put betting people on the shy, unless associating them, like the Kilkenny cats in the story, with a similar catastrophe. To put those whom it interests at their ease, it may be as well to state that the match for Monday, between Weatherbit and The Libertator, is off by consent.

TATTERSALL'S.

Monday.—The weight of the Cesarewitch betting was on the four leading favourites, each of them having a strong party; Wood Pigeon, Miss Whip, Filly, Vanity, Cawcrook, and Lady Wildair were also in some favour, but did not make any decided advance. The principal investments on the Cambridgeshire were Rob Roy, Ulysses, and Blackbird. Business, on the whole, was not very brisk.

Thursday. The grand feature of the Cesarewitch betting was the sudden appearance of Mr. Greville's mare, Geraldine, who had previously only figured in the quotations for the Cambridgeshire, for which she is backed for a large amount, and left off within a point of the first favourite. Notwithstanding this movement, War Eagle and Reminiscence were in strong demand; Inheritress, the Don Well filly, and Cawcrook were also favourites. The returns of favourites were Ulysses and Wood Pigeon; a good deal of money was laid out on the Clearwell, and a few small sums on the Cambridgeshire and Derby.

The London Yacht Club.—The handicap sailing-match, for a handsome piece of plate, given by this club, came off on Monday. It was a time race, a minute per ton being allowed, and the distance sailed was from the residence of T. Hewes, Esq., the Commodore, East Greenwich, to Erith and back. The following were the

Kestrel	13	Messrs. Neale ..
Staunch	11	Gardner.
Rob	10	Richardson.

They went away at twenty-five minutes to one, a fine breeze having sprung up from east by south. The Staunch took the lead, followed by the Kestrel, who soon passed her, and then the Wasp, Moor Park, and Rob. The Kestrel soon showed her superiority by retaining the lead all the way down to the flag-boat at Erith, where she arrived at twenty-four minutes to three; the Wasp, ten minutes to three; the Moor Park, at three; the Staunch, at eighteen minutes past three; and the Nautilus at half-past. The breeze freshened, and it was a very interesting match up. The Kes, however, exhibited her superiority, and arrived at the winning-post at twenty-four minutes ten seconds p.m., the others all within a few minutes, the Nautilus being the stormmost boat.

Cricket.—Sussex, with A. Mynn, Esq., v. All England.—This interesting match between eleven of Sussex and eleven of All England, first innings, 156; second ditto, 136. England, first innings, 189; second ditto, 89.

Attack upon a Child by a Lion.—A distressing event occurred at Nottingham Goose Fair, on Monday last. Between nine and ten o'clock at night, a vast crowd of persons had assembled in Mr. Hylton's menagerie, to view the collection of wild beasts, animals of prey, and other objects kept there. During the last nine months, a young woman, of the name of Caroline M'Pherson, has been in the habit of exhibiting her powers over the animal in its den. On this occasion, had in her arms her niece, Caroline Elen Beckett, a child three years old; and, while she was walking in front of the lion's den, within the rope put up as a boundary for the company, the animal suddenly sprung forth from the den, coming through the bars, seized the child by the head, and seized the head of the child. The crowd having observed the woman walking towards the den, and supposing she was about to enter it with the child, had closed in upon her, so that the beast got fairly hold of the child with its claws, and tore the back and front of its head, forehead, nose, ears, and its right arm, in a most frightful manner, and it was only by main force the poor sufferer was dragged away. The crowd ran in wild confusion, one over another, to the door to effect their escape, and very much increased the alarm by shouting that the lion had escaped from his den. The child, covered with blood, its face and other clothes torn to ribbons, and its person presenting a mangled appearance, was removed to a caravan in the fair, which its parents travel, where it was attended by two medical men, who pronounced its wounds to be of a most dangerous character.

The Explosion of the Cricket.—Henry Hessman, against whom a verdict of manslaughter was found by the Coroner's Jury on the above case, has surrendered to his bail. It appears that he never intended to abscond, but only concealed himself until his bail could be prepared.

The Cholera.—The Malta papers, received by the Overland Mail, give some interesting particulars as to the progress of the cholera. At Trebizond, a Mussulman was the first to be attacked, on the night of the 6th ult.; two new cases occurred on the 9th, all of which proved fatal. On the 10th there were many cases, but not of a very virulent character; on the 11th, there were some thirty new cases, but it was hoped that, as soon as the unusually hot weather which prevailed broke up, the disease would soon cease spreading. This fatal disease had, according to letters from Tabriz, of the 20th of August, re-entered the Persian territory by Carabagh, and on the 24th of August was raging very violently in that large city. Tiflis, which city had become almost abandoned, [illegible] naroum, from twenty to twenty-five new cases daily presented themselves, of which full one-third proved fatal. Throughout Georgia, at Redout Kale, and at Batoum in the Black Sea, it also prevailed, as well as at Taganrog, Kertch, Reston on the Don, and Lourzan, in which Russian towns the mortality amounted to full two-thirds of the attacks. Up to the 17th of September no case had occurred at Constantinople, but great fears were entertained that the disease would not only find its way there from the Black Sea, but also penetrate into Europe. A quarantine of observation had been established at Constantinople for all arrivals from places affected.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Take away this man, and bring me a goose
Sir, I've been all round the house and can't find one.—Mathews "At Home."

"Such a day as yesterday," began the City article in the Times of Tuesday last, "was never known on the Stock Exchange." To compare small things with great, such times as these were probably never before known on the Turf. Not that Tim O'Meara, indeed, or his contemporaries, were personages of a very fastidious honour; but it was not their luck to live in an era when the public had some took upon itself as the natural prey of the sharks of the Ring. In a classification of the national chronology of this island, the present might very appropriately be designated as the conventional age. Just now, certain of our institutions enjoy carte blanche as regards their social relations—for instance, railways and horse-racing. Speaking of the system of military confinement practised on some of our fleas, the late Sidney Smith predicted that it would undergo an alleviation until a Bishop or two had been burnt to death. Presently a very distinguished prelate was considerably scratched on the Great Western, but without producing the desired effect. When, some half a-dozen seasons ago, levanting, accompanied by very aggravating circumstances, obtained among the profession, you heard of reform being at hand—but in lieu of it there was only a change of the system—and where one big rogue used to run away with ten thousand pounds in a "dollop," the same amount, or double as much, is now divided on every great meeting by a shoal of petty larceny snakes. In the face of these facts it is all the rage to be shot from one end of the kingdom to another in express trains; and free-booting on race courses is carried on by virtue of letters of license issued by the public for its own especial pillage. What must be the consequence of this latter conventionalism? That, at some not distant day, the request with which this article is headed, being urged in the Grand Stands of Epsom, Ascot, or Doncaster, it shall receive a similar reply—nous verrons

This is our prologue to a word upon the great betting race of next week. On Tuesday will be run for, on Newmarket Heath, the Cesarewitch Stakes, a handicap which began up the spirits of the ring when the hopes and fears of the northern tryst are lost or won in certainty. The entries this year amounted to 157, and a very large field may be reckoned on at the post. Since its appearance in the calendar at least thirty animals of one sort or other have found customers—the best at 7 to 1—War Eagle's price a fortnight ago; the worst at 33 to 1 taken about Derisden, a three-year-old, with bat. 12lb to carry. War Eagle, as originally weighted at 7st 7lb, was favourably in; but the 6th scale for winning the Doncaster Cup will not take two stones. Nevertheless, race-horses should always be carefully dealt with, at Newmarket particularly. And this caution leads to a glance at Haricotbean, a three-year-old filly, handicapped at 7st. She was much fancied during the late three days in Suffolk, but she gives weight to animals of her own year, and also to some a twelvemonth older than herself, which should make her backers very cautious. The latest horses, indeed, are by no means a formidable lot; though we are sure to have a great creature on the day, if not sooner. The right policy is always to go against the stream as relates to a great handicap favourite. In the present case, though the weighting is not a perfect performance, it is good enough to bring the field together on very fair [illegible], and to leave a good average chance on the cards for all the starters—presuming, as we are entitled to do, that they come to the post in their forms. This is, however, only meant for the observance of such as go to the racing metropolis next week for their recreation. The betting-ring—always a mart for emptiness—is at present supplied with customers about whom, as well as their merchandise, there is no mistake. It is the last place on earth—not excepting the Stock Exchange—where any man in his senses would be seen with cash or credit. Every one knows that the commercial panic will do good, by putting people on their guard. The principal investments on the Cambridgeshire were Rob Roy, Ulysses, and Blackbird. Business, on the whole, was not very brisk.

Thursday. The grand feature of the Cesarewitch betting was the sudden appearance of Mr. Greville's mare, Geraldine, who had previously only figured in the quotations for the Cambridgeshire, for which she is backed for a large amount, and left off within a point of the first favourite. Notwithstanding this movement, War Eagle and Reminiscence were in strong demand; Inheritress, the Don Well filly, and Cawcrook were also favourites. The returns of favourites were Ulysses and Wood Pigeon; a good deal of money was laid out on the Clearwell, and a few small sums on the Cambridgeshire and Derby.

The London Yacht Club.—The handicap sailing-match, for a handsome piece of plate, given by this club, came off on Monday. It was a time race, a minute per ton being allowed, and the distance sailed was from the residence of T. Hewes, Esq., the Commodore, East Greenwich, to Erith and back. The following were the Vessels.	Tons.	Owners.

Kestrel	13	Messrs. Neale ..
Staunch	11	Gardner.
Rob	10	Richardson.
Moor Park	18	Lowry
Wasp	15	Hewes.

They went away at twenty-five minutes to one, a fine breeze having sprung up from east by south. The Staunch took the lead, followed by the Kes, who soon passed her, and then the Wasp, Moor Park, and Rob. The Kestrel soon showed her superiority by retaining the lead all the way down to the flag-boat at Erith, where she arrived at twenty-four minutes to three; the Wasp, ten minutes to three; the Moor Park, at three; the Staunch, at eighteen minutes past three; and the Nautilus at half-past. The breeze freshened, and it was a very interesting match up. The Kes, however, exhibited her superiority, and arrived at the winning-post at twenty-four minutes ten seconds p.m., the others all within a few minutes, the Nautilus being the stormmost boat.

Cricket.—Sussex, with A. Mynn, Esq., v. All England.—This interesting match between eleven of Sussex and eleven of All England, first innings, 156; second ditto, 136. England, first innings, 189; second ditto, 89.

Attack upon a Child by a Lion.—A distressing event occurred at Nottingham Goose Fair, on Monday last. Between nine and ten o'clock at night, a vast crowd of persons had assembled in Mr. Hylton's menagerie, to view the collection of wild beasts, animals of prey, and other objects kept there. During the last nine months, a young woman, of the name of Caroline M'Pherson, has been in the habit of exhibiting her powers over the animal in its den. On this occasion, had in her arms her niece, Caroline Elen Beckett, a child three years old; and, while she was walking in front of the lion's den, within the rope put up as a boundary for the company, the animal suddenly sprung forth from the den, coming through the bars, seized the child by the head, and seized the head of the child. The crowd having observed the woman walking towards the den, and supposing she was about to enter it with the child, had closed in upon her, so that the beast got fairly hold of the child with its claws, and tore the back and front of its head, forehead, nose, ears, and its right arm, in a most frightful manner, and it was only by main force the poor sufferer was dragged away. The crowd ran in wild confusion, one over another, to the door to effect their escape, and very much increased the alarm by shouting that the lion had escaped from his den. The child, covered with blood, its face and other clothes torn to ribbons, and its person presenting a mangled appearance, was removed to a caravan in the fair [illegible] which its parents travel, where it was attended by two medical men, who pronounced its wounds to be of a most dangerous character.

The Explosion of the Cricket.—Henry Hessman, against whom a verdict of manslaughter was found by the Coroner's Jury on the above case, has surrendered to his bail. It appears that he never intended to abscond, but only concealed himself until his bail could be prepared.

The Cholera.—The Malta papers, received by the Overland Mail, give some interesting particulars as to the progress of the cholera. At Trebizond, a Mussulman was the first to be attacked, on the night of the 6th ult.; two new cases occurred on the 9th, all of which proved fatal. On the 10th there were many cases, but not of a very virulent character; on the 11th, there were some thirty new cases, but it was hoped that, as soon as the unusually hot weather which prevailed broke up, the disease would soon cease spreading. This fatal disease had, according to letters from Tabriz, of the 20th of August, re-entered the Persian territory by Carabagh, and on the 24th of August was raging very violently in that large city. Tiflis, which city had become almost abandoned, [illegible] naroum, from twenty to twenty-five new cases daily presented themselves, of which full one-third proved fatal. Throughout Georgia, at Redout Kale, and at Batoum in the Black Sea, it also prevailed, as well as at Taganrog, Kertch, Reston on the Don, and Lourzan, in which Russian towns the mortality amounted to full two-thirds of the attacks. Up to the 17th of September no case had occurred at Constantinople, but great fears were entertained that the disease would not only find its way there from the Black Sea, but also penetrate into Europe. A quarantine of observation had been established at Constantinople for all arrivals from places affected.

RETURN OF THE COURT TO WINDSOR CASTLE.

WINDSOR CASTLE.—THE NORTH WEST VIEW.

The return of the Court to "majestic Windsor" will be found detailed in page 230. We avail ourselves of this occasion to resume the series of Original Illustrations of the Castle commenced in this Journal in the autumn of last year.

NORTH-WEST VIEW.

In this picturesque scene the great extent of the Castle is seen to great advantage; the Round Tower, with the Royal Standard floating from the watch-tower, appears nearly in the centre of the plan; although this noble structure is the main feature of the west front. This Keep is not a perfect circle; it is 102 feet in greatest diameter, 93 in smallest; its height is 80 feet from the top of the mound; watch-tower 25 more; and its entire height from the level of the Quadrangle is 148 feet.

The great North Terrace is next shown in its full extent, commencing with King John's Tower and Queen Elizabeth's Gallery. The long line is broken by George the Fourth's Tower, by the doorway of which a view is obtained through a long vestibule to the State Entrance, across the Quadrangle, through George the Fourth's Gateway, to the Long Walk. This was an after-thought of George the Fourth's, and it is a most magnificent effect. The next break in the Terrace line is the Cornwall Tower, in which is the superb ball-room, or Presence Chamber, 90 by 32 feet. And next is the Brunswick Tower, an octagon, 88 feet diameter externally, and 100 feet in height.

In this view, the architectural massiveness may be somewhat lost in the distance; but, it conveys an idea of the rich clothing of "the slopes," which mark the elevated site of the Castle. The character of the scenery by which the Castle is fronted—> expanse below

> Of grove, of lawn, of mead;
> Whose turf, whose shade, whose flowers among > Wanders the hoary Thames along
> His silver-winding way.

STATE APARTMENTS.—THE VANDYCK ROOM.

W I N D S O R C A S T L E.

THE VANDYCK ROOM,

or Old Ball Room, is next illustrated. The walls are hung with crimson silk damask; the cornice and ceiling are white and gold. But, the glory of the apartment is the Twenty-two Pictures which it contains; the whole by that illustrious master of his art, Vandyck. They are Portraits, and very fine; though Walpole considers Vandyck to be upon his throne at Wilton House.

One of the most celebrated of the Vandycks at Windsor is the five children of Charles I.: this fine picture hung in King Charles's breakfast-room at Whitehall; it was purchased by George III. from the Earl of Portmore. This hangs over the chimney-piece, and immediately beneath it is the full face and profile, and three-quarter face of King Charles I. This was painted in 1637; and from it Bernini made the bust of Charles I., destroyed in the fire at old Whitehall. George IV. paid 1000 guineas for this picture. When it was sent to Bernini, at Rome, on seeing it, he was struck with the melancholy expression of the King's countenance, and uttered a prediction of his untimely fate. Another fine picture at Windsor is "Three of King Charles I.'s Children;" there are duplicates of it at Wilton House, at Turin, and at Dresden. The large picture shown at the end of the room, in the Illustration, is King Charles I. on a grey horse, advancing from under an archway, attended by his Equerry, who holds the King's helmet. This is the original of the fine copy by old Stone, at Hampton Court. At the sale of Charles's effects by the Rebels, the price put upon Vandyck's picture was £200, for which sum it was purchased by Van Lemput. After the Restoration, he demanded 1500 guineas for his bargain; but the picture was eventually obtained from him by a suit at law, after 1000 guineas had been offered.

THE GUARD CHAMBER, of which a portion is shown in the next Illustration, is very attractive to visitors. The fittings are oak; the three doors, filled with plate glass, open into the Grand Vestibule; and the door on the right communicates with St. George's Hall.

The Guard Chamber is 78 feet long, 21 wide at one end, 26 at the other, and 31 feet high. Our Engraving shows the north end of the room, which, however, by no means, contains the richest treasures; though, that shown on the left, possesses great contemporaneous interest for visitors: it is a bust, by Chantrey, of the Duke of Wellington, with the last annual banner (the tricolor) presented by the Illustrious Duke on the anniversary of the Battle of Waterloo, by way of quit-rent for the domain of Strathfieldsaye, in Hampshire. The walls of the Chamber are covered with arms, but, we agree with Mr. Jesse, that though arranged with taste, they are of a very common description.

Among the treasures in this room are Chantrey's colossal bust of Nelson, and part of the foremast of the Victory; the Blenheim White Banner, and a bust of the great Duke of Marlborough; and Cellini's Silver Shield, inlaid with gold, presented by Francis I., of France, to King Henry VIII.

THE GUARD CHAMBER.—NORTH END.

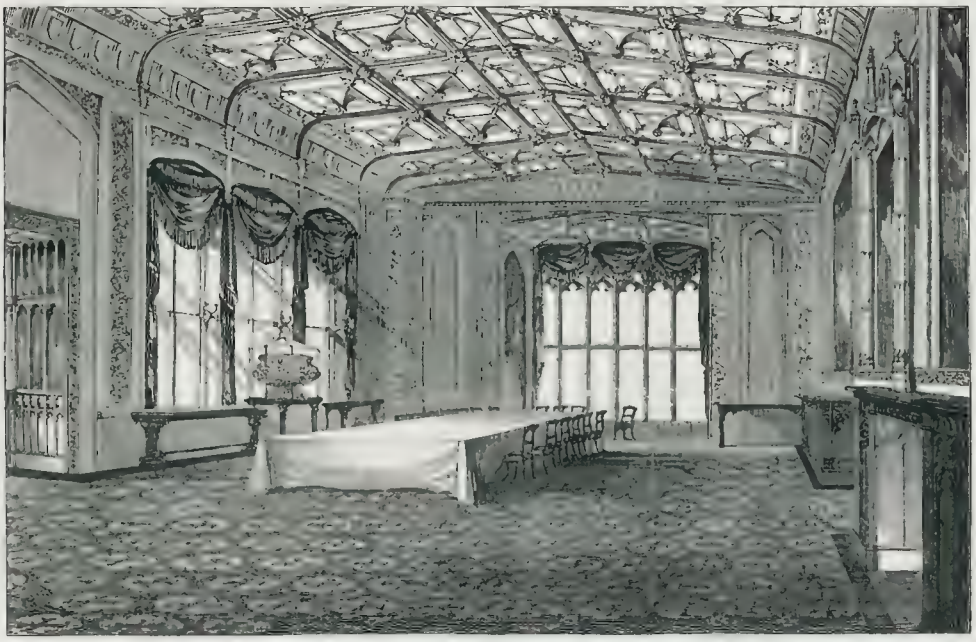
THE PRIVATE DINING-ROOM

The fourth Illustration shows Her Majesty's Private Dining-Room, in the East Front of the Castle. It is a large and superbly-decorated apartment; the walls and roof profusely gilt and enriched; the draperies, crimson; and the carpet, blue and gold colour.

Fleetwood.—Of this new port, at which her Majesty was so splendidly received, on her return from Scotland, we find the following details in the Manchester Examiner:—"Fleetwood, last years ago, was a rabbit warren; it has been created almost solely by the energy and expenditure of one man—Sir Peter Hesketh Fleetwood; it now contains about 3500 inhabitants, several well-built streets of shops and houses, and a number of fine hotels—one of which, the North Euston, would be esteemed a large and magnificent building in any town in the kingdom; it has about 860 linear yards of wharfing; nine steamers sail regularly from the port for Glasgow, Ardrossan, Belfast, the Isle of Man, Furness Abbey, and Bardsey; and its advantages as a port and harbour are such as to ensure its ultimate, and possibly speedy advancement to a sea-port of great magnitude and importance. The wharves, which were erected by Mr. S. P. Bidder, under the direction of Mr. R. Stephenson, are so constructed as to admit of the easy landing of passengers at all times. At low water there is a depth of ten feet of water alongside the wharf for a length of 1000 feet. At high water, there is a depth of twenty-one feet in neap tides, and of thirty-one feet in spring tides, being nearly ten feet more than at Liverpool. The railway is carried along the whole wharf, and when trains arrive at night they go under the covered portion of it, so as to enable passengers proceeding to Glasgow, &c., to step at once from the carriage into the steam boat. The place offers good accommodation for those who are fond of the sea-air and sea-bathing."

The Command of the Madras Army.—Lieutenant-General Sir George Henry Frederick Berkeley, K.C.B., has been appointed to the command of the Madras army. He is a highly-distinguished soldier of the Peninsula, adding Waterloo to the long list of battles in which he was engaged.

Shakespeare's House.—On Wednesday a report was made by the united committees of the Stratford Shakesperian Club, and that of London, formed in conjunction therewith, that having purchased Shakespere's house and the adjoining property for £3833, the public subscriptions received are deficient of that amount by £1400, leaving the committee liable for that amount. Surely there can be no difficulty in raising so trifling a sum, with such a noble object in view.



HER MAJESTY'S PRIVATE DINING ROOM.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 9, 1847.

THE solution of the unseemly quarrel between the Swiss Cantons would appear, in the present aspect of the matter, to be reserved for the violent and sanguinary agency of the sword, rather than for the more satisfactory and efficacious operation of rational negociation. Active preparations are being made by both parties successfully to accomplish or repel aggression; and the spirit of violence has so exasperated men's minds, that even already, though the final decision of the Diet as to the mode of procedure it will adopt for enforcing its decree against the minor Cantons has been postponed to the close of this month, armed attacks of a petty nature are mentioned as having taken place between bodies of the antagonist parties.

This augurs badly for the peaceful expectations that have been all along entertained in this country—at least, relative to the ultimate adjustment of this unfortunate affair; and, as much apprehension on the subject would seem to exist, from the erroneous views which have been from time to time put forward respecting the principles at issue in the matter, in several of our contemporaries, some of whom advocate liberal politics, we would endeavour, in a momentary glance at the origin and history of the contest, to throw such a light upon the question as may suffice to indicate who are the true friends of freedom among the belligerents, and which of them should be held responsible for the ultimate consequences of this civil strife, whatever they may be, whether favourable or detrimental to the progress of popular liberty, which both parties profess to have at heart.

Switzerland, as every body knows, is a confederation of several small territories, or Cantons, as they are called, united together by a bond or compact of Federal Government, for the purposes of mutual aid and protection. Each Canton constitutes a separate and distinct Sovereign State, possessed of all its rights, privileges, and powers, in complete independence, except whatever portion of them it has expressly accorded to the General or Federal Government of the Union, for the purposes of the Confederation; and in the Federal Constitution of Switzerland the power thus delegated (which is clearly defined) is even more limited than in those of other similar confederations. Each Canton, therefore, exercises within its own limits sovereign control and sway over the management of such questions and measures of Cantonal Government as are strictly domestic to itself, and any attempt to obstruct the exercise of that right is an invasion of the Sovereign power of the Canton, and a violation of its Federal Constitution. This is well understood throughout the entire Confederation, for in 1815, on the establishment of the States of Europe upon their present footing, the minor or primitive Swiss Cantons had, on their express stipulation, their sovereign rights guaranteed to them respectively. Nevertheless, in violation of this arrangement, the party who regard themselves as the especial champions of democracy, and who are misnomered Radicals, but whose Radicalism is very different from what is considered Liberalism throughout Europe, having the majority in the Diet, decreed the expulsion of the Jesuits from some of the Primitive Cantons who chose to have establishments of that religious order within their territories. The latter, in a matter which fell so entirely within their own sovereign control, refused to submit to the arbitrary dictation of the dominant party, and the Radicals, who seem to have adopted the physical-force notions of propagandism, in which the Chartists of our own country so implicitly put their faith during their brief convulsive existence, set immediately about organising the corps Francs, or Free Bands, to force the recusant Cantons to submit, the Diet meanwhile looking on with folded arms. The invaded Cantons, obliged to arm in self-defence, formed what they call the Sonderbund or Separate League, to repel force by force; this League the Democratic party in the Diet, decreed by a majority of four, should be suppressed, and to this latter edict do the League Cantons refuse obedience so long as their sovereign rights are interfered with by the intolerant and arbitrary assumption of authority which has been displayed on the part of the Radical Cantons. The latter end of the present month, as we have mentioned, has been fixed by the Diet for definitively settling the modus operandi, by which it will carry its measures of coercion against the Sonderbund into execution; and the interim is employed by the two parties in preparing for a sanguinary and internecine civil war.

This is the true state of the case. The aversion entertained in many countries of Europe to the Order of the Jesuits, has been the cause of much misconception as to the real merits of the question at issue, which is neither more nor less than the subversion of the sovereignty and independence of certain free States, which have an origin more ancient than many of the thrones of Europe, by their most closely allied and kindred neighbours, under the pretence of disseminating the principles of popular liberty. This is Swiss Radicalism, and is just as consistent with justice as would be an attempt on the part of a majority of the States composing the Germanic Confederation to compel, by force of arms, the King of Bavaria to degrade Lola Montes from her newly-acquired rank of nobility, and expel the impecunious danseuse from his dominions.

But the fact is, the cry of "the Jesuits" is but a cloak to conceal the real designs of the Greater Cantons, or rather the agitators in those Cantons, who cannot resist the temptation to domineer over the Little Cantons, which their superior numbers presents. It is the offspring of the same arbitrary spirit of inordinate ambition, which, in the United States of America, calls into existence the doctrine of "Annexation."

This illiberal policy, however, there is some hope, will not succeed in the very heart of Europe. Public opinion, which is usually right in the main, is beginning to manifest itself in Geneva, and others of the Cantons governed by the Radicals, hostile to the cause of the aggressors; and in many instances the soldiers, particularly the cavalry, have declared they will not fight in defence of that cause which they consider criminal and iniquitous.

THE frequency of accidents, many of them of a fatal nature, which have occurred on Railways, from the inability of communicating to the engine-driver of a train notice of anything having gone wrong with a carriage requiring the immediate stoppage of the train, has at last awakened one, and one only, of the Railway Companies—the Great Western—to the absolute necessity that there is of attempting a remedy; and accordingly they have appointed an officer, called a "travelling carriage porter," whose business is, from a seat which he occupies on the tender, to keep a sharp look-out along the top and both sides of the train, so that, in case of an accident to any of the carriages, or an intimation of one from the guard, or any other sufficient cause, he may at once communicate with the engine-man, and stop the train. For all purposes of security to the railway traveller, this regulation is scarcely of any value whatever. At night, or during foggy or very dark weather, it is quite useless; and under the most favourable circumstances its utility depends solely upon the construction which a porter, at twenty-five shillings a week wages, may put upon the word vigilance; and even then, the security, such as it is, is accorded only to passengers by express trains. Persons who seek to travel more cheaply, have their lives held cheaply; and the carriages in which they journey may oscillate, and jump off the rails, and be smashed to atoms, together with their inmates, without any other notice being taken of the circumstance except that of the "Crowner's quest."

This is not the light in which a Railway Company should view the onerous responsibility it has assumed; and the sooner its Directors exhibit a more correct sense of it the better. The only commendable feature in the new regulation is, its recognition of the evil, and of the necessity of a remedy.

That with which alone the public will rest satisfied is, a mechanical apparatus, by which passengers can at once communicate with the engine-man.

OPENING OF THE GIPSY SCHOOL AT FARNHAM (DORSETSHIRE).—A substantial, chaste, and commodious building, the foundation-stone of which was laid in this parish in 1845, is now complete, and was opened on Tuesday last, for the education of Orphan Gipsy children, and for the younger branches of those Gipsies who have large families. All will here be taught to read and write. The girls will be trained to the various household duties, and fitted to go out to service. The boys will be carefully instructed, and, when arrived at a proper age, apprenticed to some useful trade. The building is capable of accommodating twenty-four children, but as yet rooms are only fitted up for half that number. The meeting was most numerously and respectably attended, there being present between four and five hundred persons, comprising many of the principal residents of that part of the country. After appropriate addresses from several clergymen, about twenty Gipsies and Gipsy children were regaled with tea, bread and butter, and cheese.

POSTSCRIPT.

BANQUET TO MR. COBDEN AT HAMBURG.

The great Free-Trade Banquet given in honour of Mr. Cobden took place at Hamburg on Monday evening, and it was in all respects a demonstration of a most gratifying character. The building known as Kraetter's Riding School, in the Drehbahn, was used upon the occasion. It was tastefully decorated with festoons and garlands of leaves and flowers, and a vast number of flags of all nations; and the saloon was lighted up by the aid of upwards of 2000 tapers, placed in candelabra of different heights and sizes, so as to produce a very imposing general effect.

At half-past five o'clock Mr. Cobden was ushered into the saloon by the Chairman of the day, M. Ruperti, President for this year of the Chamber of Commerce. He was seated at his entry by all the Members of the Committee, twenty-four in number, and followed by the whole company, the band striking up an appropriate air of welcome. The saloon contained twelve tables, each with covers laid for sixty-two persons; at the head and foot of each two members of the Committee presided. After the discussion of the first course (the practice in Germany being to speak between courses), M. Ruperti ascended the tribune to welcome the assembled guests, and to say a few words upon the subject of Free Trade of the great principle which had brought them all together. He was succeeded by M. Hoss, to whom the honour of proposing the health of the great guest of the evening had been assigned. During the short speech of this gentleman, every allusion he made to Mr. Cobden, and to the services he had rendered to the great cause of Free Trade throughout the world, was responded to by immense applause, which was redoubled at its close, when he proposed "The Health of Richard Cobden." The band immediately struck up a most appropriate air out of the opera of "Richard Löwenherz" (Richard Cœur de Lion), the words being—

Da stehen Engländer fest und stark,
Dein Knelg, Richard, held dich noch, &c.
Then proud England rejoice,
Thy wreathers, though still brave thee.)

The company caught up the allusion amid rapturous expressions of delight, a vast number of them singing the words as an accompaniment to the splendid music of the orchestral band. Mr. Cobden then ascended the tribune amid the vociferous exclamations of the assembled company, every one rising. He entered upon a graphical history of his recent travels, and of the observations he had made in the different countries which he had recently visited. He drew a comparison between Leghorn and Barcelona—between a city raised to magnificence on an open port plan in Italy, under the fostering principles of freedom of trade, and another city enjoying every possible advantage naturally, but cramped in its energies by the withering principles of Protection and Prohibition, and thereby held in its progress. He referred to the efforts of Augsburg, and Munich, and Carlsruhe to instruct Hamburg as to the commercial principles they ought to adopt—their desire to see a city bearing the great fruits of Free-Trade principles established in Germany, and being enabled thereby to spread her commerce through all parts of the world, closing her ports to the flag of any particular nation. Why (said the honourable gentleman), the inhabitants of Augsburg and Munich never tasted a single luxury in their lives; and can they be instructed, whose prosperity depends upon the activity of your ports, which flag you shall admit, and which you are to reject? Mr. Cobden concluded by proposing as a toast, "Continued prosperity to the town and trade of this city."

The other toasts which were then given in succession were, "Free Navigation to every Port of the World;" which, as having reference to the absurd Navigation Laws of England, France, and other countries, was very warmly welcomed. "Das Vaterland" was then drunk, preceded by the song of "Was ist des Deutschen Vaterland?" which was sung by the whole of the company present, and with a feeling of enthusiasm which this great Vaterlandische song never fails to elicit in any part of Germany. Other toasts succeeded, and at about ten the cordial reception he had met with at Hamburg, and the meeting broke up.

ACCIDENT TO THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK.—A few days since, an accident of a singular character occurred to the Venerable Archbishop of York, who is now in his 92nd year. His Grace, accompanied by the Rev. Mr. Dixon, one of the canons of the Minster, and the Archbishop's chaplain, was walking on the grounds attached to the Episcopal Palace at Bishopthorpe, when they had occasion to cross a wooden bridge thrown over some ornamental water. On reaching the middle of the bridge, the latter felt some apprehension that it was giving way, but before they had an opportunity of taking any precautionary measures for securing themselves, the bridge fell in, and the Most Reverend Prelate, with his friend, found themselves up to their necks in the water. The accident, however, was not attended with any unpleasant result, and the Archbishop was well enough to preside over a dinner party in the evening.

PICTURE OF HENRY HOWARD, R.A.—Mr. Howard, the Royal Academician, the Secretary to the Academy, and the Professor of Painting in that Institution, died on Tuesday last, at Oxford, in the 78th year of his age. Mr. Howard began to exhibit for the first time at the Royal Academy in the year 1794.

ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY.—The Emperor of Russia has presented to the Collection in the Regent's Park a pair of Aurochs, or European bisons, to which extraordinary interest is attached, not only because their existence is limited to a single district of the Imperial forests in Lithuania, where they are preserved with great care, and under the severest laws, but because, of all the great mammalia which inhabited Europe in the fossil periods, this species is the only survivor. We shall be enabled, by the courtesy of the Council, to give a full illustration in our impression of next week.

INFANT SCHOOLS FOR THE MIDDLE CLASSES.—On Thursday evening a large and highly respectable meeting was held in the Parochial School Rooms in Church-street, Islington, to witness an examination of the scholars of the Infant School for the Middle Classes, in Cross Keys Factory-street. At six o'clock the chair was taken by the Rev. Daniel Wilson, M.A., Vicar of the parish, who was surrounded by several clergymen, ministers, and gentlemen interested in popular education. The first lesson, the object of the meeting, the examination of the pupils, between seventy and eighty in number, by Mr. S. P. Newcombe, the Principal of the School, was commenced. The spontaneous and natural answers of the children showed the effective manner in which they had been trained. The great success which has attended the experiment has led to the formation of an influential Committee, for the purpose of establishing a proprietary Infant School on an extended scale, with suitable playground, for the middle classes in Islington.

SUICIDE OF A CORONER.—J. J. Bond, Esq., Coroner for Folkestone, committed suicide on Wednesday morning, nearly severing his head from his body with a razor. It appears that the unfortunate gentleman had been labouring under temporary fits of insanity for some time.

FALL OF THE FACIA OF AN ARCH.—On Thursday a general reduction in the price of the 4lb. loaf of wheaten bread took place in all parts of the metropolis, the charge now being 9½d. and 6d. the quartern loaf. In some of the poorer districts a description of rye bread is retailed at 4½d.

EXECUTION AT MAIDSTONE.—Hutchins, the man convicted at the last sessions of the Central Criminal Court for the murder of his wife, at Deptford, was executed on Thursday, at Maidstone.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

FRANCE.

The funeral of the late Marshal Duke de Reggio, Governor of the Invalides, took place on Tuesday with all the pomp due to his rank. The service was performed in the Church of the Invalides, which was hung with black, relieved with escutcheons on which were inscribed the names of the great battles in which the deceased had distinguished himself. Among them were marked Friedland, Zurich, Ebersberg, Genoa, Wagram, the Alnco, Polotsk, Amstetten, the Bérésina, Vienna, Bautzen, Hollabrun, Arcis-sur-Aube, Neufchatel, Madrid, and Golymin. At twelve o'clock, the troops of the Invalides brought the body in solemn procession from the chapelle ardente on the left side of the entrance, where it was placed in the morning, to a splendid catafalque in the middle of the nave. The corners of the pall were borne by the Duke Decazes, Marshal Molitor, the Duke de Mortemart, and the Marquis de Laurislon. The guard of honour was composed of the oldest non-commissioned officers of the Invalides on duty. The grand deputation from the Chamber of Peers was composed of 32 members, among whom were the Duke de Plaisance, Baron Athalin, the Prince de Wagram, Viscount Sebastiani, Admiral Rosamel, Count Schramm, the Duke d'Albuféra, the Duke d'Estissac, the Prince de la Moskowa, Marquis Gouvion Saint-Cyr, General Baron Gourgaud, the Duke de Treviso, Generals Moline de Saint-Yon, and Jacqueminot. On the left of the choir were the aides-de-camp and ordinary officers of the King, who came in six of the Royal carriages. In the nave on the right were the Ministers of War, the Marine, Finance, Commerce, and Public Works; behind them, the grand deputation of the Chamber of Peers, and many other members, the Council of State, the family of the deceased, and National Guards. With the Peers were several of the foreign Ambassadors and Ministers. On the left, in the nave, were a great number of Deputies, a great many officers of the Staff of the National Guards and of the garrison in Paris in full uniform. Among the spectators was Bou Maza, in his splendid national military costume. During the service detachments from Paris, infantry, cavalry, and artillery, were drawn up on the Esplanade, the guns of the Invalides firing minute salutes. The service done, the body was brought out and placed on a hearse, and carried in procession round the Esplanade, and then deposited in the vault of the Governors. The solemnity lasted two hours.

SWITZERLAND.

According to the latest news from Switzerland the Canton of Schaffhausen had decided, by a majority of 46 against 28 votes, to support, by force of arms if necessary, the decision of the Diet against the Sonderbund. The Canton of Zurich has contingent in military contingent to support the Diet. These forces consist of eight battalions of infantry, seven companies of artillery, four companies of carabineers, three companies of cavalry, two of sappers, and one of pontooniers. Besides, the Landwehr, consisting of like divisions, will be ready, amounting in all to 15,500 fighting men.

ITALY.

Accounts from Turin of the 2nd state that on the previous evening some slight disturbances occurred in that city. Great crowds of the inhabitants assembled on the great promenade, called the Ripari, shouting "Long live Pius IX.," "Long live Charles Albert," &c. The head of the police, seeing without orders in the event of such an emergency, repaired at once to the Palace, and had an interview with the King. His Majesty at once declared that if the demonstration was confined to shouting in honour of himself, of the Pope, and of Italy, the police were not to interfere, as such exclamations must be taken as symptoms rather of loyalty and good feeling than of disaffection to the State. In the meantime, however, the military had been called out, and before counter orders could be issued, dispersed the crowds of people wherever they were found. A young advocate was the only prisoner taken. No one was either killed or wounded, and at the last accounts tranquillity was completely re-established.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

THE INSOLVENCY OF MR. HUDSON KIRBY, THE ACTOR.—At the BANKRUPTCY Court, on Wednesday, Mr. Hudson Kirby, the actor, appeared to undergo his examination. He was supported by Mr. Duncan, the barrister; and was opposed by Mr Hughes, the barrister, and Mr. Lewis, solicitor. Mr. Hughes stated that he appeared for the creditors numbered on the schedule 17 and 36. No. 17 was a tailor, and his claim amounted to £17 6s. for clothes and money lent, and the claim of No. 36 was for £3 and was also for money lent. The insolvent was a tragedian, with a salary of £7 7s. a week.—The Commissioner: But for how many weeks in the year? Mr. Hughes: During every week in the year; besides which, his wife, who is also on the stage, earns a salary of £3 or £4 a week. Although in the receipt of this salary, his debts, from 1844 up to the present time, amounted to £149 18s. 8d. All these debts were incurred in clothes, refreshments, and borrowed money. The creditors knew him on the ground that the debts had been fraudulently incurred, and that he had not accounted in his schedule for the moneys he had received. Mr. Duncan wished to say that the insolvent acknowledged that the special balance-sheet was not correct, and he hoped the Court would permit him to amend it. Mr. Lewis said that the insolvent had had sufficient time to amend his schedule. It was very easy to say, when an objection was raised to the correctness of the schedule, "Oh, we are ready to amend it."—The Commissioner: If the amendment is important, it must, of course, be allowed. Mr. Hughes: If the insolvent is to have time to amend, he must pay the costs of the day. I appears from the schedule that, from the 28th February to the 5th June, a period computed at ten weeks, only a sum of £88 10s. is put down as the earnings of the insolvent. The period is, in fact, sixteen weeks, and not ten; and the salary of the wife is not put down at all.—Mr. Duncan said that the insolvent was a fit signer, and unacquainted with the rules of the Court. (Laughter.) Mr. Hughes: He is an American.—Mr. Duncan: I observe in the petition that several residences are given; but others are, I understand, omitted; and I think, therefore, the best course I can pursue, seeing the nature of the opposition, is to request that the petition be dismissed.—After some conversation, the petition was dismissed accordingly.

AN UNFORTUNATE RAILWAY SPECULATOR.—Mr. H. W. Meleyard, an insolvent, who was described as a barrister, of Upper Bedford-place, who has been largely engaged in railway speculations, applied for his final order, with debts to the extent of £72,000. He was opposed by Mr. Duncan, on the ground that he was a trader within the meaning of the Act of Parliament, inasmuch as the insolvent had borne and sold railway shares, with a view to a profit; that he had been living most extravagantly, buying a carriage, and decorating his house, at a time when he was irretrievably insolvent; and that he had become liable, with many other persons, to the extent of £70,000, without any probable means of payment. Mr. Duncan appeared for the executors of Colonel Harvey, being creditors upon a bond for £800. The insolvent said that it was obtained from him by large sales of trash, and he was only liable for £480, upwards of £300 of which had been paid to Colonel Harvey. Mr. Duncan then applied for an adjournment, to contradict this statement, but was refused. After some discussion, the final order was granted.

POLICE.

A MAN CHARGED WITH THE MURDER OF HIS WIFE.

At CLERKENWELL Police Court, on Monday, William Joseph Clifton was charged with the wilful murder of Matilda Clifton, his wife.

William Henry Martin, a sergeant, No. 14 G, deposed that in the morning, about half-past one o'clock, he received information that a woman had been ill-used by her husband at a house, No. 6, Beacham-street, St. Andrew's, Holborn. He proceeded thither, and on making inquiries he heard that the woman was dead, and that prisoner had been there, and that the woman's name was Matilda Clifton. He kept a constable at the door of the house, and went to Mr. Pollock, surgeon, of Hatton-garden, and saw his assistant, who said the woman had received a blow and a kick. Witness returned to the house and found the prisoner. He went up stairs with him to the back attic, where he found the deceased lying on a bed. There was blood on the stairs and floor. When the last room with the prisoner, witness said, "I must take you into custody for this." The prisoner said, "Very well, I am sorry for it; she was drunk at the time, and she aggravated me." He repeated this statement at the station-house. He found 13s. 7d. and two penknives and a key in his possession. The body of the deceased was laid out. She was without her clothes.

Mr Tyrwhitt asked the prisoner if he wished to put any questions to the witness?—Prisoner (dejectedly): I have none, your Worship

Mr. Simeon Coolclough, surgeon and assistant to Mr. Pollock, deposed that he was called to attend the deceased at about half-past two o'clock on the morning, at No. 6, Beacham-street. Did not see the person who called, but thought it was the prisoner. He went to the house, and noticed on two of the upper stairs blood and vomit. Saw a woman lying on her right side on the floor, and another woman by her side. The face of the former was pallid, and she was almost insensible. Witness went into the adjoining room, and found the prisoner sitting on the side of the bed. Asked if he knew the cause of his wife's illness. He said the girl, his daughter, said her mother had been quarrelling with her father. She had been ill for two or three days. She said her father had kicked her. Witness then left the place, and sent medicine, with instructions how to be used. The prisoner inquired of witness if he thought it a serious case. Witness replied, "Indeed it is." The prisoner said "I am sorry for it, she was a fearful temper; she had quarrelled with him before, because he would not let her have more liquor. She threw a knife, a shovel, the poker, and tongs at him." The poker struck him on the nose and he kicked her. The woman died at four o'clock in the morning.

The prisoner declined putting any questions to this witness, saying: "It is quite right, I went for the surgeon."

Mr. Tyrwhitt said he should remand the prisoner, and he cautioned him that he was not bound to say anything.

The prisoner, who was much affected, said nothing, and he was remanded. The poor little daughter left the court crying bitterly.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

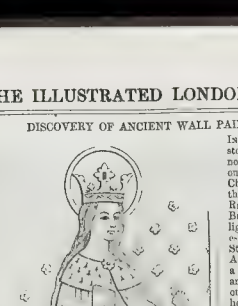
FATAL ACCIDENT TO A YOUNG LADY AT CLIFTON.—A fatal accident occurred on Wednesday, at Clifton, to a young lady named Welsh, who, while standing on the highest point of St. Vincent's Rock, for the purpose of viewing the scenery, was accidentally precipitated, by the falling in of the battlement, to the bottom, a depth of near 300 feet, and was dashed to atoms. Miss Welsh, who was about twenty years old, was in the habit of walking on the downs for air and exercise. On Tuesday she was seen at the point of the rock by several parties; and one gentleman, who thought she was in a dangerous situation, intimated his opinion to her. She thanked him, and, without leaving the spot, drew back for a short distance, and he left her. Shortly afterwards, two inhabitants of the precipice, on the opposite side, saw the grass there being, in dry weather, exceedingly slippery, must have missed her footing, and tumbled headlong over the cliff. A youth named Kynon, who was walking in the zig-zag walk, and a quarryman who was at work at the bottom part of the rocks, both saw her fall, and the former states, that while descending, he saw her stretch out her hands, and endeavour to grasp a mass of ivy which adhered to the face of the rock. She did not succeed, and was dashed from point to point of the rock until she fell to the bottom. Verdict, "Accidental death."

FEARFUL RETRIBUTION.—AN EXTRAORDINARY event happened at Bishop's Offley, Staffordshire, in the morning of Monday week, forming a signal instance of the punishment of death overtaking a thief whilst in the act of plunder. The man's name was Joseph Boulton: he was a cordwainer, a single man, aged 46, and lived at Bishop's Offley. His dead body was found by Mr. William Petcrill, the occupier of Bishop's Offley mill, between nine and ten o'clock, lying between the pit wheel of the mill and the bolster which supported it. His head was so firmly jammed between the wheel and the bolster, that it required the united strength of six men to disengage it. The collar-bone and top part of the right arm had been frightfully fractured. He had apparently been dead some hours when discovered. His coat pockets were filled with wheat, and a basket which lay near had barley in the bottom, and some wheat tied up in a pinafore; whilst some small pieces of wood lay at the top. It is presumed that this unfortunate man had entered the mill through a hole which had been made by workmen for the purpose of repairing the wheel; and that, after obtaining his booty, he was attempting to return the same way, when his foot, being probably subject to the circumstance of his having a "club-foot," and the force of his weight upon the wheel setting it in motion, he fell head-foremost between the wheel and bolster, when his head was at once dreadfully smashed and his death was instantaneous.

EXECUTION AT DUNDEE. On Tuesday morning, at Dundee, the extreme penalty of the law was inflicted on the convict Leith. Crowds flocked to the scene of the execution from an early hour. There were about 12,000 persons present. Immediately before the closing scene, a clergyman stepped forward and asked Leith, "Are you guilty or not guilty?" and the convict, in a firm tone answered, "I am not guilty." The parties then joined in prayer, and said, "I am not guilty." The parting of Leith with his children, on the previous evening, was very heart-rending. To them, too, he maintained his innocence.

A WOMAN MURDERED BY HER HUSBAND, NEAR CARLISLE.—Last Saturday a woman was murdered by her husband, near the road which leads from Carlisle to Blackwell. The unfortunate woman was about thirty-five years of age, the wife of Peter Handley, a besom and mat seller. Peter Handley, who travelled about the country with his wife and their two children, and another man, named Charles M'Minnis, a tinker by trade, with his wife and their four children, who had formed an acquaintance with the Handleys about eight days before, had encamped together near to the village of Durdar. On Saturday morning the men and their wives came to Carlisle, leaving the children with the exception of M'Minnie's infant, in the tents. In the course of the day all, except M'Minnie's wife, got intoxicated; and, after visiting several public-houses, they started for their tents about four o'clock in the afternoon; the deceased being so very drunk as not to be able to walk along with the rest. After considerable delay on their way home, M'Minnies and his wife left Handley and his wife soon after six o'clock, about three hundred yards on the Carlisle side of the Greystone Cottage, to get along the best way they could; but previous to their separating, the two men had a battle in Currock-lane, where they had been strolling for some time. From the evidence given by some of the witnesses upon the inquest, it appears that Handley immediately after commenced abusing his wife in a very brutal manner. The deceased was found by two men on the following morning at seven o'clock, in a field about two hundred yards from Greystone Cottage, in a state of insensibility, and almost dead; her clothes were bloody, her bonnet was upon the hedge on the opposite side of the road, and her shawl was lying upon the road. The Coroner's Jury, believing, from the evidence, that Handley committed the murder, returned a verdict of "Wilful murder" against him.

DISCOVERY OF ANCIENT WALL PAINTINGS.



ANCIENT WALL-PAINTING, DISCOVERED IN ST. MARTIN'S CHURCH, LEICESTER.

that are going on, that this interesting relic can be preserved, we hasten to give our readers an illustration of it.

Is the course of restorations which are now being carried on in St. Martin's Church, Leicester, the architects, Messrs Raphael and Arthur Brandon, brought to light a very interesting Painting of St. Catherine of Alexandria, holding a book in one hand and a sword in the other; a wheel is by her side. As was always the practice formerly, she is represented in the costume of the period, which agrees very closely with the time of the erection of the chancel, mentioned in the "Rentals Norum" as having been built in the year 1409, at a cost of £34.

This chancel has just been almost entirely rebuilt, and covered by a noble carved roof of English oak, full of detail, at the cost of upwards of £1000, thus curiously illustrating, in the same work, the immense difference which has taken place in the value of our coinage in four centuries. A very beautiful east window, filled with Messrs. Ward and Nixon's glass, is the munificent gift of a parishioner.

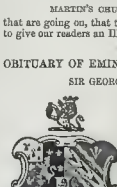
OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

SIR GEORGE PHILIPS, BART., OF WESTON.

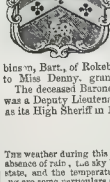


THIS gentleman, who died on the 3rd instant, aged eighty-one, was only son of the late Thomas Philips, Esq., of Sedgley, by Mary, his wife, daughter and heir of John Rider, Esq., of Manchester; and grandson of John Philips, Esq., of Heath House, Co. Stafford, the representative of a family, seated, for some centuries, in that county.

Sir George obtained his Baronetcy by creation, 21st February, 1828. He married, 16th October, 1783, Sarah Anne, eldest daughter of Nathaniel Philips, Esq., of Hollinghurst and by her, who died in 1844, has left an only son, the present Sir George Richard Philips, second Baronet of Weston and Sedgley, who has long had a seat in the House of Commons, as Member, successively, for Steyning, Kidderminster, and Poole. He married to the eldest daughter of the second Lord Waterpark, and has three daughters, the eldest of whom married, in 1839, Adam, Viscount Duncan.

Mr. Mark Philips, the late representative in Parliament for Manchester, is nearly related to the Baronet's family.

SIR RICHARD ROBINSON, BART., OF ROKEBY HALL, COUNTY LOUTH.



SIR RICHARD, whose decease is just announced, was eldest son of the late Sir John Robinson, Bart., of Rokeby Hall, who was created a Baronet in 1819, under that designation, having changed his patronymic of Reinel for the surname of his maternal ancestors, his mother, Grace, having been sister of Richard Robinson, Lord Rokeby, Archbishop of Armagh. Sir Richard was born 4th March, 1787, the eldest of eighteen children, and married, in 1813, the Lady Helena Eleanor Moor, daughter of Stephen, second Earl of Mount Cashel, by whom he has left, with other issue, a son and successor, the present Sir John Stephen Robinson, Bart., of Rokeby, an officer in the 60th Rifles, who is married to Miss Denny, granddaughter of the celebrated Lord Collingwood.

The deceased Baronet, who succeeded to his father's estate in 1832, was a Deputy Lieutenant of the county in which he resided, and served as its High Sheriff in 1844.

THE WEATHER.

THE weather during this week has been chiefly remarkable for the continued absence of rain. So dry has been nearly always cloudy, the air almost in a calm state, and the temperature somewhat above that of the season. The following are some particulars of each day:—

Friday, the day was overcast throughout the direction; the direction of the wind was at times N., and at other times it was N.N.E.; the average temperature of the day was 58°. Saturday, the sky was overcast throughout the day; the air was at times in a calm state, and at other times in gentle motion from the N.; the average temperature of the day was 56°. Sunday, the sky was by the most part overcast, but less densely so than it was during the two preceding days; the Sun's phase was occasionally visible, and the day was fine; there were slight showers during the day from the E.N.E.; and the average temperature of the day was 54°. Monday, the sky was for the most part covered by clouds, but in which at times were detached, more particularly about the zenith; the wind was light, and principally from the N.; the average temperature of the day was 53½. Tuesday, the sky was at times wholly covered by clouds, and at other times only partially so; the wind was light, and from the N.; the average temperature of the day was 52°. Wednesday, the sky was cloudless early in the morning; a fog prevailed about the time of sunrise; it was partially cloudy till evening, and after this time it was wholly overcast with very black clouds; lightning was frequently seen in the evening, in the direction of S., S.E., and S.S.E.; during the day the wind veered to the south; the average temperature of the day was 50°. Rain was falling heavily in the evening, and amounted to three-tenths of an inch. Thursday, the sky was for the most part cloudy, in the direction of the wind was south, the day was warm and close; its average temperature was 57½°, and that of the week was 54°.

The extreme thermometrical readings for each day were:—

Friday	Oct. 1	the highest during the day was 64; and, the lowest was 49 deg.

Blackheath, Friday, October 8, 1847. J. G.

DEATH OF MAJOR REVELL.—The papers announce the death of Mr. Thomas Read Revell, better known in the political circles as Major Revell. He was in early life a Reformer, and continued consistent to his principles throughout the whole of his lengthened career.

ENTERTAINMENT BY THE LADY MAYORESS OF YORK.—On Friday evening (last week), the Lady Mayoress of York (Mrs Hudson), gave a most splendid entertainment to a distinguished party, at the Mansion House, in honour of Earl De Grey and the officers of the Yorkshire Hussars. The party comprised upwards of 600 of the principal nobility and gentry, with their families.

EPITOME OF NEWS.—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

A man named Smallwood, formerly a private in her Majesty's 16th Regiment, and who recently purchased his discharge from it, lately took passage at Malta, by her Majesty's ship Ardent, for Marseilles, whence he comes to England to take up the splendid annual income of £2000.

The Prince Primate of Hungary, and Archbishop of Gran, died on the 19th Sept., at the age of 77 years. The Primacy is the highest office in Hungary after that of Palatine, and will probably remain vacant for some years, for as long as the seat remains vacant, the revenues of the Archbishopric of Gran, which amount yearly to £70,000 or £80,000 sterling, will flow into the imperial treasury.

The last Bombay papers seem to confirm the reported loss of the war steamer Cleopatra, with nearly 300 persons on board. She steamed from Bombay on the 14th of April last, with orders for Singapore, and had on board nearly 200 convicts. Her crew comprised seventy persons, the chief portion of whom were Europeans. There was, also, a detachment of marines on board. A frightful storm occurred four days after her departure from Bombay, during which it is feared the Cleopatra foundered off the coast of Malabar.

It was decided the other day, by the Stockport magistrates, that the absence of the husband in America for a continuous period of four years, without any intimation of his being alive, would widow his wife and in every respect place her in the position of a single woman.

The Corporation of Trinity House have recently erected a new beacon on the southern extremity of the Goodwin Sands, and great hopes are entertained of its stability.

A letter, dated from Copenhagen, the 26th ult., mentions the destruction, the same morning, of the rich and valuable library of the Royal Society of Icelandic Literature in that capital. The loss is distressing, inasmuch as this library contained more than 2000 unpublished MSS., and a numerous collection of single copies of ancient Icelandic works.

On the 27th ult., an experimental train passed, for the first time, on the railway from Hanover to Minden.

On Monday, several vehicles, termed Victoria-Septibus cabs, made their appearance in the streets of the metropolis; they run on four wheels, are drawn by one horse, and have very much the look of an omnibus in miniature, the entrance being at the back of the vehicle, with seats running along the sides; they are made to carry seven persons, and run for the same fares as the other description of cabs.

A letter from Vienna states that a crime, having great analogy to the murder of the Duchess de Praslin, has been committed in the environs of Agram. In an excess of rage, caused by the jealousy of his wife, a Hungarian Baron murdered, under circumstances of great atrocity, his wife and his young son, and then committed suicide. It is supposed the unhappy woman, after having been murdered, was placed over a small stove, where she remained for some hours. It is conjectured that the fire was ignited to hide a murder by strangulation.

The Session of the States of Bavaria was opened at Munich on the 29th ult., with Prince Luitpold as President.

Mr. Cobden arrived on the 29th of September at Lubeck, on his way from Stockholm. The following day a grand dinner was given in his honour at the Hotel du Nord, by the merchants of Lubeck.

The celebrated banker, M. Maurice d'Ullman, of Pesth, has just died from apoplexy, at the age of 70; he leaves a fortune of four millions of florins, or nearly £450,000.

Jenny Lind left London on Tuesday night, by the General Steam Navigation Company's mail-packet John Bull, for Hamburg.

A private meeting of the friends of Mr. Craven Berkeley has been held at Cheltenham, and £1100 have been raised towards a fund for the prosecution of a petition against the return of the present Member for that town.

Grace Aguilar, the authoress of so many popular works in favour of the Jews, and urging their claims to free and equal civil and religious rights throughout the civilized world, died on the 19th ult., at Frankfort, in her 32nd year.

The works on the railway from St. Petersburg to Moscow are being carried forward with extraordinary activity. In addition to peasants and prisoners, 20,000 soldiers are employed upon the work, and it is the intention of the course of the autumn to employ [illegible] men. The [illegible] are to be taken by the railway in Moscow [illegible] commencement of the works without delay.

The Polish trials are drawing to an end. The two leaders, Wisniowski and Kapuscinski, have been condemned to death, and twenty of the principal actors condemned to ten or fifteen years' imprisonment. The remainder will probably be restored to liberty.

The pension of the South Staffordshire Line from Walsall to Birmingham is expected to be opened immediately.

The members of the Birmingham Stock Exchange have passed resolutions urging a suspension of railway calls, and the cessation of works on lines now in progress.

The last accounts from the Danube announce that there has been a sanguinary battle in Albania, the end of which was the occupation by the Turks, of the positions between Belsi and Argyrocastro, which cut off the insurgents. Aclona is also in the hands of the Turks; but the rest of the country in those of the rebels. Their chief, Djelaska, has retired with 3000 men into the mountains, where he can, at a moment's signal, collect 7000 men.

A Mr. Alexander Bannatyne, a grain merchant at Glasgow, has been sentenced to be imprisoned for four months, and to pay a fine of £300, for mixing bran and thirds with oatmeal, supplied by his firm, as oatmeal for the relief of the poor in the Highlands.

The German papers give some frightful particulars respecting the decease of the Countess Goerlitz, at Darmstadt. The noble lady is supposed to have been murdered, and suspicion attaches itself to her husband.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, Judge of the Gloucester Small Debts Courts, has decided that attorneys cannot recover payment for letters written before process was issued.

The number of passengers between England and Boulogne during the week ending the 3rd of October, was 2274—a number exceeding by 136 that of the corresponding week of last year, and less than that of the preceding week this year by 41. The total number of passengers during the same week between England and Calais was 360—a number 4 less than that of the preceding week, and 39 less than that of the corresponding week of last year.

The household furniture of the Prince of Capua was seized at Malta on the 23rd of September, by a Maltese creditor. The Prince and Princess have lived in a degree of dignity and high and Royal bearing throughout, which moved every one. The house was stripped to the very window curtains. Even the Princess' toilette case was taken, and the Prince's plate. When the latter came to the forks and spoons, he could hardly credit that they were German silver. The Royal personages and their august children remained with bare walls.

At the Farnham County Court, on Tuesday, a case presenting some very unusual features was heard. It was Stephens v. Heathcote. The plaintiff, the incumbent of Frensham, summoned the defendant, the son of a clergyman, for £1, alleged to be the fee due to the plaintiff for marrying the defendant in April last. Judgment for 10s. 6d. was given in favour of the plaintiff.

The Dublin Evening Herald says, that "a Bill, whose outline is to repeal alike the Irish Poor Law and the Tithe Commutation statute, and to transfer from the land to a fund to be raised by an Irish Property or Income Tax, the entire charge of the Church and the pauperism of Ireland, has been prepared by the Government."

The East Indian and American Chambers of Commerce, of Liverpool, have held meetings, and appointed deputations to proceed forthwith to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to urge him to agree to some relaxation in the currency laws.

Files of papers have reached us from South Australia to the 5th of May inclusive. The accounts from Adelaide continue to be in the highest degree satisfactory, both as respects their agricultural and mining operations, but more especially the latter. This colony is, in every respect, an exception to all others throughout the British Crown, as it is entirely self-supported, and on this ground the inhabitants continue to urge their claim of a separate Government.

The wife of the well-known ex-police agent, Vidocq, has just committed suicide at St. Mandé, near Paris, where her husband had some years ago attempted to establish a paper manufactory.

On Tuesday last the Earl of Leicester and the Hon. E. K. Coke, M.P., bagged, at Wickham, Suffolk, four hundred and sixty-one partridges from their own guns in the day. A great many birds were picked up the next day.

A very unpleasant and somewhat alarming accident occurred on the terrace of Windsor Castle, on Wednesday morning. One of her Majesty's horses, engaged in drawing one of the hay-carts, suddenly left its team, and becoming alarmed, suddenly started off, and galloping furiously along the eastern, or, as it is generally called, the Queen's terrace, actually leaped the rampart under the window of the Victoria-terrace, and the shafts are long with his weight, he fell into the park below, dislocating his neck, and died instantly.

"THE GIRL AND THE LAMB."—PAINTED BY JACOB BECKER.

THE GIRL AND THE LAMB.

Painted by JACOB BECKER.—Engraved under the direction of G. LUDERITZ.*

Its buddings—ere the Sun
Has warmed our summer life to fruit—
The earliest race we run!

The touch of Youth pervadeth all;
First minutes of life's hours!
Youth, in the early blooming Spring.
Young Girl! young Lamb! young Flow'rs!

Young Girl! coquetting with her Pet,
New blesting from its dam;
As frolicsome to-day—and yet,
As gentle as the Lamb.

Fond, trusting Lambs were crown'd with flowers
For sacrifice of old;
Fond, trusting girls, in modern time,
With bridal wreaths—for gold—

Here pictured Lamb and Child are both
Unconscious of their fate;
Both young—both fond—both innocent—
And both of heart elate!

And little Girl, and little Lamb,
Two buds from Beauty's bowers,
Are both delighted with their lover,
And glory in their flowers!

The Lamb is fair—the flowers are bright
And beautiful to see;
But—Oh! the little Child is still
The glory of the three!

May her young heart from Life's full cup
Quaff sweets without the sours;
And still be peaceful as the Lamb
And cheerful as the flowers!

THANKSGIVING FOR THE LATE ABUNDANT HARVEST.

The following is the form of prayer and thanksgiving to Almighty God to be used in all churches and chapels in England and Wales on Sunday, October 17:—

ORDER FOR THE MORNING SERVICE.

The service shall be the same with the usual office for the holidays, except where it is in this office otherwise appointed. Let him that ministereth begin with these sentences:—

"To the Lord our God belong mercies and forgiveness, though we have rebelled against Him, neither have we obeyed the voice of the Lord our God to walk in His laws, which he set before us.

"It is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed, because His compassions fail not. He hath not dealt with us after our sins, nor rewarded us according to our wickedness."

Instead of Venite exultemus,

"Oh, give thanks unto the Lord and call upon his name; tell the people what things He hath done.

"Oh, let your songs be of Him, and praise Him, and let your talking be of all His wondrous works."

This is to be followed by the following verses from Psalms civ. 2, 3, 4, 5, cxxxv. 13, 15, cvii. 8, 9, lxv. 7, 8, cvii. 1, 2, cxxxvii. 3, xiv. 1, lxxv. 1, 9, cxxxv. 26, 27 followed by the proper Psalms xxx., xxxiii., xxxv.

First lesson—Isaiah xl. To whom shall ye liken God?

Second lesson—Romans xii. Judgment.

Instead of the first collect at morning prayer, the two following prayers are to be used

"O Lord, who for our iniquities has smitten us with the rod of correction, and in compassion for our manifold infirmities has withdrawn Thy scourge from us: We humbly acknowledge Thy fatherly goodness in blessing the fruits of our fields and redeeming our souls from death. In the hour of distress and affliction, when our heart fainted within us, through fear of the evils to come, we cried unto Thee, and Thou, O Lord, in Thy mercy, has changed our dearth into plenty, and our apprehensions and sorrows into thankfulness and joy. To thy loving kindness alone we ascribe our preservation from the dreadful calamities which must have fallen upon us from the continuance of famine in the land. Vouchsafe, O Lord, we beseech Thee, to accept our humble and hearty thanksgivings, and so to enlighten our understandings and sanctify our affections by Thy good spirit, that, being warned by Thy chastisements of the danger of sin, and knowing that in Thy favour is life, we may dread Thy displeasure above all things, and evermore strive to please Thee by such use of Thy bounties as may tend to Thy honour and glory, and to the temporal and eternal good of mankind, through Jesu Christ, our Lord. Amen."

"O merciful God, at whose bidding the earth hath withholden her increase, and again hath rendered her fruits in their seasons, give us grace that we may learn from Thy judgment our entire dependence upon Thee for the supply of our daily bread, and that, being fully persuaded that whatever blessing we receive at Thy hands is designed for our trial as well as for our comforts, we may in part share of Thy bounty in dutiful accordance with Thy holy will, to the afflicted and indigent, the widow, the orphan, and the aged, and thus obtain for ourselves that mercy which Thou, in Thy Word, hast promised to the merciful, through our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ. Amen."

Then shall follow the collect for Quinquagesima Sunday, and the second and third collects at morning prayer, and the Litany.

After the collect, "We humbly beseech thee, O Father," &c.

THE COMMUNION SERVICE.

After the prayer for the Queen—"Almighty God, whose kingdom is everlasting," &c., instead of the collect for the day shall be read the two collects used in the morning prayer, "O Lord, for our iniquities," &c., and "O, merciful God, at whose bidding," &c.

After which the Epistle, Col. iii., 12.

The Gospel, St. Matthew xxii., 34.

Then shall follow the Nicene Creed, and after that the Sermon.

In the Offertory shall be used, Matthew vii., 12, and Psalm xli., 1.

After the prayer for the whole state of the Church, the following is to be used:—

"O Gracious God! who art kind to the unthankful and the evil, we humbly acknowledge that we have not manifested a due sense of the numberless blessings, both temporal and spiritual, which we and our fathers have received at Thy hands, and of the mighty deliverances which Thy power hath wrought for this church and kingdom. Through our neglect of our ordinances, and misuse of Thy bounties, offences have been multiplied in the land; and Thy holy name hath been profaned among the heathen by our transgressions. Yet forsake us not utterly, O Lord, our Redeemer, but continue Thy loving kindness to Thy servant, as in the days of old. Send Thy heavenly blessing on our Sovereign Lady the Queen, and all that are in authority under her, and direct all their proceedings to the advancement of true religion and piety, and to the peace and prosperity of the realm. Pour forth the gifts of Thy Spirit on all pastors and teachers of Thy flock, that they may be clothed with righteousness, and that Thy Word spoken by their mouth may never be spoken in vain. And to all orders and degrees of men amongst us, vouchsafe such a measure of Thy grace that righteousness may flourish in our times, with abundance of peace, and that, being reconciled to Thee, through Thy Son, Jesus Christ, and united with each other in charity, we may be an acceptable people in Thy sight, and make known to the ends of the earth the riches of Thy mercy in Christ; to Whom, with Thee and the Holy Ghost, be all honour and glory for ever. Amen."

The order for the evening service is the same as the morning, with a very slight alteration.

CHURCH UNIVERSITIES &c.

OXFORD Oct. 6.

On Monday next, being the first day of term, a Congregation will be held for the granting of graces and conferring of degrees. On the same day there will be Latin Litany and Sermon at St. Mary's. The sermon will be preached by the Rev. H. O. Coxe, M.A., of Christ Church College, Sub-Librarian of the Bodleian.

CONSECRATION OF ST. PHILIP'S CHURCH, LEEDS.—On Wednesday a new church, to be called St. Philip's, which has been erected at Sean Ing, in the district of St. George, in Leeds, was consecrated by the Lord Bishop of Ripon, in the presence of a numerous and very respectable concourse of persons.

CONSECRATION OF THE NEW CHURCH, AT PEMBURY, KENT.—On Tuesday last this beautiful structure was consecrated, by the Archbishop of Canterbury. The prayers of the Church were read by the Rev. G. Woodgate, and the lessons by the Rev. Bryuner Belcher, and an appropriate discourse was delivered by the Archbishop's Chaplain, who took his text from Ezekiel, ch. 37, v. 27 and 28. The church was completely thronged. The ceremony of consecration appeared to make a deep impression upon the congregation present, among whom were the Marquis Camden, Earl Delawarr, Viscount Cantilupe, Sir Charles Hardinge, Mrs. Alexander, and many other members of the aristocracy of the neighbourhood. A collection was made in aid of the church amounting to £170.

PRINCE GEORGE OF CAMBRIDGE.—His Royal Highness Prince George of Cambridge left St. James's Palace on Tuesday, to resume his duties as Major-General commanding the Dublin district. The Prince will pay a few visits en route to the Irish capital

THE NEW BRITISH POSSESSION IN THE EASTERN ARCHIPÆLAGO.

A FEW days since, Mr. Brooke, the Rajah of Sarawak, arrived by the mail steamer, the Indus, at Southampton, which port he left nine years back, in his yacht, the Royalist, to explore the Indian Archipelago. His researches and exploits in that quarter are familiar to the public through the book of his friend and fellow navigator, the Hon. Captain Keppel. "Mr. Brooke's history," says the Singapore Free Press, "affords us a remarkable union of romantic adventure and of usefulness such as has been the lot of few private individuals to work. It is impossible to read the personal history while in Borneo, and not be struck with the total absence of selfishness by which all his actions have been distinguished, and yet his is a degree of enterprise and of energy that would have secured to an ambitious man the gratification of no moderate longings after fame or power. As it is, Mr. Brooke goes home heralded by no trumpet of his own; his noble character, his upright and useful life, would have been unknown to fame, but for the spontaneous eulogy bestowed on them by Keppel."

It may, however, be briefly explained that several Englishmen, among whom by far the most distinguished is Mr. Brooke, of Sarawak, sharing the views and inheriting the enterprising spirit of Sir Stamford Raffles, have settled in the Indian Archipelago, and begun to instruct the natives in the means of developing the resources of their country. From 1842 to 1846, the question was incessantly kept before the British Government, until they despatched an order to Borneo for the emancipation of Insular Asia from piracy and barbarism; and, as a commencement, it was resolved to take possession of Pulo Labuan. The accomplishment of this object was detailed in our Journal of April 3; and, by aid of a beautifully illustrated work, just published,* we are enabled to present our readers with an accurate view of the ceremony of taking possession; two specimens of the natives of Borneo, as well as of their arms of defence. The following description of the scene is from the pen of Mr. J. A. St. John, who has very effectively written the letter-press to the Illustrations:—

* Views in the Eastern Archipelago; Borneo, Sarawak, Labuan, &c. From Drawings made on the spot, by Captain Drickwater Bethune, R.N., C.B.; Commander Heath, R.N.; and others.

JAMES BROOKE, ESQ., GOVERNOR OF LABUAN.

With the island of Labuan, of which possession has now been taken for the Crown, the English may be said to have formed their first connexion in 1775,

WEAPONS OF THE BORNESE.

when, having been driven out of Balambangan by the Sulus, they, with the permission of the Sultan of Brunî, took refuge there. Since the period above mentioned, the tables have been strangely turned in the Eastern Archipelago. Then, weak and few in number, we were too happy to receive the protection and countenance of the Sultan of Borneo, of whom the buccaneers of the Sulu group seemed to have stood in awe. Now the Sultan is our humble ally and dependant, and but for the British flag which waves in his neighbourhood, and the treaty he has concluded with us, might any hour in the twenty-four be seized in his capital by the Sulus, or any other piratical tribe, and sold like the humblest individual into slavery.

NATIVE OF BORNEO.

NATIVE OF BORNEO.

The island of Labuan, probably destined to rival Singapore in importance, is about twenty-five miles in circumference, and occupies a commanding position at the mouth of the Borneo river. It rises in places to the height of nearly seventy feet above the level of the sea, and is almost entirely covered with a dense forest. Of the different species of trees it possesses little is known, except that some of them attain to a great magnitude, and that on several points of the shore the species of laurel which produces camphor is found. The island is traversed by numerous streams, of which some are of considerable dimensions, though two only appear to flow at all seasons of the year. The rest are torrents, which become dry in the depth of the hot season. Water, however, is found everywhere, by digging, in great abundance, and of the most excellent quality. In several places the streams are found running over beds of coal; and in a ravine, or small valley, towards the north, there exists a fine waterfall. On this part of the coast the woods stretch down to the very edge of the sea, whose waves roll inward and break against the shore beneath their outstretched boughs. The "rattans," from which the natives make cordage for their boats, are very numerous and valuable.

The sea in the vicinity of the island abounds with fish of a superior quality, and between two and three hundred men, who subsist entirely by fishing, constituted before our arrival its only population. Their numbers are at present increasing rapidly, and when the coal mines begin to be worked, and the land is laid under cultivation, Labuan will swarm with inhabitants. For some years before our appearance in those seas, the natives had been deterred by fear of pirates from properly carrying on their fishing operations, and are loud in their expressions of gratitude for the protection we afford them. All the small craft engaged in the coasting trade already touch at Labuan, where merchants from every part of the East will settle, as soon as permission to do so can be obtained from the British Government.

The British flag was hoisted on the island of Labuan, December, 24, 1846, by Captain Rodney Mundy, of her Majesty's ship Iris, and commanding the squadron on the coast of Borneo. To witness the ceremony many Malay chiefs of distinction had come to the island from Borneo with numerous and showy retinues, and followed by a multitude of the natives, who, quite unconscious of its import, were sanctioning, by their presence, the first step towards their own emancipation from barbarism. It was a cheerful, animating sight. Several flags were stuck up; tents were pitched on the clear spaces between the trees; the marines were drawn up in imposing array along the beach; the yards, masts, and rigging of the Iris and Wolf were decorated with gala flags and streamers, and repeated discharges of musketry and artillery sent forth clouds of white smoke, which were blown up and dispersed by the breeze. The natives, grouped together on a slightly rising ground, looked on with pleasure, not altogether, perhaps, unmixed with apprehension. Unused to the processes of civilization, they could not be aware that the strip of ground before them was destined soon to become the site of a great commercial emporium, inhabited by merchants and politicians from the West, thronged with population and riches, and encircled by those invisible ramparts of law and imperial power which afford her far more unfailing protection than whole mountains of masonry. That day will be a memorable one in the annals of Labuan. When all who beheld that enlivening ceremony shall have passed away, the flag of England will still be seen there, waving over the head of new generations, who will probably convert the whole of Labuan into a garden

We are much indebted to the officers employed in that service, particularly to Captain Bethune and Commander Hay, for the light which has been thrown on the character and productions of the island, which has been much more carefully explored than in so short a time we had any reason to expect. If their example be followed by those who succeed them, Labuan will be as familiar to the British public as the island of Bombay, with the topography of which many untravelled Englishmen are well acquainted, from Mr. Forrester's Heath.

Mr. Brooke contemplates a sojourn of six months in England. He is now residing at Mivart's Hotel, where he entertained a select party at dinner on Tuesday evening. On the same day, Mr. Brooke transacted business at the Colonial Office, the Admiralty, and the Board of Trade. Captain Mundy has, we understand, laid before the Committee of the United Service Club the distinguished services of Mr. Brooke, who has been invited to become a visitor at the Club during his stay in England. It is expected that Mr. Brooke will return to a fully organised and established government in Labuan.

THE THEATRES.

PRINCESS'.

This theatre opened for the season on Monday evening, with Shakspeare's tragedy of "Macbeth;" and numerous as were the persons amongst the playgoers to witness the performances of Miss Cushman and Mr. Macready, in the principal characters—this being, we believe, the first time that these two artistes have appeared together. The acting of Mr. Macready in Macbeth is well known. We have frequently had occasion to speak of it; but it struck us that on Monday night he did not put forward all his powers, except, indeed, in the last act, when he played with the energy and spirit we have all of old. His reception was very hearty, if not particularly enthusiastic; and he was from time to time loudly applauded. With Miss Cushman's Lady Macbeth we were less pleased than when we formerly witnessed the impersonation. There was too much melo-dramatic energy displayed; to our mind, it conveyed a correct picture of what Meg Merrilies would have been had she come to be Lady Macbeth; and it struck us more than once that the acting of both Mr. Macready and Miss Cushman to make points against each other, let them into several errors of reading. Mr. Cooper played Macduff, Mr. James Vining Rosse, and Mr. Bodda Hecate. We cannot say a great deal for the music, which was introduced, as usual, but required the infusion of a little more power than the operatic force of the theatre appears at present able to command. The mise en scène might also have been considerably improved. We have been so accustomed to look for elegance of costume and decoration at the Princess' Theatre, that any shabbiness in the getting up of a piece is doubly apparent. But the house was crowded to the ceiling, and with a paying audience for all their former privileges, beyond those of the press, were suspended so that the manager may say there was no occasion to incur any additional expenditure, when the public thronged, as it did, to be present at the representation, and appeared so satisfied.

HAYMARKET.

This popular house opened its doors on Saturday evening for the winter season, and Sheridan's glorious comedy of "The School for Scandal" was performed to a crowded audience; amongst whom the number of well-known playgoing faces showed the interest felt in the commencement of the new campaign. The comedy was, without doubt, chosen for the purpose of testing the strength of the company, as well as for best serving to introduce two performers altogether new to London—Mr. H. Farren and Mr. H. Vandenhoff, in the characters of Charles Surface and Careless. Sir Peter Teazle was, of course, performed by Mr. Farren, Joseph Surface by Mr. Creswick; with Mrs. Glover, Mrs. Clifford, and Mrs Nesbitt, to lend their powerful aid in perfecting the cast, which, it will be seen, was no ordinary one. We should also mention the addition of Mr. A. Wigan to the company. Of the débutantes we cannot speak in the highest terms. Mr. H. Farren has evidently been well tutored, and possesses requirements in intelligence, together with education and gentlemanly bearing. His figure is slight, and his voice and action agreeable: in fact, he has all the capabilities for becoming a good actor. But as a first dramatic experiment in stage boldness and at times lacks the repose essential to the finished actor. We opine that he has ventured on the London boards a little too soon; but he has come to a capital season, and we look forward to seeing him performing his

THE SUEZ CANAL.

The subject of the Suez Canal, always historically interesting and commercially important in itself, has been latterly brought under the special notice of the public by repeated statements in the daily papers. A German pamphlet by Mr. C. J. Wurm, of Hamburg (affirmed to be under the sanction of Prince Metternich,) founded on an article in the New Foreign Quarterly Review, was published five years ago, and gave the first intimation of the just-concluded Survey of the Austrian Engineers—ample reports of which have appeared almost weekly in the Times and Chronicle. Those engineers have reported the project to be costly, but perfectly practicable. Dutch and Belgian Surveys are, it is said, to follow the Austrian; and it has been stated that an English Engineering Survey is to take place in January. Under these circumstances, the following statement of the Project of the French Engineers, under Napoleon, to cut a Canal across the Isthmus, cannot fail to be interesting to our readers:—

THE FRENCH ENGINEERING SURVEY.

It was on the 4th of Nivose, year 7 (February, 1799), that Napoleon, then General of the French Republic, accompanied by Generals Berthier and Caffarelli, and the Savans, Monge and Bertholet, proceeded from Cairo to Suez, with a view of discovering the vestiges of the ancient canal of Sesostris, and of ascertaining, by the most accurate calculations, the expense and the period of time that would be required for the restoration of the great work. He was the first to observe the undoubted traces of the Canal, which he followed from the northern point of the Gulf of Suez, for several leagues, on horseback, and found that they are lost in the dry basin of the Bitter Lakes. He urged the work forward with his usual ardent determination; and a commission of engineers, comprising some of the greatest which France has produced, were forthwith instructed to make a survey, and accelerate operations. The commission consisted of Napoleon himself, General Jacotin, Ingenieur-en-Chef of the French Board of Works, Le Pere, Fevre, Devilliers, Duchenoy, Chabrol, and St. Genis.

These engineers collected the records of its ancient existence and modern vestiges, and shortly ascertained its course. They entered into elaborate details as to the levels of the two seas; made a chain survey, which is extant (and appears to-day in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS) of the line to the north, which they propose, and laid down a plan for restoring the Western Branch

Neither English writers on the subject nor modern engineers have ever given the slightest intimation of their cognisance of this fact—that a survey by unmatched engineers, with levels, plans, and sections, of the Canal's route in as regular a form as any railway plan of Cubitt, Stephenson, or other engineers, now before Parliament. Indeed, their allusions to the advantage or necessity of obtaining fresh surveys demonstrate their ignorance of it. We believe it to be for the first time brought under the notice of the English public. Two of the plans and sections first appear, in a connected state, in the annexed Illustration.—(See Plan of Canal, Fig. 1.; and Section, Fig. 2.)

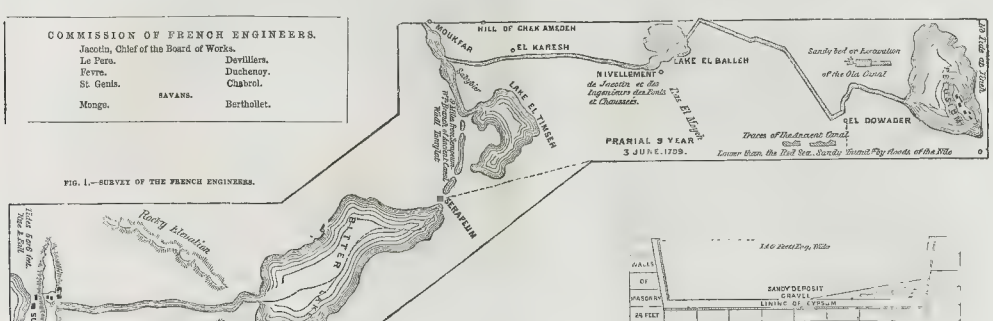

FIG. 1.—SURVEY OF THE FRENCH ENGINEERS.

n a direct line due north through the trough of the valley described, for 13½ English miles. The walls of the Canal are of solid masonry, from 6 feet to 18 feet deep; and the space between them is, as Strabo testifies, as nearly as can be, 100 feet. But the bed of the Canal has been raised by sand and earth, washed into it by the torrents; and a new and higher bed has been curiously consolidated by natural means, from the effects of calcareous filtrations. The French engineers dug through the fictitious bed, and found the real bed 4 feet or 5 feet beneath it. They then detected the artificial composition employed by the ancient engineers for retaining the waters of the Canal, which was found to consist of moist saline sand, earthy clay, and gypsum. (See Fig. 2.)

The appearance of the Bitter Lake is a series of depressions extending about twenty-seven miles in a northerly direction, with a depth of from twenty to fifty-four feet below high-water mark at Suez, and with a width of from five to seven miles. Deposits of water, its bottom consists a few shallow salt-pools; its sides, at the Red Sea high water mark, exhibit marine debris. The lake El Timsah occurs nearly in the centre of the chain of hollows above-mentioned, and forms the western elbow of the series.

The lake El Timsah is lower than the Red Sea, and is covered by the waters of the Nile during inundations.

The interval (El Kareh) between the Bitter Lakes and Lake El Timsah consists of sandy soil, and is at its greatest elevation not more than nineteen inches and a half above the level of the Red Sea.

The distance between this lake and the low marshy swamps of El Kareh, is, at the utmost, not more than 1000 feet, and the land is not more than three feet three inches higher than the Red Sea. The soil of this interval consists of sand resting here and there on compact gravel.

From Lake El Timsah, passing behind the hill of Chek Amadeh, where vestiges of the northerly canal of the Pharoahs appear, the ground is everywhere on a level with the Red Sea as far as El Kareh.

We follow the traces of the same canal from El Kareh to Das El Cassah, and thence, in a slanting direction, to Bir El Dowader, in a northerly line from sea to sea. Here the ground is all sandy, and much lower than the Red Sea.

A little to the north of El Dowader, the vestiges of the Canal reappear, exhibiting a prolonged line of excavation to the north of the Bitter Lakes, and intubated, during the floods of the Nile, by the waters of Lake Menzaleh.

Portions of the old great wall of Sesostris, which guarded the eastern frontiers of Egypt, and protected the Canal from the sands of the Desert, also reappear in this latter division of the line.

From the excavation to the entrance of Timsh, passing between Faramah and the ruins of Pelusium, the land is twenty-nine feet six inches lower than the Red Sea.

It will be obvious, from the topographical description (as the French engineers state in their report and exhibit in their survey), that very little cutting of ground will be requisite to put the above series of lagoons and declining sandy flats which intervene as far as the Mediterranean, in communication with the waters of the two seas. There is no natural barrier, whatever, interposed.

The line which we have followed in this topographical survey of the Isthmus, is the line followed by Jacotin and the French engineers of 1799, as laid down in the above Illustration; and that is the line which must be followed in opening the proposed communication between the Red Sea and the Mediterranean.

The French line, resulting from Jacotin's survey, passes through the bed of the Bitter Lakes, the Lake El Timseh, thence to the marshy grounds of El Kareh (nearly on a level with the Red Sea), thence to Das El Cassah, afterwards to El Dowader; thence the line follows the traces of the old Canal, and rulins of the wall of defence of Sesostris, in a direct line, the ground being sandy, and lower than the Red Sea; hence to the occasionally flooded strip of land, by Lake Menzaleh, where the excavation of the ancient Canal re-appears in a sandy valley; thence to the entrance of Timeh, passing between Faramah and Pelusium, where the land (having gradually declined, unobstructedly, the whole way from El Kareh) is 29 ft. 6 in. lower than the Red Sea.

The length of this line is 86 miles (being prolonged indirectly to save expense). The French engineers propose the erection of a breakwater at Timeh, and estimate the whole cost (even including the western branch) at no more than £600,000.

Linant, an engineer who surveyed the Isthmus in 1841—2, confirms the report and survey of Jacotin and the French engineers of 1799; and recommends the same line, both on account of its practicability and economy.

His survey is officially published in a Parliamentary Report, entitled "Commercial Tariffs," &c., Part 1., presented to both Houses of Parliament by command of her Majesty, the 14th July, 1843.

The following is a summary of the Canal's general advantages, from the pamphlet of Mr. Edward Clarkson, reprinted from an article on "Steam Navigation to India," in the "Foreign Quarterly Review," 1837, * and which refers to former papers on the same subject, by the same writer, in the "Monthly Magazine" and "Asiatic Journal" of 1835

"The distance from the Mediterranean to the Red Sea by the Suez Navigable Canal, would be from 80 to 90 miles. The time consumed by a steam-boat in this transit might be averaged at five hours. What is the time now consumed in the transit through Egypt by the voyager from England to Bombay? and what is the nature of the transit? Passengers, packages, and letters, after being landed at Alexandria, are now conveyed by the Mahmoudie Canal 40 miles to Atfe, on the Nile. This transit consumes twelve hours, and is performed by a track-boat, attended by numerous inconveniences. The passengers, goods, and letters, are landed at Atfeh; they are there re-shipped, and carried by steam-boat from Atfeh up the Nile to Boulac, a distance of 120 miles. This water transit consumes 18 hours. At Boulac, which is the port of Cairo, the passengers, goods, and letters, are again unshipped, and have a land transit of two miles before they arrive at Cairo. At that capital, a stoppage of 12 hours, which is considered indispensable to the travellers, occurs. A fourth transit then takes place to Suez from Cairo, across the Desert. This is performed by vans, with two and four horses, dromedary-chairs (two dromedays carrying a species of litter between them for ladies and children), and is often attended, owing to the scarcity of good horses, with great inconveniences. The distance of this land transit is 84 miles, and consumes 35 hours. The whole distance by the present line is thus 246 miles! By the proposed line it is 80! The transit by the present line consumes four days! The transit by the proposed line would not consume more than four hours!

"Instead of a land, and very fatiguing Desert transit, with all the obstructions and inconveniences of track-boats, native steamers, donkey-chairs, and vans, shipping and unshipping, unloading and reloading, there will be land transit and the whole passage may be made by sea from London to Bombay without change. Instead of four days being consumed in the Egyptian transit, five hours will only be requisite. Moreover, the £8 10s. expense caused by the present transit in Egypt, and charged to each person, will, in future, be saved by the passenger."

LITERATURE.

THE ARCHÆOLOGICAL JOURNAL. No. XV. Published by the ARCHÆOLOGICAL INSTITUTE.

This is, unquestionably, one of the most attractive numbers yet issued by the Institute. It is not a collection of abstracts of dry-as-dust documents, interesting only to some fifty or hundred persons, whose eccentric tastes are not worth consulting; but the Journal before us, is, indeed, rich in what it professes to be, "Contributions to the Arts and Manners of the Early and Middle Ages." The first paper is the conclusion of Mr. Hawkins's illustrated account of the coins and treasure found in Cuerdale; the author, regarding them, under strong evidence, as of colonial origin, and affording an interesting illustration of the commerce of the north during a period of which, perhaps, the commencement of the tenth century was the most active epoch. Other Archæologists are, however, of opinion, that the ornaments were of northern manufacture. By far the greater number of them have been formed by the hammer only, and ornamented by means of punches of very simple form, the patterns having been produced by repetitions of the same punch, or by combinations of two or more; so that the mode of construction is highly curious, as evidence of the state of art. The final has brought a communication from Mr. Pettigrew, of Copenhagen, who recommends British antiquaries to carefully ascertain the localities where Cufic coins and silver ornaments have been found in England and Ireland: "by such facts, we should be enabled to give a still clearer and more detailed account of the remarkable trade between the east and the north of Europe, which existed at so early a period, and of the influence which this connection with the Levant had upon the civilisation of the north of Europe."

The next paper is by the Rev. Mr. Hussey, on the site of "Anderids, or Andredescester," a much vexed question among antiquaries, but which the author of the present paper shows, upon unshaken authority, to have been at Pevensey —"the site of the long-lost Romano-British city." Supplementarily, Mr Hussey adduces a well-supported inference—"that no spot can possess any claim, independent of authentic records, to have been a Roman city, unless exhibiting clear evidence of walls, or vestiges of walls, such as the Romans would have erected for its defence."

The beautiful church of Iffley, near Oxford, with its almost matchless examples of rich Norman work, is admirably detailed and illustrated in the next paper, by Mr. J. H. Parker. Among the details engraved are the west doorway, perhaps one of the best specimens of its style; the moulding of the tower arch, is ornamented with some of the signs of the Zodiac, and with birds, winged lions, and a cherub; the two next orders are ornamented with beak-heads, the inner arch with zig-zag "—An important note to this passage is worthy of consideration.—"It was well shown by Professor Willis, in his lecture on Norwich Cathedral, that, whatever its origin may have been, the zig-zag ornament did not come into general use until late in the Norman style. The earlier parts of Norwich are without it, but in the later portions it begins to appear." The other striking illustrations are the impost of the south doorway, enriched with roses and sage square flowers, zig-zag and other patterns; the moulding of the lower arch, and a boss of the church vault, are also rare. By the way, on a recent visit to Iffley, we enquired of a ploughboy, stretched upon an altar-tomb in the churchyard, as to what could induce so many persons to visit Iffley church: "Why," replied the lad, "there's so much zig-zag about it;" and no archæologist could have given a sounder reason.

Mr. Albert Way has contributed the next paper—"Illustrations of Medieval Jousts, Tournaments, and Judicial Combats," from a valuable volume of collections now preserved at Melton Constable; presenting an assemblage of popular subjects which composed the hand-book of the English gentleman, in the reign of Henry VI. One of the illustrations shows "how a man schalle be armyd at his ese when he schal fighte on foote;" and another is the military axe, or hache d'armes, a very favourite weapon in single combats, during the fifteenth century. Mr. Way's paper is throughout marked by discrimination and the nicest taste.

Among the rarities of the number is a fac-simile of the sign-manual of William the Conqueror, believed to be the only instance known of his attestation of the charter of a subject.

In the New Publications noticed, the reader cannot fail to be highly interested in a "Chronicle of the Mayors and Sheriffs of London, from 1188 to 1274," just reprinted by the Camden Society. It is in Latin, but, we are happy to learn that it has been translated, and will shortly be published. Meanwhile, the Reviewer gives a slight sketch of its contents. It is the most valuable chronicle extant of English affairs, particularly those of the City of London, in the thirteenth century; it was consulted by Stow, and transcribed by Selden and Hargreave; and, although frequently cited for its chronological details, no real use has hitherto been made of the evidences it affords of the internal condition of the metropolis in the 13th century.

With respect to the government of the City, we can only quote the fact, that all the civic officers at the beginning of the thirteenth century were landowners; and, in all probability, elected owing to the influence commanded by their possessions. Before the close of the reign of Edward I., we discern new names among the chief office-bearers of the Corporation: the old Norman families of London gradually disappear from the calendar of Mayors and Sheriffs; men enriched by the increasing commerce of the country were the legitimate successors to their station and influence in civic affairs; and, by the accession of Edward III., the feudal divisions of the metropolis, with the exception, perhaps, of the possessions of the Church, had ceased to exist.

The material aspect of the City must have been wretched in early times. From the close of the 11th century, we read of fires sweeping away its wooden houses and church steeples: one of these great conflagrations, in King Stephen's reign, began at London-bridge, and raged to St. Clement Danes. The streets were unpaved; and, when the wooden steeple of Bow Church fell into Cheap, in the year 1170, the tallest beams sank out of sight into the earth and mud.

A CHART OF ANCIENT ARMOUR, FROM THE ELEVENTH TO THE SIXTEENTH CENTURIES. By JOHN HEWITT. Bell.

A few years since, comparatively with its age, one of our most popular collections of Armour was a heap of anachronisms; we refer to the Tower Gallery. It is now, however, in such order as has been chosen by the author of the Chart before us for the later or existing specimens of Armour. This is an important improvement, since it places the Tower Exhibition above a mere "sight," by instantly furnishing the spectator with a distinct idea of the several war-suits of our ancestors, in the varieties of scale, ring, mail, and plate. Such information illustrates history, by peopling the mind's-eye with the vera effigies of its prime movers. It aids, also, the understanding of numberless objects of public curiosity; as the sepulchral monuments of our Cathedrals; the brasses of our country Churches; the illuminations of middle-age lore; and the armour galleries, generally, of our own or of foreign countries.

The Chart exhibits the changes in the fashion of European armour from the time of the Norman Conquest till its final disuse under the Stuarts; three figures being given to each century. Each figure is about 7 inches in height, distinctly and effectively executed in lithotint, so that the characteristic details are distinctly shown. Thus, we commence with a Norman Knight, from the Bayeux tapestry, his helmet with nasal, worn over the capuchin or cowl; the body armour, a hauberk with its pectoral, formed of flat rings of metal sewed on a garment of stout cloth or skin; the legs are protected by bands, probably of leather or cloth round a garment of coloured cloth. The shield is kite-shaped, with a fanciful device on its front; heraldic bearings not being yet in use: the lance of the period had a little streamer attached to it, called the gonfanon. Such are the details of the earliest specimen. Thence we pass to the figure of an armed warrior of 1150, and one of the earliest effigies in which armorial bearings are found.

Thus will convey a general notion of the efficiency of the Chart, in chronologically illustrating the changes in armour, in which there appears to have been as much coxcombry as in civil costumes, though the fashions are somewhat disputed through the rough drawings and tapestries of a rude and inartificial age.

Around the figures is a bordure of helmets in curious variety. Mr. Hewitt has appended a Descriptive Key, in which he gives an epitome of the history of European Armour, from the 11th to the 17th centuries. The disappearance of armour is thus narrated. In the time of the Commonwealth, "the breast and back plates alone remained, and even they were soon afterwards generally discarded, so that, in the time of Charles II. all that was left of the massive panoply of ancient knighthood was a small gorget of steel, worn by the officers of troops over a buff coat. With the common soldiery, indeed, the breast-plate, back, and pot-helmet, still lingered a little while; but, at length, under William III., the last remnant of armour was thrown aside and all the old suits were called in by Royal order to the Tower."

To the painter, the sculptor, and the costumist, as well as to the classes we have glanced at, Mr. Hewitt's Chart will prove a very interesting instructor or refresher.

THE NAUTICAL GAZETTEER; OR, DICTIONARY OF MARITIME GEOGRAPHY. Part I. HUNT.

This promises to be so important a work, that the reader will, doubtless, thank us for directing his attention to its object—to furnish the Naval Service with a Book of Reference applicable to the localities of the Sea, embracing general accounts of the coasts of the continents and islands of the world, with the roadsteads, harbours, navigable rivers, shoals, bars, rocks, channels, currents, &c.; together with the towns and cities approachable by shipping; also, latitudes, longitudes, soundings, anchorages, and compass variations, with sailing directions to and from principal roads; the whole arranged alphabetically, in grand divisions of the oceanic surface, namely, the North Atlantic, the South Atlantic, the Indian Ocean, the Sea of Pacific, the South Pacific, and the Arctic and Antarctic Seas. Nor will the references in this work be confined wholly to nautical information: the topography of the ocean has its own inhabitants, localities, and diversified population, customs, and institutions, will be introduced. In short, the work will be to those educating for the naval service as necessary as the Geographical Dictionary is common education; and to the voyager what the common gazetteer is to the land traveller.

It will scarcely be credited that "the greatest naval empire in the world" has not produced such a work of reference as "The Nautical Gazetteer" but, the Government support appear to be atoning for their past apathy in the matter by the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty taking the present work under their especial sanction. It is also explained that, under their auspices, the contributors to Maritime Geography have, of late years, been very important: these results will prove of the most essential service to the Editors of the work before us, which, we agree with the projectors, was "imperiously required to carry onward the march of improvement, and extend the limits of the useful." The publication will be in Parts—the present extending from A A to Brehat, North Atlantic division.

A NEW UNIVERSAL ETYMOLOGICAL AND PRONOUNCING DICTIONARY. Parts XI. to XXI. J. Gilbert.

With Part XXI., extending to the close of letter I, is completed the first Volume of this very useful and much-needed Dictionary. The abundance of technicalities explained in its columns go far towards fulfilling the promise in the title-page, that the work shall embrace "all the terms used in Art, Science, and Literature." The Dictionary will be completed in two volumes; and will, doubtless, prove acceptable to a very large class of inquirers after knowledge.

THE RAIL, ITS ORIGIN AND PROGRESS.—By PETER PROGRESS THE YOUNGER. Yorke, Clarke, and Co.

This is a popular description of the Railway, its origin, construction; accidents, traffic, expenses; signals, &c. The details are as attractive as could be expected; for the book-making activity of the age has already stripped the subject of novelty, and much must now be left to the taste of the writer, and his skill in simplifying the descriptive matter. Of course, much could not be expected in sixty pages—the extent of this little book; and to this extent the account of the Rail is very creditably executed.

TALES FOR THE YOUNG.—BOOK OF SACRED POETRY.—BOOK OF FABLE AND ALLEGORY. TALES FROM HERODOTUS. Burns.

Four unexceptionable books for young persons, each bearing ample evidence of the great improvement in the production of works of this class, in which it is, happily, no longer the fashion to write down to the capacities of the readers. The illustrations, too, are of the same intellectual character.

RABBIT NETTING IN EPPING FOREST.

RABBIT NETTING.

VAST numbers of Rabbits are netted, for the London Markets, in that portion of Epping Forest, known as the Warren, lying near "The Roebuck," at Chingford. Such is the locality of our Artist's spirited Illustration, sketched at this period of the year, and presenting a glimpse of the fine wooded scenery of the district.

The mode of Netting Rabbits, i.e. taking them in nets, is practically as follows:—On the night previous, a line of stakes is driven, usually about 200 yards in length, just facing the rabbit-holes. Next morning, when the Rabbits have left their holes to feed, netting is hung upon the stakes, and men and dogs then drive the Rabbits, who, taking towards the burrows, are caught in the netting, and thus easily captured. In this way, it is not uncommon to net twelve dozen Rabbits as one morning's work.

THE POLICE OFFICES OF LONDON.

BY ANGUS B. REACH.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.

IF an afternoon's ounce up the sunny side of Regent-street, you turn aside at Argyle-place—thread, as it were, the narrow isthmus of houses which it presents, and which opens into the broad quiet street beyond—furthermore, if keeping to your left, you encounter a group of policemen, the invariable signs and symbols of police majesty being at hand—pass through them towards the doorway left invitingly open—mount the flight of stone stairs which you will see to your left, and push open the door at the top of it: you will find yourself in a room about the size of an ordinary parlour—a lightsome, cheerful apartment—with a long, low writing-desk stretched across it at the upper end, and littered with newspapers, police sheets, and so forth—light rail compartments mapping out the centre of the room into pens or witnesses, prosecutors, attorneys, and prisoners. You will probably furthermore remark easily lounging in the arm-chair placed behind the aforesaid desk, a pleasant, gentlemanly-looking, elderly man, somewhat bald, and with a strong resemblance to Sir James Graham. You are in the Marlborough-street Police-Court, listening to the decision of Mr. Hardwicke.

Marlborough-street is quite a fashionable and distingué police-office. You see at a glance that you are amongst quite a different set of witnesses, prosecutors, and even offenders, to those you have remarked haunting the purlieus of Clerkenwell or Worship-street. For Marlborough-street—with its two divisions of police, lettered C and D—presides over fashionable squares and gay West-end streets; regions of coroneted carriages and cold stately town residences, or else of glittering thoroughfares; gaudy shops, brilliant with every graceful luxury, every winning trifle, every fashionable bagatelle; a quartier of dashing men-milliners, and elaborate confectioners, and incomparable modistes, and trouser-makers from Berlin, and boot-makers from Paris, and music-sellers, and bouquet-sellers, and print-sellers, and lace-sellers—in fact, the whole commercial world of luxury and taste, good, bad, and indifferent, flashing their brilliant fancy-wares, their rich stuffs, and "ducks of bonnets," and "lores of frocks, and saucy caricatures, and all the hundred thousand and one toys and trifles of elegant gim-crackery, from Dresden china to papier-maché cigar-cases, from diamond necklaces to mosaic shirt-studs, flashing and sparkling, we say, through plate-glass and from gaudy shop-fronts—this shifting, changing kaleidoscope of the necessaries of fashionable life, until one feels as if all the Passages of Paris in general, and the Palais Royal in particular, had been emptied of every piece of fashionable nick-nackery they boasted for the delectation of the loitering Londoner, if he dawdles over them without his wife upon his arm, but for his especia horror, and the rapid lightening of his purse, should the lady jerk his coat as she stands entranced before a certain curious semi-transparent article of female costume, or speechless in her admiration of a huge thready web, apparently the production of a mammoth spider, but which the male listener will soon be informed is one of the wonders of the lace-workers of Mechlin.

Distinguished, then, by these features—a rich, fashionable, and elegant part of London—the Marlborough-street police district has, of course, its own peculiar class of offences to deal with. You there hear comparatively seldom of the murderous outrages, the brutal assaults, which some districts teem with. The robber and the burglar of the East-End are softened into the swindler and the pickpocket of the West. Crime takes a more dandified aspect. It assumes glazed boots, and achieves an unexceptionable tie to its cravat. The habitués of Marlborough-street comparatively seldom see great hulking animals, with broken noses, and dislocated jaw-bones, and hair still clotted with their blood, prefer charges for assaults, committed in night-cellars, and vagrant lodging-houses, where beds are let out at twopence a night. Instead of these, we shall, probably, have half a dozen easy-going, élanguish, men on town, introduced to the "worthy magistrate," as having been captured while solacing themselves over-night with dice or rouge et noir in some police-marked fashionable gaming house. The class of crime which Marlborough-street deals with has frequently a species of smartness, as to speak, slang polish about it. While the City magistrate is investigating a case of mercantile forgery, or clerkly embezzlement, he of Marlborough-street is unravelling the mysteries of a swindling bill transaction; while at Clerkenwell or Worship-street, a half-starved, sodden woman is pulled up for stealing a pound of rancid bacon or a mouldy crust of bread, the flaunting West-End "Lady Thief" rustles in satin at the more fashionable bar. Anon, we have an exposé of aristocratic family disputes—the raw materials to cook up into a month's supply of scandal; again, the edifying disclosure of the intellectual midsummer night's dream of some young sprig of nobility, afflicted with that unaccountable mania which develops itself in uncontrollable tendencies to wrench off knockers, and drive cabs upon the foot pavement. The epidemic, however, once so prevalent, is now happily on the decline.

POLICE OFFICE, No. 1, LOWER N.—MARLBOROUGH STREET.

Mr. Hardwicke is, as we have stated, a rather elderly and mild-looking personage. He conducts the business in an easy and conversational, yet by no means undignified, style, and is not above receiving a hint from any of the minor officials who surround him. Mr. Hardwicke was transferred from the Lambeth-street Office to Marlborough-street. He is one of the senior metropolitan magistrates, and we believe that his works upon police subjects had no inconsiderable share in contributing hints for the organisation and embodiment of the metropolitan force. Mr. Hardwicke, dit on, is a capital linguist—a qualification of great service in the police judge presiding over a locality so swarming with foreigners, as is the Marlborough-street district, and where applications for assistance from distressed Poles and other expatriated unfortunates are of so frequent occurrence.

PRINTERS' PENSION SOCIETY.—On Tuesday night, a meeting of this Society was held at the London Tavern. Mr. J. C. Bloomfield, in the chair. The Secretary, Mr. Hodgson, stated that, since the last meeting, no less than ten of the pensioners had died during the year. The next election of pensioners would take place in March, and several of the applicants had already been admitted as candidates. The number of pensioners at present on the books of the Society was only 43, the average number being 50. The object of the Society was to afford permanent relief to aged and infirm printers and their widows, by the granting of £12 12s. to the men, and £8 8s. to the widows. The subscriptions and donations were very favourable; and although the capital stock of the Society amounted to £5000, the Committee strongly urged upon the subscribers the necessity for further exertions in aid of the funds of the Society.

PREVENTION OF RAILWAY ACCIDENTS.—The Great Western Railway Company, with a view to the prevention of accidents as far as possible, have directed that a man, to be called the "travelling carriage porter," shall accompany every express train in each direction. The business of this man will be to ride on the seat placed for him on the tenders, and to keep a steady and vigilant look out on both sides and along the top of the trains, so that, in case of any accident to any of the carriages of the train, or of any signal from the guard, or any apparently sufficient cause that may come to his observation, he may at once communicate with the engine man, and, if necessary, stop the train. Further, it will be his business, generally, to have charge of the carriages forming the train, to see that in every respect they are in good condition

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

SWINSHEAD, LINCOLNSHIRE.

Seven miles from the seaport of Boston, in Lincolnshire, lies the rural town of Swinshead, once itself a port, the sea having flowed up to the market-place, where there was a harbour. The name of Swinshead is familiar to every reader of English history, from its having been the resting-place of King John, after he lost the whole of his baggage, and narrowly escaped with his life, when crossing the marshes from Lynn to Sleaford, the castle of which latter place was then in his possession. The King halted at the Abbey, close to the town of Swinshead, which place he left on horseback, but being taken ill, was moved in a litter to Sleaford, and thence to his castle at Newark, where he died on the following day. The King's death is, by Matthew Paris and other historians, ascribed to a fever; but, an author who lived about a century after the event, asserts that the King was poisoned by a monk of Swinshead.

Apart from this traditional interest, Swinshead has other antiquarian and historical associations. Near the town is a circular Danish encampment, sixty yards in diameter, surrounded by a double fosse; all remarkably perfect to the present day. This was, doubtless, a post of importance, when the Danes, or Northmen, carried their ravages through England, in the time of Ethelred I.; and the whole county passed permanently into the Danish hands about A.D. 877. The encampment is shown in our second Illustration; the inner fosse, almost encircled with willows, and the whole work, except in the eye of the antiquary, is scarcely associated with the strategies of war and siege.

Swinshead has a large church, containing some very beautiful examples of decorated and perpendicular Gothic architecture. A portion of the edifice having become dilapidated, and in a dangerous condition, the Master and Fellows of Trinity College, Cambridge, (in whose gift is the living, and who possess, in connexion therewith, a large estate in the neighbourhood,) determined to rebuild the chancel, at a cost of upwards of £1500, in the most substantial manner, according to its ancient proportions, which surpass many of the village churches in the kingdom.

The foundation stone of the chancel was laid in April last, by the Vicar, the Rev. E. L. Gulliband; the architect for the College being Mr. Stephen Lewin, and the builders, Messrs. John Baker, jun., and W. Morriss.

The church, as seen in our first Illustration, has a lofty stone tower, with buttresses and enriched pinnacles at the angles; and a stone tower rising from the centre.

In the old chancel was an enriched monument to Sir John Lockton, who died 1610. He demolished the old Abbey of Swinshead; and, with the materials, built the present structure known as Swinshead Abbey.

NEW RAILWAY CARRIAGE.

We give a sketch of one of the improved Railway Carriages, just constructed by Messrs. Adams, of Fair Field Works, Bow, for the North Woolwich Branch of the Eastern Counties Railway; and we consider the Directors to have shown judgment in their departure from the common standard to suit an increasing traffic without adding to the length of their trains. These Carriages are forty feet in length, and nine feet in width; the extra width being gained by building the Carriage frames to the width of the ordinary step-boards. The Directors have thus succeeded in accomplishing more on the narrow gauge than has yet been accomplished on the broad gauge, where the carriages are only eight feet six inches in width, by twenty-eight feet in length. The extreme axles are thirty feet apart, and being on eight wheels, these Carriages are obviously safer than those on six wheels or on four. Notwithstanding their length, they will pass a curve of two hundred feet radius by means of the flexibility and arrangement of the springs, which permit the wheels to traverse laterally. The buffer heads are also made to radiate with the springs or curves, so that they press firmly under all circumstances. The Carriages are fitted up in four compartments; one first class with couches all around, and a table in the centre; the other three, second class. They will carry about one hundred and ten passengers.

Among the advantages which these improved Carriages present over ordinary Carriages, are—

1. Greater steadiness at high velocities, the great length of the body maintaining its equilibrium independently of the wheels.
2. Diminution of friction, by the easy spring permitting free rolling movement of the wheels, without pressing the flanges against the rails, whether on curves or on nominally straight lines. Also, by diminution of the gross weight of the carriages, as compared with the passengers carried.
3. The proportional diminution of requisite engine-power, equal to fully one-third, as compared with the traction of six-wheeled carriages.
4. Reduction of the length of trains, by increasing the breadth of the carriages.
5. Greater safety; since one wheel breaking out of eight involves far less risk than one out of four or six. The almost impossibility of getting off the rails, on account of the perfect action of the springs, which will keep the wheels always turned to the plane and curves of the rails, whether regular or irregular, instead of confining them to the plane of the carriage.

The allowance of a passage-way through the whole of the interior of the train for the guards, would be important, in case of the illness of a passenger, or a fire, or other accident. In second and third-class carriages, the arrangements for passing through would be as in the pit of a theatre—a passenger could move aside, so as not to lose space. In a first-class carriage, a passenger-way, 1 foot 6 inches wide, would be left, and passengers' cabins arranged on each side facit ekets during the journey. At present, a journey of fifty miles is frequently performed in little more than an hour, with some additional risk from high speed; and, at the end of the journey, a quarter of an hour is wasted in taking tickets.

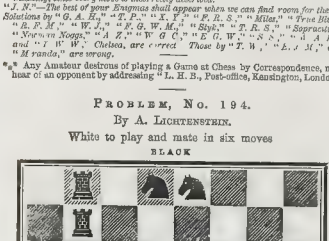
PROBLEM, NO. 194.

By A. LICHTENSTEIN.

White to play and mate in six moves

BLACK



WHITE.

CHESS IN THE METROPOLIS.

THE TWO FOLLOWING SHORT AND SPRIGHTLY EXAMPLES OF THE SCOTCH GAME WERE PLAYED NOT LONG SINCE BETWEEN MR. HARRWITZ AND MR. S——S, OF THE LONDON CHESS CLUB

WHITE (Mr. H.)	BLACK (Mr. S.)	WHITE (Mr. H.)	BLACK (Mr. S.)
1 K P two	K P two	14. Q B to K B 4th	Q B to Q 3d.
2. K Kt to B 3d	Q Kt to B 3d	15. B takes Kt	R takes B
3. Q P two	P takes P	16. Q to K 3d	Q to K B 3d
4. K Kt to Q B 4th	K B to Q B 4th	17. Q takes Q Kt P	Q B to Q sq
5. Q B P one	Q to K B 3d (c)	18. Q B to K Kt 5th	P to Q 4th
6. Castles	P to Q 6th	19. K Kt to K 5th	Q to K 3d
7. Q Kt P two	B to Q Kt 3d	20. Kt to Q 3d	Q to K Kt 3rd (d)
8. P to K 5th	Q to K Kt 3d	21. Q takes Q P (e)	Q B to K 3rd.
9. P to Q Kt 5th	Q to K 2d	22. Q takes B P	Castles R
10. B takes doubled P	K B P two	23. R takes B	R takes Kt
11. R to K sq	Q P two	24. Kt to Q R 3d	Kt to B 3d
12. P takes P in pass-ing	P takes P	25. Q to Q 4th	Q R to Q sq
13. K B to Q B 4th	K B to Q B 4th (b)	26. K R P two (f)	Black resigns.

(a) M'Donnell's favourite defence for the second player, but one which imposes great restraint upon the movements of his forces.

(b) Appearances of his opponent's playing Q B to Q R 3d next move.

(c) Q Kt 3d, in hopes of exchanging Queens, White might have taken the K B with his K Kt with equality.

(d) Compelling the Q to occupy some square where she can be attacked on the discovered check

BETWEEN THE SAME PLAYERS.

WHITE (Mr. H.)	BLACK (Mr. S.)	WHITE (Mr. H.)	BLACK (Mr. S.)
1. K P two	K P two	15. Kt takes P	Q B P one
2. K Kt to B 3rd	Q Kt to B 3d	16. Q B to Q Kt 2d (b)	K B to Q 5th
3. Q P two	P takes P	17. Q Kt to Q sq	P to Q Kt 4th
4. K Kt to Q B 4th	K B to Q B 4th	18. B takes Q Kt P	B takes Kt (c)
5. Q B P one	Q to K B 3d	19. B takes B	Q to K Kt 3d.
6. Castles	Kt to K Kt 4th (d)	20. Q to Q B 4th	Kt to K B 3d
7. Kt takes Kt	Q takes Kt	21. Q R to Q 6th	Q to K 4th
8. Q Kt P two	B to Q Kt 2d	22. Q to K 3d	Q to K 6th
9. Q Kt P two	P takes P (disc. ch)	23. K takes P	Castles
10. K to R sq	Q to Q 5th	24. R to K B 5th	Q to R 3d
11. Q to Q Kt 3d	Q to K B 3d	25. Q to K Kt 3d (ch)	Black resigns.

(a) This is not considered a good move.

(b) The young player should observe the facility with which the opening player is enabled to develop his new through the faulty defence adopted by his opponent.

(c) If he had taken the Bishop with the P, White would have replied with Kt to Q 5th, winning a piece in return, and having an overwhelming attack.

GAME JUST PLAYED AT THE BRIGHTON CHESS CLUB, BETWEEN CAPTAIN KENNEDY AND MR. DELAMAIN.

The former giving his K Kt, and "the move."

(Remove White's K Kt from the board.)

BLACK (Mr. D.)	WHITE (Capt. K.)	BLACK (Mr. D.)	WHITE (Capt. K.)
1. Q P two	K P one	20. K to K sq	K Kt P two
2. K P two	Q P two	21. Q to K Kt 4th	K to B sq
3. P takes P	P takes P	22. K Kt to K B 3d	Q B to K B 4th
4. K to B 3d	K B to Q 3d	23. Q to K B 5th	K to R 2d

6. Q Kt to B 3d	Q B to K 3d	(a)
7. P takes P	P takes P	25. K takes R	R takes R (ch)
8. K B checks	Kt to Q B 3d	26. K Kt takes R	Q takes B
9. Q to K 2d	Castles	27. Q takes K B P (ch	K to R sq
10. Castles	Q Kt to K Kt 5th	28. Q to K Kt 6th	K to R 3d
11. K B takes Kt	P takes B	29. Q takes Q B P (ch)	Q to Q B 8th
12. Q R P one	K R to K sq	30. Q to Q Kt 7th (ch	K to Kt 3d
13. Q to Q 3d	Q B to K B 4th	31. K to K B sq	B to Q 6th (ch)
14. K Kt to K Kt 5th	Q B to K Kt 3d	32. Q Kt to K 2d	Q to Q 8th
15. Q to K R 3d	K R P one	33. K P one	B takes Q Kt (ch)
16. K Kt to K B 3d	Q to K Kt 2d	34. K to Kt 2d	Q takes Kt
17. K Kt to K R 4th	Q B to K R 2d	35. K R P one	B to K B 6th (ch)
18. Q R to Q 3d	Q to K B 3d	36. K takes B	Q to K 5th
19. Q B to K 3d	Q R to K sq		Mate.

(a) The capture of this Pawn costs Black a piece.

(b) We believe that, after taking this Pawn, Black's game was irretrievable.

CONSULTATION GAME.

GAME PLAYED THIS SUMMER, BETWEEN MESSRS. JOHN RHODES AND CADMAN, CONSULTING, AGAINST M. ST. AMANT.

WHITE. (Th. Allies.)	BLACK. (M. St. A.)	WHITE. (The Allies.)	BLACK. (M. St. A.)
1. K P two	K P two	14. Castles (d)	K Kt to B 3d
2. K Kt to B 3d	K B P two	15. R to K sq (eh)	K to B sq
3. Q Kt to B 3d	K B to Q Kt 5th (a)	16. Q B to K 6th	Q Kt to K 3d
4. Q Kt to Q 5th	K B to Q 3d (b)	17. K B to Q 4th (f)	Q P two
5. P takes K P	Q B P one	18. B takes Q Kt	R takes B
6. Q Kt to K B	K B to Q B 2d	19. Kt to K 6th (ch)	B takes Kt
7. Q B P one	K P one	20. K takes B	B to Q sq
8. K Kt to Q 4th	Q to K B 3d (c)	21. Q Kt to K sq	K P one
9. K P one	P takes P	22. Kt to K 3d	R to K Kt sq
10. K takes P	K to K B sq	23. Kt to Q 4th	Q B P one
11. Q to K R 5th (ch)	Q to K B 2d	24. B takes Kt	B takes B
12. Q to K R 4th	K P two	25. Kt takes B	P takes Kt
13. Q Kt to Q B 2d (d)	K Kt to his sq	26. K R to K 8th (ch)	K to Kt 2nd
		27. K R to K 7th	Black resigns

(a) M. St. Amant very properly decries this move, which answers no purpose except to enable his adversaries in the development of their game.

(b) Black's previous error compels him to take up this disadvantageous station with the Bishop.

(c) Kt to B 3d seems much preferable

(d) This retreat, to open the range of the Q B on Black's badly posted Knight, is well conceived

(e) White have now an irresistible game.

(f) Some pretty moves for the finish. White's sacrificing their K Kt at this point, although we think the course actually adopted by them was safer. Let us suppose—

17. K to K 6th (ch) K takes P

(If q to K 2nd, White answers with Kt to Q 5th, and nothing can withstand their attack.)

18 B takes Kt P takes B

(If Q takes B, than Q takes Q, followed by R takes B, and White ought to win.)

19. K takes B Q to K 2nd and it is easy to see that Black's game is no longer tenable

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—A very limited supply of English wheat having been received up to our market this week the shew of samples of the grain to-day was extremely small. As the quantity on offer was by no means equal to the wants of the buyers the business transacted was trifling, at prices fully equal to those obtained on Monday last. Sounded were a few country at rate rates. Most of barley was in short supply. The demand was firm, at very full prices. Grinding and distilling qualities came somewhat readily into a steady disposition sold, both old and new, was cleared off, at is per quarter more money, owing to the short quantity now coming forward. The sale for oats was by no means active, yet prices were supported. Beans, peas, Indian corn, meal, and flour sold at previous quotations ARRIVALS: English wheat 5080 quarters, barley 2520, oats 1680, beans 1120, peas 560, barley, 2240 oats, 3360. Foreign: wheat, 7560, barley, 4760, oats, 15,960. Flour, 1720 sacks and 1870 barrels; malt, 780 quarters.

English. Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 50s to 52s; ditto, white, 52s to 56s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 48s to 50s; ditto, white, 50s to 52s; rye, 30s to 32s; grinding barley, 25s to 26s; distilling barley, 28s to 30s; malting ditto, 32s to 34s; Lincolnshire and Yorkshire feed oats, 20s to 21s; Scotch and Irish, 19s to 20s; potato ditto, 21s to 22s; Kent and Essex beans, 36s to 38s; ditto, tick, 34s to 36s; Suffolk and Norfolk ditto, 34s to 36s; Lincoln and Yorkshire ditto, 32s to 34s; Kent and Essex grey peas, 36s to 38s; white, 35s to 37s; maple, 34s to 36s; Suffolk and Norfolk ditto, 32s to 34s; grey peas, 34s to 36s; maple, 32s to 34s; white, 31s to 33s; boilers, 40s to 42s, per quarter. Town-made flour, 45s to 46s per sack. Buckwheat, 26s to 28s, Yorkshire, 30s to 32s, per 280 lbs. Foreign. Baltic red wheat, —s to —s; white, —s to —s; barley, —s to —s; oats, —s to —s; beans, —s to —s; peas, —s per quarter. Flour, American, 24s to 26s, Baltic, —s to —s, per barrel.

The Seed Market.—A few samples of new canary seed have been disposed of at from 60s to 66s per quarter. Generally speaking, the seed trade is in a sluggish state, at but little variation in the quotations. Cakes move off steadily, at full prices.

Linseed, English, sowing, 60s to 62s Baltic, crushing, 48s to 50s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 47s to 50s. Hempseed, 36s to 38s per quarter. Canary, 58s to 60s. Rapeseed, 40s to 42s. Brown Mustard-seed, 8s to 9s; white ditto, 7s to 7s6d. Tares, 7s 6d to 7s 9d per bushel. English Rapeseed, £20 to £25, per last of 10 quarters. Linseed cakes, English, £13 5s to £15 10s; ditto, foreign, £9 5s to £10 5s per 1000. Rapeseed cakes, £6 0s to £6 10s per ton. Coriander, 6s to 6s6d, per quarter. English Clover-seed, red, —s to —s; ditto, white, —s to —s; ditto, —s to —s; extra, up to —s. Foreign, red, —s to —s; ditto, white, —s to —s; extra, —s per cwt.

Hops.—The prices of wheaten bread, in the metropolis, are from 7½d to 8d; of household ditto, 6d to 7d per 4lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 50s 9d; barley, 32s 0d; oats, 23s 0d; rye, 33s 3d; beans, 40s 7d; peas, 41s 2d.

The Sun World Average.—Wheat, 54s 6d; barley, 33s 10d; oats, 24s 3d; rye, 33s 9d; beans, 40s 11d; peas, 42s 6d.

Tea.—Fresh kinds of tea—the supply of which on offer is extensive—we have to report a very dull inquiry, at barely stationary prices. Common sound Congous is quoted at 8½d, and good common Twankay, 9½d to 10d. per lb.

Sugar.—On the whole, this market is steady, at fully the late decline in the quotations. Brown lumps are selling at 44s to 44s 6d; and grocery ditto, at 45s to 45s per cwt.

Coffee.—The business doing is comparatively small, but prices remain without particular alteration.

Rice.—Most kinds are in sluggish request, on somewhat easier terms.

Fruit.—Valencia Raisins are dull, at 46s per cwt. In fruit, generally, a moderate business is going.

Provisions.—The supplies of Irish butter being larger, and the dealers mostly well in stock, the demand is somewhat heavy, at 74s to 76s per cwt. The Hamburghs are selling at 68s to 69s; and inferior and samples, 78s to 84s per cwt. Irish butter is 2s per cwt. lower, with a heavy inquiry. Friesland, Limburgh, and Kelder, 72s to 76s; Cork, 70s to 82s; Limerick and Waterford, 68s to 80s; and Sligo and Tralee, 67s to 68s per cwt. On board, nothing is doing. English butter moves off slowly, at from 80s to 84s per cwt. Bacon, 52s to 56s; Waterford, 48s to 54s, middling ditto, 42s to 46s; fine Hams, 54s to 58s per cwt.; and fresh, 10s to 12s per dozen. Lard, Irish, steady, and 44s to 46s per cwt. Irish Pork, 60s to 62s. Limerick and Waterford, 68s to 69

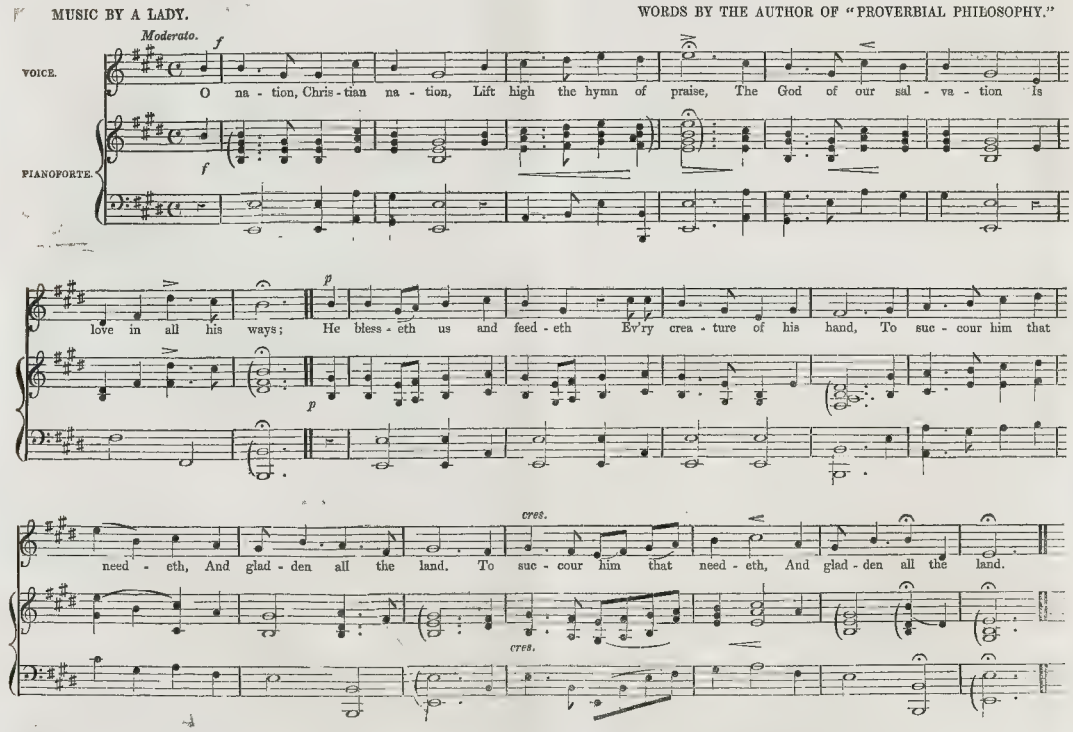
A HYMN FOR THE HARVEST of 1847.

(COMPOSED FOR THE THANKSGIVING-DAY.)

MUSIC BY A LADY. WORDS BY THE AUTHOR OF "PROVERBIAL PHILOSOPHY."



Moderato.
VOICE.
PIANOFORTE.
O na - tion, Chris - tian na - tion, Lift high the hymn of praise, The God of our sal - va - tion Is love in all his ways; He bless - eth us and feed - eth Ev'ry crea - ture of his hand, To suc - cour him that need - eth, And glad - den all the land. To suc - cour him that need - eth, And glad - den all the land.
cres.

II.

Rejoice, ye happy people!
And peal the changing chime,
From every belfried steeple
In symphony sublime;
Let cottage and let palace
Be thankful and rejoice;
And woods, and hills, and valleys
Re-echo the glad voice.

III

From glen, and plain, and city,
Let gracious incense rise,
The Lord of Life in pity
Hath heard His creatures' cries;
And where, in fierce oppressing,
Stalk'd fever, fear, and dearth,
He pours a triple blessing
To fill and fatten earth!

IV.

Gaze round in deep emotion,
The rich and ripened grain
Is like a golden ocean
Becalmed upon the plain;
And we, who late were weepers,
Lest judgment should destroy,
Now sing, because the reapers
Are come again with joy!

V

O praise the hand that giveth,—
And giveth evermore,—
To every soul that liveth
Abundance flowing o'er!
For every soul he filleth
With manna from above,
And over all distilleth
The unction of his love.

VI.

Then gather, Christians, gather,
To praise with heart and voice
The good Almighty Father,
Who bidden you rejoice.
For He hath turned the sadness
Of his children into mirth;
And we will sing with gladness
The harvest-home of earth!

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

No. 285.—Vol. XI.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1847. [Sixpence.

PLENTY AND PERIL.

EVERY Church in the Kingdom, will to-morrow hear read a form of Thanksgiving for the late "Abundant Harvest." It is the most natural expression on the part of the State of a feeling that must exist in the breast of every individual. And we may believe that this, as it were the official expression on the part of our rulers of gratitude for what Jeremy Taylor calls a "miracle of the Divine mercy," has been anticipated by every member of the community. As summer deepened into autumn the fields and skies were watched with increasing anxiety; and, when it became pretty certain that the calamity of last year would not be repeated, and that abundance was restored to us, there was not one heart that did not feel a weight, to some extent, removed from it. From the Prime Minister to the day-labourer there was scarcely one man who, for different reasons, did not breathe freer as each week's agricultural report changed hopes into certainties.

And yet, as all human things are qualified and limited, even now there is much peril beneath all the abundance. The Thanksgiving for Plenty is accompanied by an appeal to the charity of the public for those whom this abundance will not reach. The fact is worth consideration. With the materials and means of physical happiness supplied in a profusion that calls for acknowledgment even from our cold, reasoning, rather than feeling, generation, we have yet to learn the mode of applying them. We have the materials, but, tied up by bad systems, old laws, precedents, and practices, we are at a loss when the question is that of distributing them. This creates a necessity for a farther call on the public benevolence, and it is impossible to deny that the union of the two things, the acknowledgment of the return of plenty, and the certainty felt that in the midst of it, thousands are on the verge of famine, creates a seeming anomaly. It says the abundance is not universal, that for whole masses of the people it does not exist. And the contradiction has been strongly urged as a reason why the public should refuse to contribute more to the large sums it raised for the destitution of Ireland—for it is in Ireland destitution continues to prevail.

In the present state of things, when money seems to be disappearing altogether, and the coin of the realm is fast becoming a thing of tradition and memory, and when every paper is filled with embarassment and difficulty, it is not likely that the most forcible appeal would be so successful as formerly; we fear the public needs no discouragement in the matter of giving, and, therefore, we cannot join in the exhortations to a non-observance of the injunctions of the Queen's Letter, or to the faintest enforcement of them. If it is clearly proved that our contributions are still needed, that the abundance though great is not universal, and that in certain localities famine is as inevitable now as last year, after the failure of the harvest, we do not see how we can coldly deny aid and rescue to the sufferers under the desperate state of things. The plenty is not plenty to them; the period of change from one system to another, consequent on the destruction of the potatoe, is not over. The evils and miseries of a century are not so soon remedied. With whole populations in so exceptional and peculiar condition as many districts in the west of Ireland are said to present, we must have patience and forbearance yet awhile. The real Poor Law is in Ireland scarcely a year old; for, before last session, the system was little more than a mockery. It has scarcely begun to operate beneficially; those who have to carry it out are terror-stricken, for, like all measures long resisted, it was passed under the pressure of a crisis that made its first operations most difficult.

The poor of England have had a lien on the property and soil of the country for nearly three centuries; they have been sheltered behind this bulwark against the ravages of utter starvation, and have had some chance of freedom of action. It is quite useless to expect the qualities and energies developed in the course of many ages, by such a system as ours, in a people who have, for the same period, been subjected, by laws framed with the coolest malignity, to every influence that can degrade mankind. In total ignorance and utter poverty, men are as helpless and powerless as a community of children. It is discouraging enough to have to deal with people reduced so far below the possibility of self-effort; but neglecting them, and leaving them to themselves will not raise them. In considering the present state of Ireland, Englishmen are too apt to forget the past; it is there we must look for the seeds of what now exists; far back in the stream of time we threw dark poisons into the waters, and now we wonder that they do not flow clear and healthfully. We forget for how many ages all the social and natural laws of men—that code that is above the written Statute-Book—were violated and perverted, in a long religious conflict, ending in conquest and oppression; the rational course of living side by side in peace, under an equality of civil rights, dates but from yesterday.

We tax the people with ignorance, forgetting that almost within living memory it was a penal offence to instruct them, just as it is a felony at the present hour to teach a Negro to read in the Southern States of America. Recklessness of bloodshed and contempt of the laws have been fostered by military government, and the impossibility of obtaining justice. We live under a better state of things; but the misery of all injustice long continued is, that its effects survive by tradition and memory after it has ceased to operate. It is the same with more physical matters: permanence, security, confidence between the tenants of land and the holders have not existed in Ireland. To squeeze the highest rent possible was the object of the majority of middlemen and the needy among the landlords. What energy or exertion could be expected from a man, when a patch of reed put on his roof or the opening a drain would have brought down a demand for an increase of rent. In no nation in the world will men work exclusively for the benefit of others. The Fellah of Egypt, like the cotter of Ireland, conceals his gain more carefully than he would a crime, certain that the slightest token of possessing it would bring down on him the bastinado, till he gave it up to the Pacha or his agents. English men under such a system would degenerate to the Fellah.

It is a helpless, hopeless population we have to bring over the difficulty, which will not be very soon terminated. They are drifted into wild districts along the west coast of Ireland, in the midst of imperfect cultivation, not among plenty, but the reverse. To bring them within the reach of the abundance vouchsafed to the other parts of the empire, funds will be needed; to raise them forms the necessity for this appeal. If the immense exertions of the past year, are immediately succeeded by total neglect, we might as well have suffered the famine to do its worst months ago. That our charity should be accompanied by more extensive measures for the future, bold and effectual, we admit; that the policy of the Government has not yet taken that vigorous form, we admit also; but as long as the work remains undone, we must deal with palliatives, of which the charity of the public is the readiest to resort to.

THE AUROCHS.

PRESENTED TO THE ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY BY THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA.

THE existence of the Aurochs, Zubr, or European Bison, which once roamed over all the woodland districts of central Europe, and which in our own island was contemporary with the extinct races of Mastodon, Elephant, and Rhinoceros, is now confined to the forest of Bialowicza, in the Government of Grodno. In this last asylum it is carefully protected by the Imperial Government, whose strict enactments alone have saved it from extirpation. To our scientific readers it will be scarcely necessary to advert to the peculiar interest which attaches to this animal. To those who are desirous of information as to its former place in the Fauna of this country, we recommend a perusal of Professor Owen's "History of British Fossil Mammals," pp. 491-497. Its nearest ally in the existing animal kingdom is the American Bison, of which there are two fine adult examples in the collection of the Zoological Society; but from this it differs in several very marked peculiarities

When we consider the wide diffusion of this race of Natural History which originated among Englishmen in the works of Ray, and was fostered by Gilbert White and his successors, we are scarcely too sanguine in believing that this unique gift of his Imperial Majesty will not fail to be appreciated as generally as it deserves. We are informed on good authority, that, with the exception of two instances, which occurred about three hundred years ago, these are the first individuals of this species which have ever lived in captivity; and the experiment which has succeeded so admirably was only attempted by M. Dolmatoff, the Master of the Forests in Grodno, in consequence of his Imperial Majesty's desire to mark his approbation of what he saw in the establishment of the Zoological Society, during his brief visit to London, in 1845.

It only remains for us to add that the young male and female which are the subject of our Illustration were captured in the summer of 1846, and are now about eighteen months old. They were transmitted to Memel in charge of one of the Imperial under foresters, and delivered there to a keeper on the Society's establishment, who was dispatched to meet them in August last. On being liberated from their long confinement, they exhibited a degree of activity which astonished more than one of the spectators of the action of the Gnu, a singularly bovine form of antelope, of which an unique specimen once graced the Society's menagerie.

The Artist, Mr. Harrison Weir, has, in our Illustration, sketched in the distance of the picture a few specimens of the Aurochs, to show their peculiar mode of running.

In concluding this notice, we may mention the re-introduction of another European species which has ceased to be found in Britain within our own recollection; and which, although birds is rapidly increasing under the protection of the Game Laws, we hope will soon be followed by the Bustard, which is rapidly disappearing from our downs, and which, from its size and general appearance, is a very desirable addition to our fauna.

The extent of the Garden in which the Society's Collection is placed, presents the casual visitor from forming an accurate estimate of its riches. We were surprised to learn that, in the Parrot-house alone, there are upwards of sixty species of that exotic family, besides several rarities kept there for convenience which belong to other groups. The total number of animals considerably exceeds 1100, and affords the most complete aid to the study of General Mammology and Ornithology, which, perhaps, was ever collected together at one view.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

THE COMMAND AT MALTA. It is understood that the command of the troops at MALTA has been conferred on Lieut.-General Ellice.

COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF IN THE WEST INDIES AND AMERICA.—It is reported in naval circles that Vice-Admiral the Hon. F. P. Pelham, formerly Admiral-Superintendent of Portsmouth dockyard, is to succeed Vice-Admiral Sir F Austen, K.C.B., as Commander-in-Chief in the West Indies and North America. This officer's time expires in December.

THE SQUADRON IN THE TAGUS.—The Squadron of Evolution, consisting of the flag-ship St Vincent, 120 guns, Captain Herringham, flag of Rear-Admiral Sir Charles Napier, K.C.B.; the Prince Regent, 72, Captain Christie; the Caledonia, 120, Captain Manly Dixon; the Queen, 110, Captain Sir Henry Leeke, Bart.; the Canopus, 84, Captain Fairfax Moresby, C.B.; the Vengeance, 84, Captain S. Lushington, C.B.; the Albemarle, 26, Captain Rooney Keen; the Termagant, 26, Captain Warren; the Odin, steam-frigate, Captain the Hon. F. Pelham; the Sidon, steam-frigate, Captain H. Henderson, C.B.; the Avenger, steam-frigate, Captain Calmady Hamlyn; the Firebrand, steam-frigate, Captain (Viscount) Hall; the Stromboli, steam-sloop, Captain Fisher; and the iron steamer Jackal, were all in the TAGUS, off Lisbon, on the 4th instant, expecting to put to sea on the following day, until an counter orders arrive in the meantime.

DEATH OF CAPT. JAMES BOXER, R.N. Captain James Boxer died last week, at DOVER, aged sixty-nine. Captain Boxer was a genuine specimen of the true British sailor, and had seen much hard fighting in early life. He entered the navy about the year 1791, and retired from it on half-pay at the close of the late French war. His was made a post-captain in the year 1813, was one of the retired captains whose pay was lately increased to 20s. per diem, and we regret he was not longer spared to enjoy this increase. When a boy, Captain Boxer sailed with Sir Sydney Smith, and was taken prisoner by the French, along with that gallant officer.

SUDDEN DEATH OF CAPTAIN WILLIAM NUGENT GLASCOCK. Captain Glascock left Dublin, in perfect health and spirits, on Friday evening (last week), accompanied by his lady and daughters, to pay a visit to his relations at Ballytowan, near Baltinglass. In getting from the stage-coach into a carriage, he was attacked with apoplexy, for which, from his active and temperate habits and uniform flow of spirits, he appeared a most unlikely subject. Medical aid was immediately procured, and every possible exertion made; but, alas! to no purpose. Captain Glascock had left Newry the day before, on retiring from the office of inspector under the Poor Relief Act; and the fact of his having been presented with twenty-two public addresses from the district committees proves he was eminently calculated to command and to excite the co-operation of those who served with him. The services of Captain Rooney Keen, C.B. in the Navy are well known, and duly appreciated by the Lords of the Admiralty

SALMON JUBILEE. The first jubilee year to salmon ever known in Scotland is now begun. The Duke of Sutherland, in all his fine rivers in Ross and Sutherland, of which his Grace is sole proprietor, has issued orders that no fish shall be taken above the influence of the tide, either near or on the angler's rod, until the 1st of February, 1849; thus giving the salmon undisturbed rest and possession for 18 months of their own domain. This will, in a few years, solve a very interesting problem,—whether, by giving the fish a jubilee now and then, when they enter our rivers from the sea, and are allowed to follow out their natural instincts undisturbed by the hand of man,—whether they will increase with us, to the same almost incredible amount as in the Salmon River in North West America, of which travellers give such wonderful accounts. Whatever may be the result, this Grace the Duke of Sutherland deserves the thanks of all for this noble and costly experiment, giving up a year's rent of all his rivers in the north, for the purpose of knowing whether or not, by intervals of rest, the salmon fishing of Scotland can be improved, and a large increase of wealth and food thus added to the country.—Northern Warder.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, October 12.

Several ordinances have been issued within the last few days. By one of them, dated St. Cloud, the 6th, Marshal Count Molitor is appointed Governor of the Invalides, in place of Marshal Oudinot, deceased. Another, which was inserted in the Bulletin de Lois, relates to the Convention for reciprocal extradition of criminals, concluded July 10, 1847, between France and the free city of Bremen. A third one promotes M. Guizot, to the post of Consulary Agent of France at Muskats, investing him, moreover, with the provisional direction of the Consulate of Zanzibar. It is given out that the Emir of Muskats has conferred a decoration upon M. Guizot. A later and more important ordinance brings to a close the long hesitations of our Ministry with regard to the 350,000,000 of francs loan, which was voted in the last session of our Chambers. Some days ago it was rumoured that M. Dumon, the Minister of Finances, had determined to retire in presence of the difficulties of the situation; however this may be, an official denial has been come to, that, on the 10th of November, there will be submitted to public competition, by sealed tenders 3 0-0 Rente, sufficient to produce a capital of 250,000,000 francs. The said Rente shall be entitled to the interest of December 22, 1847; and the payment of the 250,000,000 is to be effected in twenty monthes, from November. The National pretends that the Minister of Finance wished to defer this measure, but that great financial influences prevailed against him. New parliamentary leaves appear at the Monitour, touching the treaty between France and Persia, which was signed on the 24th July last. It secures to the French the treatment of the most favoured nation, as regards their persons and their commerce, fixing at 5 0-0 the entrance and exit duties on whatever products they may import and export, and providing for them the benefit of any reduction in these duties that should happen to be conceded to England or Russia. It grants, moreover, to France the power of establishing Consulary Agents at Teheran, Tauris, and Bender-Bouchir. Lastly, it invests our Consuls with an entire jurisdiction on the French residents, and guarantees the rights of baths of such of them who might die in Persia.

Wednesday last was the 74th anniversary of the King's birth-day. In the morning his Majesty presided at a Cabinet Council, in which the retirement of M. Cunin Gridaine is said to have been decided upon. It is reported that M. Muret de Bort, will replace him at the department of Agriculture and Commerce. Queen Christina returned to Paris on the 7th, and was visited in the evening by her Majesty. The King himself is stated to have called upon her at her own hotel, on Saturday last. On the same day Prince Jerome, ex-King of Westphalia, and Prince Napoleon Bonaparte, his son, were received by his Majesty in private audience. There does not seem to be any ground for the report, circulated by the Union Monarchique, that Queen Christina has set out for Madrid in order to join and support General Narvaez. Our advices from Algiers, tell us that the Duke of Aumale landed in that colony on the 5th instant, and took possession of his Government on the 7th The new Governor was received with respect, but without enthusiasm. His replies to several addresses were perfectly proper, but they contained no promise of reforms. The Tribunal of First Instance and Chamber of Commerce in the colony will soon be elective. The Duke of Guise, the new born son of his Royal Highness, died on Sunday morning at St. Cloud. His remains will be interred at Dreux, to-day.

It is announced that meteorological observatories are going to be erected in the principal cities of our African possessions, namely, at Algiers, Oran, Bona, Bougie, and Constantina.

The Prince of Joinville, who quitted Paris on the 7th, was expected on the 10th at Toulon, where he intends resuming the command of our naval forces in the Mediterranean. We learn, by the latest letters from Naples, that the French squadron, under Rear-Admiral Trehouart, set sail for Toulon in the night of the 1st inst. A Correspondent of the Courrier writes from Rome that M. Rossi is decidedly recalled from his post. It is certain, however, that M. de Brogie was directed by the Ministry to recommend him to apply for an unlimited leave of absence, on account of the false position he was in at the Roman Court. The Pope is said to have justified his resolution to interfere in the affair of Ferrara, assuring him that he knew how to manage it himself.

Reports reach us from Frankfort of the death of the Marquis of Chasseloup Laubat, the French Ministerial Resident at the Germanic Confederation, who was sunk after a long illness in his 47th year. The latest news from Senegal states that the Governor-General (M Bourdon Grammont), the Deputy-Governor, and the Judge Royal, have taken various steps in favour of the cause of slavery and science, too, has lost one of its most celebrated representatives in the person of M. Alexandre Brongniart, the learned geologist, and director of the Royal Porcelain manufactory at Sevres. His funeral took place on Saturday in Paris, and several orations were delivered over his tomb by MM. Elie and Beaumont, Dumeril, Chevreul, Edwards, and Virlet

The naval squadron—the command of which has been conferred upon Captain Page, the new-appointed Chief of the Bourbon Station is to be composed of the flag-frigate, La Reine Blanche, one corvette, two brigs, a gabarra, two cutters, and a steam-corvette. Accounts by the last packet, our Government had received authorising our Consulary Agents in the Ottoman Empire to receive under the protection of France the Greek subjects now at the mercy of the Turkish authorities; but M. de Lagrenée has not yet passed, it is said, by process of revocation of this decision.

The Marquis of Dalmatia, who was in Paris on a leave of absence, has just taken his departure to resume his functions as our Ambassador in Berlin.

Baron Humbolt is daily expected in our metropolis, where he comes, it is stated, on a secret mission to our Court. The Prince de Joinville, Ambassador of Spain to the Court of Rome, has recently passed through Toulouse, from Madrid, on his way to his post. M. Mon, ex-Minister of Finance in Spain, has arrived at Paris

The Franc-Comtois, the National, and several Swiss papers, agree in affirming that a hundred chests, containing 6000 (or 3000) muskets, two eight-pounders, and two howitzers, with a large quantity of ammunition, have been seized from the citadel of Besançon, and despatched to Fribarg for the Catholic Cantons of the Sonderbund. The chests, they say, were embarked at the Gare de Chamars, and they left Besançon for Switzerland in a recent train, in charge of Gerdet de Mazarin. At Baume a leave of conveyance to Mulhouse was taken, to divert attention from the lading of the boat; and meanwhile the chests were stolen into forty waggons, each of which contained a chest of muskets, and were sent on to the neighbourhood of Neufchatel. The National declares, besides, that, a few months ago, a certain number of muskets had already been sent from the citadel of Strasburg to Lucerne. On another hand, we read in the Semaphore de Marseilles, that the military authorities at Toulon have just received orders to prepare for the Roman Government 14,000 muskets, to arm the Civic Guard, and the Semaphore publishes a letter, in which M. Enes Regnaud, who had been charged by the city of Bologna to purchase arms for the same purpose, expresses his warmest gratitude to M. Guizot, who, says he, has done all in his power to assist him in his mission.

Our opposition papers are still replete with accounts of Reform-banquets. Meanwhile, the Conservative inhabitants of Mirande and Bayonne are getting up two Anti-Reform banquets, which they propose offering to Messrs. Lacave-Laplagne and Cregarry.

On Thursday last, one of the magazines belonging to the Royal powder-mills at St. Chamas (Bouches du Rhône), was blown up. Three men were killed, and several others severely injured. The cause of the accident is not known. At the Artillery School of Toulouse, trials are about to be made of the shells newly invented by the Duke de Montpensier. On a recent day, the Marquis de Bonnefoux, Inspector-General of Artillery, to M. Olin Chatelet's foundry, some of these projectiles were cast in his presence. They are of ten and twelve pounds calibre, to be thrown so as to explode at the moment of striking the object aimed at, and to produce a destructive effect exceeding that of any projectile hitherto devised.

Several cases of unusual interest have come on of late before our courts. By a judgment of the Court of Peers at Selma, the Post office authorities were rendered responsible for all robberies committed in their administration. Appeal has been made by them from that decision to the Court of Cassation. A few days later, M. Lecomte, a publisher of Lyons, who had deposited that, previously to the accusation of sedition and contempt against the King's Government and a class of citizens in an article on the murder of the Duchess of Praslin. In spite of the cautions of M. Jurisconsult Bernard, who was assisted upon a charge of exciting hatred and contempt against the King's Government and a class of citizens in an article on the murder of the Duchess of Praslin. In spite of the cautions of M. Jurisconsult Bernard, who was assisted upon a charge of exciting hatred and contempt against the King's Government and a class of citizens in an article on the murder of the Duchess of Praslin. In spite of the cautions of M. Jurisconsult Bernard, who was assisted by the First Judge of the Court: and it was to answer the charge of perjury that he was brought, on Friday, before the Assizes of the Seine. Notwithstanding his being not a lawyer, M. Capo de Feuillide made a literary man of some note, and great courage in the dock of the prisoner, had undertaken his defence, and made in his behalf a most eloquent appeal to his judges. But his talents and emotion were of no avail. On the positive evidence of M. de Reynard, the jury decided that, previously to the encounter of the seconds, who had settled that the duel should be fought with arms completely unknown to the main parties, the pistols brought by d'Equevilleres were familiar to Beauvallon; that they belonged to his brother-in-law, M. Granier de Cassagnac, and that, on the very morning of his encounter, he had tried them in the garden of d'Equeville's house; and, accordingly, the prisoner was sentenced to ten years imprisonment, to pay a fine of 3000f. and to defend the costs of the proceedings. An appeal to the King, for pardon, was instantly drawn up by M. Capo de Feuillide, and presented to the Jury, who, after some hesitation, consented to put their names to it.

A whale, more than forty feet in length, was found, three days ago, stranded, near the mouth of the Seine.

SPAIN.

We were last week able to announce this important fact, received by telegraphic despatch, of a change of Ministry in Spain, and the appointment of General Narvaez as President of the Council. This sudden step excited the public very much, both at Madrid and Paris. There is no doubt that it was the result of intrigue. Indeed, the private letters from Madrid leave little doubt that the change arose out of a struggle between the influences of two Court favourites, General Serrano and Colonel Gandara. The latter was, it seems, lately adopted and put forward by M Salamanca, with the view of undermining the influence of General Serrano in the palace. This intrigue becoming known to General Narvaez, he became alarmed for his danger, and, at the same time, tendered his services. This took place on the afternoon of the 3rd, and on that evening Narvaez was President of the Council.

The new President of the Council, General Narvaez, received, on the 7th inst., the congratulations of the diplomatic corps Decrees annulling all M. Salamanca's recent financial decrees, have been signed by the Queen

The Countess de Montijo has been appointed Camarera-mayor to her Majesty.

The Clamor Publico indignantly announces that, according to a very prevalent report, General Serrano is to be made a "Prince and Grandee of Spain." M. Gonzalez Bravo had just arrived at Madrid from France.

The Ecol del Comercio asserts that enormous sums of money have been expended in corrupting persons in immediate attendance on the Queen, so that her Majesty was, in point of fact, isolated from all friends who could have given her counsel.

Queen Isabella completed on Sunday the 17th year of her age, and the first year of her marriage.

The Eco del Comercio of the 8th inst. states that several measures are now in operation, as part of a regular system for the purpose of getting the Queen into a web from which she cannot escape, except by an abdication, which it says has always been the primary object of the Tuileries.

PORTUGAL.

The Montrose steamer has arrived at Southampton, with letters from Lisbon of the 8th inst. Portugal appears to be in a state of great financial distress, and another Cabinet of Minister was expected. The army was becoming insubordinate from want of pay. For two months they have received nothing. The public employés were six months in arrears. Desertion was becoming alarmingly great. The Cabral party was using the embarrassment of the Government to augment its discredit and drive it from power. The news of the fall of the Progressista Ministry in Spain had reached Lisbon on the 7th, and increased the hopes of the Silva-Carvalhas.

The Cabinet has amended the decree relative to the revisions of registration, and enlarged the time to fifteen days; but the Liberal party are not content, and the same outcry against the registrations comes

The Government had issued a notice to the Commander-in-Chief, the King, containing an order from the Queen, equivalent to a general dissolution of the three battalions. The order was scarcely issued, however, when the Ministry revoked it.

The Terrible, supposed to have Count Bomfin on board, was met in the Tagus by the Montrose. The British squadron remained in the Tagus.

ITALY.

There have been some further disturbances in different parts of Italy, but none of them were of a serious character, and there seems every probability of a speedy restoration of order. The Débats asserts, on the authority of letters from Naples of the 28th ult., that tranquility in the entire kingdom of Naples tranquility had been restored. The Débats also asserts that many of the accounts of insurrections in parts of Italy were exaggerations, or had no foundation whatever.

Disturbance took place at Leghorn in the afternoon of the 5th inst. The people congregated in large numbers in the principal square, crying "Viva Corsini!" (the former Governor) who had become extremely popular since he detached accepting the Ministry for Foreign Affairs unless the Grand Duke gave a constitution to his subjects. The Civic Guard was called out, and with difficulty dispersed the mob.

A collision also took place at Turin on the 1st instant, between some soldiers of the infantry and artillery regiments subsequently to the grand review held on that day by the King Shots were several times fired on both sides, and a woman who was the cause of the quarrel, having been wounded in the affray, expired almost immediately.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

Graham's Town papers to the 27th of July have reached us. We are sorry to find from them that, so far from there being a probability of the close of the war with the Kaffirs, there is every appearance of a combined movement on the part of the native tribes beyond the frontier against the British settlers and the British government.

It seems that the well-known chief Kreli assembled the great body of his people publicly to announce his determination to join in earnest in the war. He added that he had received proposals from Sandilla to form a general confederacy of the whole of the Kaffir tribes, in order to make one united effort to overcome the English. To-day, he said, is a day of fight, let us bury all misunderstandings as a people, and unite against the common enemy as one kaffir nation. A unanimous response was given to this proposal by his people, who expressed themselves as ready and determined to commence the fight. They then formed a plan to send off small parties to the frontier, while the main body remains at home, to fight with the army when it comes out. Mapassa, the Tambookie chief, has joined Kreli with all his people, and Faku with all his people.

According to the Graham's Town Journal unpleasant accounts had been received from the upper part of the boundary. The large and fine territory extending from the Stormberg, and to the Kei river, and to within a short distance of the Tambookie country, is described as filled with natives, Kaffirs, Tambookies, and Basoutus. Formerly these different tribes were at continual feud, but it would seem that the feeling is now engaged has so far suppressed this national, or rather tribal animosity, that they can now dwell together in a country which formerly none of the parties could occupy without being soon at attack by the others. The same accounts continue to tell also of large droves of colonial cattle which have passed in that direction towards the Basouta country, where it is conjectured, with a great show of probability, they have been bartered for gunpowder.

The same paper says: The information received from the immediate border is well calculated to induce the authorities, and also the inhabitants, in dealing with the Kaffirs, to move with the greatest circumspection. A letter before us, from the upper part of the boundary towards the Chumie, contains the following remarks: "It is most important the Governor should well consider his measures, as the next movement against the Kaffirs will be a very probably decide either their fate or that of the colony. The Kaffirs intend to stand their ground, and the contest will be severe. A Kaffir went to Sandilla the other day, and without circumlocution, asked his permission to join us in our missionary house. Sandilla refused this; but, expecting mischief, sent some of his paxati (councillors) to the place where Mr. Ross resides, to afford him protection. A day or two after this, another Kaffir came there, and deliberately loosed one of the horses. The man then went to a store, from which he took a saddle; and, on being asked why he took these things, his answer was, that the country was dead, and that if he did not take them others would. This mode of expression implies that the country is in a state of utter disorganisation, and evinces the worst possible feeling towards the colony."

Kaffir depredations continued, but, in order to put a stop to robberies, it had been determined to flog all prisoners taken with stolen property. This had been put in practice with some success in the neighbourhood of the Buffalo.

MEXICO.

The Antelope, which left Carmen, in the Gulf of Mexico, on the 10th of August, arrived at Havre on the 10th inst. She brings direct news from the south coast of Mexico. The Americans have been obliged to abandon Tabasco, after having lost a great number of men in sickness, in guerillas, and from disease. Before retreating, they burnt all the suburbs, which were composed chiefly of houses built with wood, and covered with thatch. At Carmen, money was rare, and could scarcely be obtained by the highest interest. On the 8th of August the American corvette Saratoga anchored outside the bar of Carmen, and took the produce of the tax levied on that province, amounting to 13,600 piastres.

EMPIRE OF BRAZILS.

His Majesty the Emperor of Brazils gave a public audience on the 8th of August, at the Palace of S. Christovao, to Lord Howden, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of her Britannic Majesty, who, on presenting his credentials, addressed his Imperial Majesty as follows:—

"Sire,—On presenting my credentials to your Imperial Majesty, it becomes my duty, a duty as agreeable as urgent, to assure your Imperial Majesty of the sincere and constant friendship by which the Queen, my Sovereign, is animated towards your Imperial Majest.

"At the private audience which was granted me on my departure, her Britannic Majesty charged me to express her sentiments to your Imperial Majesty in the most formal manner.

"My august Sovereign offers her most ardent prayers for the health and happiness of your Imperial Majesty, and the whole of your family. Her Britannic Majesty anxiously desires the sure and growing prosperity of the magnificent country, to which the enlightened views of your Imperial Majesty promise a brilliant futurity; its riches and resources will be developed under the benevolent influence of your Imperial Majesty. The whole world cannot fail to be benefited thereby; and I beg your Imperial Majesty will be perfectly convinced that everything which can tend to increase the welfare of the country in which I have now the honour to reside, will be highly satisfactory to the august personage I have the honour to represent.

"Sire,—I am rejoiced, and congratulate myself in having been selected to convey those assurances to your Imperia. Majesty; and your Imperial Majesty may rely that nothing shall be omitted on my part to draw closer the ties which unite, and ought always to connect, Brazil and England.

"My most pleasing as well as principal duty will be to make my stay in this capital as agreeable as possible to your Imperial Majesty."

To which His Majesty the Emperor replied:—

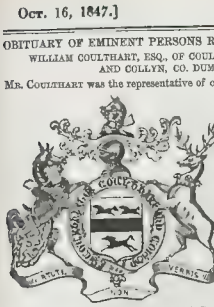
"I have always been pursuaded of the benevolent sentiments of friendship, which my very dear relative the Queen of England entertains towards me. Your relative, my Lord Howden, is a new proof of them; and I am confident that the friendly manner in which you conduct it will contribute to draw closer the strong ties which so happily connect my empire with Great Britain."

RAILWAY OFFENCES ABROAD.—A rich farmer of Valdbye (Denmark), named Steermerson, has just been tried at Copenhagen for having attempted, by displaying a red pocket-handkerchief at the end of a stick, to stop a train running on the railway from Copenhagen to Rothschild. He acknowledged that he had displayed the signal as stated, but affirms that he did so in consequence of a wager entered into by him after a copious breakfast and seasoned with wine, that he should succeed in stopping the first train that appeared. Knowing that to display a red flag signified danger, he had waved his red handkerchief as mentioned in the indictment. The Court, finding him guilty, sentenced him to ten years' hard labour in a house of correction, being the penalty laid down in the Danish law against any attempt to stop a railway train or impede its passage. Steermerson has appealed against this severe sentence.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

WILLIAM COULTHART, ESQ., OF COULTHART, CO. WIGTON, AND COLLYN, CO. DUMFRIES.

Mr. Coulthart was the representative of one of the oldest families in North Britain, and succeeded to the estates and chiefship of the name at the decease of his father, William Coulthart, Esq., of Coulthart and Collyn, in 1807. He was born 21st March, 1774; and married, 3rd September, 1801, Helen, second daughter of the late John Ross, Esq., of Dalton, Co. Dumfries, a descendant of the Rosses of Hawkhead; by whom he leaves one son, John Ross Coulthart, Esq., of Ashton - under - Lyne, banker; and one daughter, Margaret, wife of James Macgaffie, Esq., of Crossmichael, Co. Kirkcudbright.



So ancient is the family of Coulthart, that, in the early chronicles, we find John de Coulthart actively engaged in resisting the encroachments of the King of Northumbria, when that powerful Prince subdued the Strathcluyd Britons, and added the kingdom of Galloway to his other possessions. As further evidence of the great antiquity of the Coultharts, it may be mentioned that there is carefully preserved, in the family, a marriage settlement, bearing date 21st year of the reign of Kenneth III., King of Scotland, and referring to the contemplated nuptials of William de Coulthart of Largmore with Angus de Cumin.

THE RIGHT HON. SIR ROBERT GORDON, G.C.B.

This distinguished Diplomatist died suddenly, at Balmoral, Aberdeenshire, on the 8th inst. He was younger brother of the present Earl of Aberdeen, being fifth son of George, Lord Haddo, by Charlotte, his wife, youngest daughter of William Baird, Esq., of Newbyth.

Sir Robert, who was born in 1791, graduated at Christ-Church, Oxford, and entered the diplomatic service in 1810, when he accompanied the embassy to Persia. He subsequently acted as Secretary of Legation and Minister Plenipotentiary at the Hague; and, in the latter capacity, represented, for ten years, his Sovereign at the Court of Vienna. In 1826 he proceeded to Brazil, as Envoy Extraordinary; and, in 1828, was appointed Ambassador to Constantinople. His last official appointment was the important one of Ambassador Extraordinary to the Emperor of Austria.

WILLIAM HENRY AWDRY, ESQ., OF "THE PADDOCKS," CHIPPENHAM, WILTS.

This gentleman, who died on Friday the 8th inst., was the member of an ancient and honourable house, whose ancestor came to this country in the retinue of William the Norman.

He was the third and last survivor of four sons, the issue of Ambrose Awdry, Esq., of Sund, by the daughter and heiress of John Deline, Esq., of Sund House, and Earl Stoke Park, in the same county. During many years he held the responsible office of Deputy Receiver-General of Wilts, as well as several other important private trusts; and executed the duties of all with the zeal and intelligence of a man of business, and the urbanity and complaisance of a gentleman. In every relation of life he was distinguished by conduct and habits the most amiable and unobtrusive, exemplary and pious; and to a numerous family (six sons and two daughters) he leaves the noble inheritance of a "good name."

The patrimonial estates devolve on Ambrose Awdry, Esq., of Sund, only surviving son of the late Peter Awdry, Esq., an elder brother of the deceased William Henry; and eventually in succession on West Awdry, Esq., of Nonsuch, the third, but eldest surviving of his sons, now by Elina, the eldest daughter of the late West Hill, M.D., Deputy Inspector of Hospitals, a gentleman of Norfolk origin, but for many years a resident of Devizes, Wilts.

HENRY HOWARD, ESQ., R.A.

Mr. Howard, the Royal Academician, the Secretary to the Academy, and the Professor of Painting in that Institution, died on the 5th inst., in the 78th year of his age. The professional career of this distinguished artist commenced in 1794, when he sent from Rome, where he was then residing, "The Dream of Cain," from Gesner's "Death of Abel," for the Royal Academy Exhibition of that year. In the following season he was living in the Strand, and exhibited at Somerset House "Puck," from "Midsummer Night's Dream," "Ariel and Satan Awakening in the Burning Lake," and, for nearly forty years, he continued to contribute without intermission to the annual displays of the Royal Academy. In 1801 he was elected an Associate; and, in 1808, an Academician of that Corporation; and, at the period of his decease, was the third senior Royal Academician. On the death of Mr. Richards, in 1811, Mr. Howard was appointed Secretary to the Academy, the duties of which office he continued to fulfil to his advantage and Windsor, which has rendered the services of a deputy necessary, and Mr. Knight was nominated as such. Mr. Howard filled for some years the important office of Professor of Painting to the Academy, to which he was appointed in 1833.

Although devoted throughout a long life to the poetic portion of his art, Mr. Howard at one time applied much of his practice to portrait painting. Numerous and excellent as were his early productions, he does not appear to have met many patrons. One, however, was a host in himself, and this was Sir John Soane, who was a warm friend. Several of Mr. Howard's pictures now adorn the Soane Museum in London's-in-fields.

IRREGULARITY IN THE DELIVERY OF THE QUEEN'S LETTERS IN SCOTLAND.—It having been stated by a Correspondent of the Caledonian Mercury that reference to a paragraph which has gone the rounds of the press, in which it was averred that a packet forwarded from the Home Office, inclosing official despatches to her Majesty while at Ardverikie, had been lost, that "the whole story," relating to the despatches to the Queen, "is without foundation," we have simply to state that the whole of the official documents, amongst which was the patent of Ensign Lamb, one of the Military Knights of Windsor, which had been transmitted to her Majesty from the Home Office for the signature of the Sovereign, are still undiscovered. While the Court was in Scotland, all documents which were sent to her Majesty from the Government offices were forwarded through the medium of the Post-office.

THE CHINESE JUNK ARRESTED FOR DEBT.—The Chinese junk, the Key Fung, which arrived at New York on the 8th of July, excited there the greatest curiosity. Her light and graceful build, her sails of matting suspended to her bamboo yards, her smooth and rapid movement—thanks to which, if we may believe the Chinese crew, they have never suffered from bad weather in short, the singularity of her furniture, which includes some dogs with tongues as black as ink, brought by the captain, all combined to attract a crowd of spectators. The prettiest women of New York loved to boast of having visited the Chinese junk. Unfortunately the enterprise does not appear to have had the same success in a pecuniary respect. The Chinese sailors, to the number of twenty-six, not having been paid their wages, have arrested the vessel, and Mr. Lord, their countryman, has pleaded for them before the Civil Court of the district. The crew claim, in the first place, their arrears of wages from the month of September, 1846; and, in the second, to be sent back to Canton at the expense of the captain. According to the sailors' account, they were only engaged for eight months, and were not to go beyond Batavia and Singapore. The advocate of So-Ye-Sang-Hi, the Chinese captain, replied that the sailors who had worked the ship could not pretend that they had been made to cross the Indian Sea and the Atlantic without their knowledge. With regard to the question of wages, the captain had promised to pay them on their return to Canton with the produce of the American goods which he was to take on his return. He added that he did not think the sailors had any right to complain: the large recompenses they had received fully compensated for what was due to them. The Court decided in favour of the crew, maintained the seizure, ordered the sale of the vessel, and condemned the captain to pay each man one or two hundred dollars, according to rank.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

Mr. M'Christie, the Revising Barrister for the City of London, has decided that where a landlord resides in a house, the lodgers cannot vote, as the landlord is to be considered as the occupier of the house, in cases where the lodger does not possess exclusive control over the outer door.

It seems from the German papers that the abdication of Maria Louise is resolved upon, and the question is now only about the amount of her pension. The reigning family of Lucca will thus succeed the Duchess of Parma, and the present Duchy of Lucca be united with Tuscany; both according to the enactments of the Vienna Congress.

A Congress of Jewish Reformers is to meet in the course of the month at Brunswick, to discuss questions relative to the reforms which may be introduced in Judaism, to render it better adapted to the wants of the century.

The Moniteur Grec of the 30th ult. contains the address of the Chamber of Deputies in reply to the Speech delivered by King Otho on opening the Session. The Assembly confides in His Majesty to adjust honourably the difference between Greece and Turkey, and promises carefully to examine the financial laws submitted to their consideration, and to devise means of satisfying the claims of one of the protecting Powers.

The Bavarian Government is taking measures to contract a loan of 49,667,000 florins for the railroads.

Letters from Constantinople to the 28th ult. mention that the cholera had increased at Trebisond, where, of 350 cases, there had been 150 deaths. The official physician reported that the disease did not offer the virulent character which it had when it last invaded Europe, and that, of the cases in which medical aid is supplied at a sufficiently early stage, nine-tenths recover. Letters from Bagdad of the 1st say that the disease still prevailed there. Of sixteen cases, six died.

A Jewish weekly paper has just made its appearance at Hamburg, to advocate the principles of Free Trade in Germany. It is called the Freihafen, and is supported by the leading merchants of the City of Hamburg.

The Millers of Dudley recently dined together in large numbers at Birmingham; and, desirous to mark the festival with peculiar éclat, offered Jenny Lind £300 in order to induce her to sing before them. The fair Swede declined in a courteous letter.

Mr. Cobden returned to England on Monday morning by the General Steam Navigation Company's mail steam-ship Countess of Lonsdale, which left Hamburg on Saturday. Mr. Cobden is now at Manchester.

The screw-steamer Antelope arrived at Liverpool on Sunday from Rio de Janeiro and Bahia; she sailed from the former port on the 26th of August, and she latter on the 6th of September. Rather later dates from the River Plate have come to hand, but matters remained in the same state as by our previous advices.

A letter from Frankfort, dated Oct. 9th, states that, on the preceding day, about 100 persons sat down to a horseflesh dinner, in the Adler Hotel, at Bernheim. The dinner was conducted by the "Society for the Protection of Animals." Horseflesh (adds the account) affords a very palatable dish. The dinner was enlivened by many toasts and songs.

A regular course of omnibuses has been established between Constantinople and Adrianople, by an Armenian company. The carriages contain twelve passengers (beside three outside), and are drawn by six horses. They complete the journey in thirty-two hours. The fare is 180 piastres.

A few days ago a large whale was stranded and captured at Hoylake, in the Mersey. About fifty tuns of oil have been extracted from the monster.

The latest intelligence from Tahiti is to the 13th of June. After having been present at the installation of the new Governor, M. Lavand, M. Bruat, the ex-Governor, had left for France, on the 31st of May. The new Governor sought by every means in his power to conciliate Queen Pomaré. The greatest tranquillity reigned in the Island.

Letters from Vienna state that the marriage of the Archduchess Elizabeth, daughter of the Archduke Joseph, with Prince Ferdinand Victore of Modena, took place on the 4th inst., at Schönbrunn.

A vessel from Jersey has brought an entire cargo, comprising 2000 bushels of apples, the produce of that island. There are large quantities of apples imported at the present time from France, Holland, and Germany.

The Augsburg Gazette announces that the cholera is approaching Moscow with rapid strides. It is even said that some cases had appeared in that city. A family belonging to the higher classes, which was proceeding from Kazaff to Moscow, lost two servants during the journey, and on their arrival at Moscow a child and its nurse died. Colonel Stalnpin, an aide-de-camp of the Emperor, who was at his estate near Saratoff, has fallen a victim to the scourge. The cholera had likewise appeared at Odessa.

The Gazette of Tuesday contains a Treasury warrant regulating the postage on newspapers, and other printed papers, transmitted between the United Kingdom and Bremen. They are similar to those established for the Prussian states on the Continent; the route for newspapers to pass free to Bremen being "to Bremen direct, or viâ Cuxhaven, or any port or place within the territory of Hanover."

The Archduke Frederick Ferdinand Leopold of Austria, Vice-Admiral, and Commander-in-Chief of the Imperial Navy, died at Venice on the 5th inst., in the 26th year of his age.

A complete success has attended the trials made to prove the field of coal on the Cheshire side of the Dee, on the property of the Hon. E. M. Lloyd Mostyn, M.P. It is stated that an extensive field of coal, of most excellent quality, and which, no doubt, is a continuation of the Flint and Bagilt coal fields, has been proved.

Captain George Smith, R.N., attended at the Board of Trade on Wednesday, to explain his invention for making any boat a life boat when required. It consists of self-inflating tubes of rubber, by which all the valuable property and documents may be placed and kept dry. The same principle was also shown to be applicable as a life preserver for the person.

The Norfolk Chronicle notices a new feature in agricultural economy; viz., the introduction of a portable thrashing machine into that country, which is found to answer very well.

The opening of the double gauge line from Gloucester to Cheltenham will take place on Monday next. The event is looked forward to with much interest in the railway world, as it will set at rest the long-discussed question of the practicability of the two gauges on the same line of railway.

A letter from Frankfort of the 8th inst. says:—"It is now definitively decided that the Postal Congress is to take place on the 15th inst. Post-office Director Walter leaves this on the 10th for Dresden, as Representative of the Tour and Taxis General Post-office Administration."

Mr. Humphrey Brown, M.P., has purchased the Tewkesbury Theatre for the purpose of converting it into a silk throwsting manufactory, which will employ about sixty hands.

The adjourned meeting of delegates representing the factory operatives, fixed for Sunday last, took place, but with closed doors. Twenty-seven districts were represented, fifteen by delegates and twelve by letter, and all, except three, were in favour of a total cessation of labour, rather than submit to a reduction of prices. The meeting further adjourned till Sunday next (to-morrow) when the day is to be fixed for the general strike. Manchester, up to this time, has had no general or public meeting of workmen on the subject.

A new screw steamer, called the Germanic, has just been launched at Trieste; it is destined to ply between Alexandria and Trieste, and to carry the India Mail. Another steamer, called the Germanic, is nearly ready for launching, and will be put on the same line. The Overland Mail will probably come viâ Trieste in the first month of 1848.

The Inverness Courier says that a few days since, while a carpenter was at work in his shop, a cat chased a rat amongst some planks placed on the rafters over his head, and the rat threw down an adze which was lying on the planks. The noise caused the unlucky carpenter to look up, and the edge of the falling adze severed his nose from his face.

The Austrian Lloyd's steamer, which arrived on the evening of the 21st ult. at Constantinople from Trebizonde, had two cases of cholera on board both proved fatal. It was sent into quarantine for ten days. No case had occurred at Constantinople.

The first of the new decimal coins, agreeably to the plan of Mr. Snell, will be a two-shilling piece. The design has been completed by Mr. Wyon, of the Royal Mint, and displays great chastaness and artistic taste. The obverse will display a figure of her Majesty, the head being surrounded by a wreath of laurels. On the reverse will be a Gothic design.

At Kippenross, near Stirling, there is an old plane tree whose girth at the smallest part of the trunk measures 19 feet, and the girth close to the ground is 42 feet; its height is 114 feet, its cubic contents are 876, and its age exceeds 400 years.

The German Gazette of the 8th states that the Bishop of Kalisch, in Poland, has published an order enjoining the priesthood to reveal to the Government all the information that reaches them in political matters, except in cases where they receive it under the seal of confession.

POLICE.

MURDEROUS ATTACK AND ROBBERY IN THE STREETS.

At the Westminster Police Court, on Wednesday, two men named Doyle and M'Kay, were charged with assault and robbery. On Monday morning, between five and six o'clock, Mr. Bellchambers, of 44, Wilton-street, Vincent-square, was found within a few yards of his own residence, lying on the pavement, weltering in his blood, which flowed copiously from several wounds in his head. He had been insensible ever since. It was found that he had been robbed of a valuable watch, the contents of a cash-box, and his hat. The accused were suspected of being of the number of a gang of thieves who it is supposed had waylaid him. Mr. Holt, surgeon, stated that on Monday evening he was sent for to see Mr. Bellchambers. He found him in bed quite insensible. Both his eyes were very much blackened; there was a cut on his right temple, a slight wound on his right cheek, and a cut under his left eye. Up to the moment of witness coming to that Court, he had remained insensible, despite all that could be done for him. His was in so dangerous a position that he should not be surprised if he were dead when witness returned. He had had several fits that morning, which were very bad symptoms. The injuries must have been the effect of blows, because there was a cut on the forehead, which could not have been done by his falling on his face.

W. Meyers, an assistant at the King's Head, Orchard-street, Westminster, said that, at about two o'clock on Monday morning last, Mr. Bellchambers was in the bar, with Mr. Brees, the landlord. The prisoner M'Kay, who was in front of the counter, in company with another man, asked witness if he knew the gentleman who was behind the bar, and they both said that Mr. Bellchambers had got something in his hand (supposed to be the cash-box) which they should like to have. M'Kay's companion added, "that he would not do anything to the person (Mr. Bellchambers) while he was there, because it would get the house in trouble." M'Kay and his companion were joined by another man in a plaid shawl. Mr. Brees then left the bar to turn out a female who was creating some disturbance, and whilst so engaged the man in the plaid handkerchief, who had previously been refused admission by Brees, went into the bar, and spoke to Mr. Bellchambers. Brees, observing this, told witness to look out, as there was something going on wrong. After a minute or so, witness went into the bar, and Mr. Bellchambers said he knew the man. Mr. Bellchambers said the man were in conversation for some time, and the man asked him to accompany him and have some coffee. Mr. Bellchambers inquired which way he was going, and he said towards Charing-cross; and, on the other answering that he was going in a contrary direction, left the man left, and shortly afterwards, at about a quarter-past four, Mr. Brees closed the house. Brees had previously told Mr. Bellchambers that he had better stop, and see the other parties out first, for they were quiet characters; and recommended him to see that everything he had was right, and tuck his watch in. Mr. Bellchambers, on leaving, said he was all right, and in witness's opinion he was perfectly capable of taking care of himself. He left at about five in the morning.

The prisoners, who denied all knowledge of the robbery, were remanded.

DANGEROUS MALE AND FEMALE THIEVES.

At the Mansion-House, on Tuesday, three men, named Martin, Palmer, and Jefferys, were brought before the Lord Mayor, charged with having assisted a boy, named Parker, and a man, named Pocknridge, who were committed a few days ago, in robbing Miss Delamere of a purse, containing gold and silver. A well-dressed young woman, named Mary Ann Ward, was charged with having made a desperate attempt to rescue the three first-named prisoners. The whole party were identified by policemen Haydon, Hiddington, Funnell, Noon, Spittle, and Jenkinson, as thieves.

Martin, Palmer, and Jefferys had been brought up on Monday, and remanded upon the evidence of some of the policemen above-mentioned, who had been watching the operations of the gang on the day Miss Delacere was robbed, and discovered were to the identity of each. While they were taking back the prisoners to the Compter, Mary Ann Ward, who had primed herself with gin for enterprise, insisted upon having some conversation with Martin, and, on being refused this indulgence, "bonneted" the officer who held him by a blow on the top of the head. Upon being pushed away, she returned with increased vigour, and struck, and kicked, and again "bonneted" the policeman. Several fellows in the crowd, who followed, or, rather, surrounded, the policemen, joined the female, whose ferocity delighted them, and who, at last, became a most serious and dangerous impediment to the performance of the duties of the force. It was with the greatest difficulty the officers succeeded in conveying their prisoners through Newgate-street to the Compter. Some of them were for securing the female, but Haydon gave her the opportunity to depart, as the great object was to convey the three members of the gang to prison in security, and he knew that it would be no hard matter to catch hold, in due time, of a person disposed to run such hazard for her companion. As soon as she perceived her approach was upon effected, and the policeman described her violence and skill in the crowd as calculated to excite a general row against them, and did not, for an instant, doubt that the rescue had been regularly organized.

The Lord Mayor having directed that Mary Ann Ward's should be the first case investigated, heard all the particulars of the attempt to rescue. It appeared that several women as well as men had assembled, and that, seeing that the prisoners were about to be taken away, and the exertions of the woman (who, no doubt, calculated upon an immunity from the blows which mail assailants must have expected, so powerful) that, if handcuffs had not been used, the issue would have been most calamitous.

In her defence, the woman said that Martin was a friend of hers, and she had no notion that a policeman had a right to prevent her from communicating with him. She was then committed to Bridewell, after having bestowed her malediction upon the whole gang of office.

The three male prisoners were then placed at the bar, and evidence was given to the effect that they had all been apprehended on Sunday. Palmer was seen in the Borough by Haydon, and followed by him into a place to which thieves resort, where the pursuit was at an end, as soon as being told what he was charged with, it were that he was engaged in shooting in the country at the time the robbery was said to have been committed, but, when informed that his comrades were in custody at the bar, he was left up with him. The other prisoners, who were as dexterously followed and secured, denied, not only all knowledge of the robbery, but of each other, although every one of the party charged was identified as a principal agent in the "swell mob," and had been convicted at the bar of the Central Criminal Court.

Mr. Lord Mayor said, he hoped the committal of the prisoners for trial at the Central Criminal Court would have the effect of producing a greater degree of caution in the public, especially among ladies, some of whom seemed to suppose that their sex would secure them from all danger from ordinary thieves, and a steady perseverance upon the part of the police in following up gangs so powerfully and dangerously constituted. The prisoners are very able and active young men.

Ashfield Lodge, Suffolk.—On Tuesday evening, Lord Thurlow gave a splendid ball and supper to upwards of 200 of the nobility and gentry of the neighbourhood. The spacious rooms appropriated for dancing were splendidly decorated and illuminated. Adam's celebrated band was in attendance. At one o'clock a sumptuous supper was served, after which dancing was resumed, and continued till early morn.

Further Reduction of Omnibus Fares.—On Wednesday morning another reduction took place in the fares of a number of omnibuses on the Surrey side of the water. About six months ago a new company formed an opposition to the old one, by introducing the fares to Greenwich and Greenwich-gate to the City; from Kennington-gate to Temple-bar; and from the Elephant and Castle to the Hackney-road. The consequence of which was that most of the old omnibuses were obliged to reduce their fares to the same price. The opposition on the road has been considerable, and the new company commenced running their omnibuses to the number of forty for twopence on Wednesday morning.

Great Northern Railway.—The adjourned ordinary General Meeting of the shareholders of this company took place on Thursday, at the offices of the company, No. 1, Coleman-street-buildings, for the purpose of receiving and passing the accounts of the directors, and for the transacting of other business connected with the company. Harry Berradaile, Esq., took the chair. A. Grafton, Esq., the secretary, read the report of the directors and the accounts, from which it appeared that the total amount of receipts was £211,599 9s., and the expenditure £6,923 19s. 8d., leaving a balance in the hands of the directors of £4666 9s. 4d. After a short discussion, the accounts were adopted, and the report adopted. A resolution was also adopted, awarding the sum of fifty guineas for the services of the Committee in India. The business having been concluded, an Extraordinary General Meeting was called, for the purpose of taking the sense of the shareholders on the propriety of dissolving the company, and as to the amount of dividend to be returned on the deposits for Parliamentary expenses. Harry Berradaile, Esq., also presided at this meeting, and, upon taking the chair, read the report of the directors, which recommended the immediate dissolution of the company, and proposed to return to the shareholders 1s. 9d. a share, and relieve them from all liabilities on their shares. Resolutions for carrying out the proposition contained in the report were adopted.

Interesting to Florists.—A singular phenomenon, says a French paper, has shown itself in a greenhouse at Lyons. At the time when all the growers of camellias, rosse, dahlias, &c., are puzzling themselves to get the blue colour, the only shade which nature has refused to her beautiful plants, chance has thrown in our hands a flower blue upon the petals of flowers produced by one single branch of a camellia root of the species subviolata rubra. The interior petals of the flowers are of a delicate red, the superior are white, and both are united with blue. The flower thus unites three additional colours.

CHANTILLY RACES.

The late Meeting at Chantilly was a brilliant one. The weather was fine, and the attendance good. His Royal Highness the Duke de Nemours and suite, the Marquis of Normanby, and several noblemen and gentlemen of distinction, were present.

The racing commenced on Saturday, the 2nd.

The Criterium First Class, 1000*f*, added to a Sweepstakes of 100*f* each, for two-yr-olds.

CHANTILLY.—THE RACE.

The Criterium Second Class, 1000f, added to a Sweepstakes of 100f each, for two-yr-old fillies.

Count Cambis's Euphrosine	(Love)	1
Count Cambis's Sabretache	(Staples)	2
M. Fasquel's Forest Lass	(Neale)	3

Euphrosine and Sabretache took the lead, and came in first and second, beating the others easily.

The Constable Prize of 800f, added to a Sweepstakes of 250f each, for all countries.

Prince Beauvau's Walpole	(Chiffney)	1
Baron de la Rochette's Tardillon	(Pantal)	2
M. Drake's Castelcina	(Hardy)	3

Won in a canter.

On Sunday, the Consolation Prize, 1000f., added to a Sweepstakes of 200f., was won easily by M. Aumont's Rosa la Rose. The Haras Royal Prize, of 4000f., added to a Sweepstakes of 400f. each, was won cleverly by M Aumont's Miss Waggs. The Count de Paris' Prize, of 3000f., added to a Sweepstakes of 300f. each, was won cleverly by Count Cambis's Sabretach.

We now come to the Great Race of the Meeting, which is always an object of extraordinary interest to the constant frequenters of the French turf.

The St. Leger, 6000f. given by the King, for three-yr-old colts and fillies, foaled in France, entry 400f. Weights—colts, 119lb., fillies, 107lb., the winner of the Jockey Club Stakes to carry 5lb extra, and a horse which may have run three times during the year without winning, 4lb less. Distance, once and a half round, about 2940 metres. The winner to pay 15 naps. to the racing fund; the second horse to save his entry. (31 Subs.)

Prince de Beauvau's La Reine Margot	0
Duke de Nemours' (Count de Cambis) Bataclan	0
Duke de Nemours' Preface	0
M. Fasquel's Colonel Peel	0

The start was not very good. La Reine Margot went away with the lead, and kept it to the hill, when she was overtaken by Laura. For a few moments the latter got the lead, but on passing the stands La Reine Margot was again in front. On passing the stables, however, she was caught by Tronquette and Glands which had been lying in the rear. From thence up the hill all three lay close together. At the last turning Glands went ahead, and kept that position to the winning-post, at which he arrived easily by about a length and a half in advance of Tronquette; Admiral Sir Charles being third. Colonel Peel stopped long before the race was terminated. The race was a a very fair one.

Among the members of the Jockey Club, there was no betting on any of the preceding races, nor on any of those which took place on Saturday. Some surprise was expressed at no bets being risked on the St. Leger. The English frequenters of the course, however, staked some little cash on the last-mentioned race; and, as far as we could gather from the contradictory statements that were made, they considered Bataclan the favourite.—(Galignani.)

The annexed pair of Illustrations, sketched at the late Meeting, convey an accurate idea of the Royal domain of Chantilly, and its racing appointments; showing the Winning-post, the Royal pavilion, &c. The course, it will be seen, is kept by gens-d'armes.

In the second scene, we have the exterior of the Royal Stables, which we described in No. 264 of our Journal, with a view of the interior. To the left is the town of Chantilly; to the right, the Royal Château; and facing them is the Hippodrome.

CHANTILLY.—THE HIPPODROME.

THE VOLKS' FESTE, AT MUNICH.

FLYING SHEETS FROM OUR TRAVELLING CONTRIBUTOR.

MUNICH, Oct. 8.

THE October, or Volks' feste, is a celebration so peculiarly national in Bavaria, that I cannot think it will be without interest for your readers. It takes its double name from its being held in the month of October, and also from its being a great holiday, not merely to the people of Munich, but also to those of the other parts of Bavaria, especially the Tyrolean province. Thousands of persons congregate here every year on the occasion, and the amusements are participated in not merely by the peasantry, but also by the Royal Family, and the great Nobility of the kingdom

The fête is held in an extensive plain, close to Munich, called the Theresienwiese, or Theresa-fields, from an elevation near to which there is to be had the best view of the city. For days before the festivities commence, there is to be heard the note of busy preparation around and all over the place. Booths, coffee houses, taverns, shows, all of wood, but also substantial, are erected in spots apportioned for the purpose, and within a circuit of a little more than a mile: a regular course for horses, similar to that at Epsom or Doncaster, is marked out, with stands, a winning post, and all the usual paraphernalia of that sport of which in England we are so justly proud. There is also a grand stand for the King and the Royal Family, opposite to which also there is another stand, in which a magnificent band of music is stationed, and in which also there are seats for ladies. This place is principally frequented by the nobility and the wives of the chief traders of Munich, as also by the principal persons who come in from the country; but no person, of whatever rank in society, is excluded, so that peasants and nobles are freely mixed. Overlooking the chief part of the course, is a natural amphitheatre, formed by the hill, on which steps are cut in the turf, so as to afford a commanding point of view for thousands of spectators; and high towering over all, is the as yet unfinished Ruhenes Halle, one of the grandest buildings which the munificent spirit of the King has yet created—a splendid monument to all the heroes whose great deeds have rendered them worthy of the sympathy and admiration of mankind. Immediately before the grand portico of this building, but at a sufficient distance to preserve the due relative proportions, will be placed the gigantic statue of "Bavaria," of which I have already written to you, as combining exquisite beauty of design with a size altogether unparalleled in any similar monument.

The amusements, which form the staple of the Volks' feste, are horse races, rifle shooting, trotting matches, shooting at the eagle and stag, and finally a grand exhibition of what in England we call "fat cattle," but in which the beasts are anything but fat. Added to these are various other amusements, which are provided by private speculators—such as shows, tumbling, dancing, music, and, what to a Bavarian, stands far above all other amusements—beer drinking. The quantity of beer consumed in and about Munich during the few days that the fête lasts, is positively astonishing. The capacity of the natives is in this respect astounding, if in nothing else.

The fête opened on Sunday, the 3rd of October, with a horse-race. But you, good reader, who have lively recollections of the glories of Doncaster or Epsom, must not by any means associate your ideas of such things with your imagination of a Bavarian horse-race. Still, the good people here are delighted with what they have, and, as they know no better, it is as good to them as the best. Horse racing here is not a national sport as with us, entered into with spirit, and actively patronised by the first men in the kingdom; it is a mere amusement provided for the occasion, which has no proper antecedent training, and which leads to no result in an improved breed of horses. The nobility, or rather some of them, have not the horses that we have in England. Some may boast of a few good ones, but they do not "run" them for stakes, as in England. When I say that the highest prize that can be won is 15 ducats, and that the other sixteen prizes range between 24 and one thaler, it is sufficient to show that there cannot be much good expected from such an affair. Still, much emulation is excited, and the racing itself is capital fun, from its utter absurdity to an English eye. The horses have to run a distance of upwards of a mile English, four times. In fact, it is a game of helter-skelter, and the race is not finished till the last wretched, weary straggler has come in. On one occasion, a stout peasant, who had come with his mind made up to win, started off in good heart at the commencement of the race, and kept the lead for some time. He looked upon success as certain; but, whether that he had taken too much beer, or that the excitement of the affair impaired his memory, he forgot that he must go four times round the course. Long before the end of the second round, he had been distanced by all his competitors; but still, finding himself alone, he thought he was ahead. Coming in at the extreme end of the third course, he was delighted to find himself, as he supposed, so much in advance of the others, whom he saw far behind, and who, in fact, were just about completing the fourth round. He shouted victory, amidst the cheers and laughter of the thousands of spectators; and it required all the authority of the arbiters of the sport—very dashing-looking gentlemen, in blue regimentals, all mounted on indescribable nags—to convince him that he had lost. This will give you an idea how the thing is done in Bavaria. In truth, the amusement consists, not in the excellence, but in the absurdity of the racing; and in the good humour with which all the many mishaps are enjoyed, not merely by the thousands of spectators, but also by the parties themselves who engage in the amusements.

To a stranger, the interest is in the picturesque aspect of the vast plain, covered with such countless multitudes of people of all ranks; the gay costumes of the Tyrolean mountaineers, and of the Bavarian peasantry of the different provinces of the kingdom, mingling and contrasting with the sober dresses of the citizens, and, above all, is the good humour and mutual civility which allows of the congregation of so many thousand human beings without the necessity of any police interference. Nothing strikes a foreigner in Germany more than this spirit of mutual accommodation. We talk much of the police of Foreign States, and dread their power; but of this be assured, that they are much less seen, are much less obtrusive, and, in fact, meddle much less with the people, than do those gentlemen among us, who, dressed in a little brief authority, victimise the poor, and show a servile spirit to the rich.

The shooting-matches, which go on continuously from day to day during the whole fête, except while there is racing, are much more worthy the attention of a foreigner than the other arrangements. It is altogether needless to remind the reader of the proverbial skill of the Tyrolese marksmen. Most of those who engage in this strife are from the Tyrol; and they come in their picturesque national dresses. What a regiment of sharpshooters they would make! Scarcely a shot misses. Some shoot at ordinary targets, near which a man dressed in uniform stands, and indicates to the marksman the success of the shot. This is sometimes a dangerous office, and on more than one occasion life has been sacrificed; but still the rifles are poised, the cigar is puffed, and the shot hits the target. Besides these more common-place targets, there are also others, in the shape of stags, which move by machinery, backwards and forwards, in a bush; and to him who shoots through a heart, painted on the centre of the stag, his success is announced by a loud explosion and a cloud of smoke. There is also raised high in the air a gigantic eagle, but at such a distance that it looks small. To pull down with a rifle shot a part of this eagle is a great feat, announced by shouts from the assembled crowd, and rewarded by a badge of honour to the winner, with the privilege of drinking an unlimited quantity of champagne at night—to say nothing of the smiles and favours of the pretty maidens, who are ever ready to reward the hero of the day.

All these sports have now been going on since Sunday last, and they will last for nearly a week more. Yesterday afternoon there was a grand trotting match; such a trotting match! No, these Bavarians have no idea at all of what these things ought to be. I never saw in my life such a collection of Rosinantes. The prizes vary from 36 to four florins—from about £3 to 6s. 8d. English, with flags of honour for the first two or three. The competitors have to trot three times round the course, and so melancholy an exhibition of horses and horsemanship I have never seen. It is beyond description.

We are still in the midst of the fête, which is, of course, only an excuse for bringing thousands of people together from far and near. The day is spent on the vast course, the evening in beer drinking and dancing. The people are happy, and so the end is accomplished.

The King has returned to Munich, and there is a prospect of a considerable stir in the political world. The very liberal address agreed to by the Chamber of Deputies must bring on a crisis; and, in the present position of Germany, Austria does not like to see opinions gaining ground which are so antagonistic to her system. Lola Montes (or the Countess of Landsfeldt) still keeps her influence over the King's mind. She has very clever views on political subjects, and habits of observation and deduction which she probably first acquired when in the daily society of Dujarrier, Dumas, and some of the most able of the modern French journalists. She has also great force of character and determination of purpose; and, were she surrounded by honest and clever men, who would not practise on her womanly foibles, she might yet play a very useful part in public affairs. As it is, she exercises much power, through the hold she has on the King, who is glad to communicate with any person of strong character and clear insight, who will tell him the truth. A story published some short time ago in the Débats, to the effect that Lola Montes had sent cards to the nobility, which had either been returned with contempt or wholly rejected, is utterly without foundation. Nor is it true that she left Bavaria, and went to Chemnitz, in Saxony, as said by that paper. Most of the other stories told of her are equally untrue. Within these few days I heard a tale, that, when she was, a short time ago, at a place near Munich, she had assailed a young officer, also a nobleman; flung a glass at him, scratched his face, and, when he ran away, pursued him into a ditch, where he stuck fast in the mud. As a matter of curiosity, I obtained an introduction to this young gentleman, and asked him about the affair. He assured me, on his honour, that there had not ever been a misunderstanding between him and the newly-made Countess; and, as a proof of the falsehood of the story, he added that he was in the habit of frequently visiting her. On the other hand, Lola often shows a want of tact. Woman like, she falls into traps laid for her by those who know the irritability of her temper. But the tales of her striking men in the streets, &c., are quite false; the King is a man of too refined a mind to interest himself in a woman who could so discourse herself. The last number of Punch has been stopped here, because of an attack on Lola Montez. This is a foolish retaliation; but the fair lady was probably very angry at seeing her newly-blown honours thus be-pattered.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1847.

THE last change of affairs in Spain has complicated all that was intricate enough before in the politics of that strangest of nations. A Government turned out by a revolution, a Minister checked by a pronunciamento, are usual and ordinary; but a Cabinet bought out, a whole Ministry selling their places, in the most literal sense of the words, is something new. It is one of the many strange things reserved to the nineteenth century to behold. By the power of gold Narvaez is again in office; and there is a general feeling that the real denouement of the Spanish question is about to begin. Narvaez is a man of action, with something positive in his character. He will do what is to be done: he will carry out the policy of the French Court, if it suits him—his own, if that suits him better. The able instrument is seldom a very tractable one: he soon reaches the point where his own interests and those of his employer diverge; and once there, it is easy to predict which he will pursue. At present Narvaez is the tool of France, or rather of the French King—for, as a nation, France has as little interest in the degradation of the Royalty of Spain as we have. It is a flagrant plot for the aggrandisement of that fatal family, the Bourbons, which has cost the world such masses of treasure, such crimes and misery, such torrents of blood and tears.

The history of that one race is an eternal record of the folly and the weakness of mankind, an eternal satire on that wisdom and reason of which we so continually pride ourselves. Whole nations, millions of men, have been sacrificed to the miserable family intrigues of the Bourbons, who by marriage have spread themselves like a net over the kingdoms of Europe, England being almost the only country that has escaped them in the last two centuries. They have as little love for each other, as truth, honesty, or wisdom, in their dealings with their subjects. Louis XIV. engaged in a long war to depose a relation; Louis Philippe is allied to the Queen of Spain; but the interest of his son is still nearer to him, and so a Bourbon plots to degrade another Bourbon from a throne, that a third of the same race may ascend it! At this moment there is at least the peril of a European war with no better cause than this most wretched intrigue. The only defence the world has against the danger is the possibility that those who guide the public opinion of England and France, may succeed in inspiring the people of both countries with a hearty contempt for the plot and the plotters; for there is at least hope that men will not fight for a person or a cause they despise; so much reason at all events may be reckoned on. As to Spain itself, till it learns to feel, to think, to have a public opinion, and a popular policy of its own, it must accept the fate that strangers prepare for it. If it consent to be governed from Paris, it is not the opposition that may come from London that can save it; and for aught we can gather from the disgusting mass of profligacy, imbecility, and almost anarchy in which the Court and Cabinet of Madrid are always involved, it seems to us that if Spain is faced to be governed by the sordid and the venal, it may as well have a Narvaez as a Salamanca. We believe that in the long run, nations get pretty nearly as good a form of Government as they deserve to have; it will be a bad one if they are not fit for a better. That appears to be the present state of Spain; it is only fit for a bad Government—and it has got one. Minister succeeds Minister, crisis follows crisis, but, in the main, there is no improvement. By degrees, the very forms of a Constitution cease to have any value; and now we see the very ruffest element of power coming into operation, all higher kinds wearing out against the savage rivalry of narrow factions and the total apathy of the bulk of the people. Narvaez is the embodiment of physical force; he represents the Army, the military class, in Spain, at the disposal of any one who can secure it pay, promotions, and stars. Whether, even in Spain, the support for the army can achieve all that is contemplated, is, perhaps, doubtful; but with this instrument at command, much may be dared; even the dethronement of the Queen is not out of the range of possibility. When the character of the Queen is sufficiently degraded by the same vile and disgusting cunning that first married her to a fool and then surrounded her with knaves, the coup d'etat will be attempted. History presents nothing so pitiable as the career of the young Queen of Spain. Her mother persecutes her with a perfect hatred, and is the main-spring of the plots that have for their end the placing the younger daughter, the Duchess of Montpensier, on the Throne. Strange rumours are revived by this unnatural conduct, and it is hinted that Christina revenges on Isabella the memory of the brutish Ferdinand, her father. Whichever way we turn in this wretched Court we tread on some frightful old scandal, or are met by a new one that dates from yesterday. Imagine the state of things where the lovers of the Queen, present and prospective, are coolly calculated on as diplomatic "influences"—a term that veils a whole abyss of indescribable profligacy! The whole spectacle is one that can be found nowhere else—that was not expected there in the present age. And, if the Court and Government of Spain be an index of the state of society, then is there no hope for the nation: rotten within, and ruled from without, the course of such a people is direct to slavery: the elements of better things may exist among the masses; and, we believe, the poorest and lowest class in Spain is really the noblest, but they have no influence on public affairs, except by insurrection.

THE REVENUE.—The Revenue Accounts for the year ending the 10th of October, were made up on Saturday last, and it will not occasion any surprise that the commercial panic has had some influence in producing a decrease in the national resources. The total decrease of the revenue for the year ended on Saturday last when compared with that of the previous year, is £1,042,268. The total decrease for the quarter, compared with the corresponding period of last year, amounts to £1,507,230. The decrease in the Customs' receipts for the quarter is £874,191; in the Excise, £641,930; in the Stamps, £66,419; in Taxes, there is an increase of £3945; in the Property Tax receipts there is a decrease of £53,483; in the Post Office department, credit is given for the increase of £5000; Crown Lands show a decrease of £45,000, and the Miscellaneous account exhibits a falling off, which reaches £104,784. Nearly a million of the deficiency upon the year is accounted for, by the China money being no longer receivable; by a large sum for repayment of advances; and by a falling off of the items of Excise and Miscellaneous receipts. The chief items of decrease are the Customs and Excise; the first of which has lost to a considerable extent by the free importation of grain, and the latter by the high price of barley.

THE WEATHER.

The weather during the past week has been fine, the average temperature having been considerably above that of the season; the sky has been very much clouded; the direction of the wind has been principally from the S., and rain in small quantities has fallen.

The following are some particulars of each day:—

Friday the sky was for the most part free from cloud till 6h. P.M., and it was overcast after this time; the directions of the wind were S.W. and W.S.W.; the average temperature of the day was 52½°. Saturday, the sky was covered with cirrostratus and scud throughout the day; at about 8h. A.M. a slight rain began to fall, and afterwards it fell more heavily; the direction of the wind was W.S.W. and S.; the day was warm, its average temperature was 57½°, being about 6° above the average of the season. Sunday, the sky was cloudy for most part; some rain fell during the morning; the direction of the wind was S.; and the average temperature of the day was 56°. Monday, the sky was about three-fourths covered by cloud throughout the day, and towards the evening it was generally free from cloud; the direction of the wind was S.; the day was warm, its average temperature was 57½°. Tuesday was a very fine and warm day; the sky was partially covered by light fleecy clouds till the evening, at which time it became overcast with cirrostratus and scud; the directions of the wind were S. and S.E.; and the average temperature of the day was 61°, exceeding that of the average of the season by 8°. Wednesday, the sky was cloudy till noon, partially cloudy after noon, and cloudy again at night; the direction of the wind was S.W.; and the average temperature of the day was 57°. Thursday, the sky was wholly covered till 4h. P.M. During part of the morning a small drizzling rain was falling. After two there were faint gleams of sunshine, but the sky was for the most part cloudy. The direction of the wind was E. and N.E. The average temperature of the day was 53½°, and that for the week was 56½°.

The extreme thermometrical readings of each day were:—

COURT AND HAUT TON.

ENTERTAINMENT TO THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE AT THE MANSION-HOUSE.

On Saturday, the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress gave a grand entertainment to his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge and a distinguished and numerous party, in the Egyptian Hall

Amongst the company were Lord Dudley Coutts Stuart, the American Minister, Prince Sapieha, Prince Ladislas Czartoryski, Prince Adam Sapieha, the Lord Chief Baron, the Hon. Spring Rice; his Excellency Mr. Brooke, her Majesty's Commissioner for Borneo; Count Zamoyski, Mr. Masterman, M.P., Mr. Calver, M.P., Mr. A. Hastie, M.P., Mr. Waddington, M.P., Mr. Cubitt, M.P., several of the Aldermen, &c.

After the usual loyal and constitutional toasts were drunk, with the accustomed applause,

The Lord Mayor proposed the health of his illustrious guest, "The Duke of Cambridge, who had done so much honour to the City of London, which he had always delighted to hospitalise, by accepting its invitation." (Loud cheers.)

The Duke of Cambridge, in returning thanks, said he had never felt greater gratification in visiting the hall in which they were assembled than he felt upon the present occasion, and he was delighted to find that an individual of the illustrious family which he represented never met with a more warm or flattering reception than that with which he had been honoured. (Loud cheers.)

The Lord Mayor proposed "The health of the present Ministers," and expressed a hope, and a confidence in that hope, that the excellent feeling which existed between England and America would daily become greater. (Cheers.)

The Cabinet Minister returned thanks, full of praises of this country, and its institutions, and hospitalities.

The Lord Mayor, in proposing "The health of Mr. Brooke, her Majesty's Commissioner for Borneo," which was drunk with great enthusiasm, spoke of the extraordinary exertions of that distinguished man in distant and uncivilised countries.

Mr. Brooke said that the reception which he met with that day fully repaid him for the exertions which he made, and which he trusted would be attended with the good results which the company honoured him by anticipating.

The Lord Mayor proposed "The health of Mr. John Walter, the member for Nottingham," and took occasion to eulogise the extraordinary and successful efforts made by that gentleman's honourable father to support the weak against the strong, and to uphold the rights and privileges of all classes of his fellow subjects. (Cheers.)

Mr. Walter returned thanks.

Several other toasts were drunk, and the company separated, evidently delighted with the hospitality of the Lord Mayor.

WINDSOR, THURSDAY EVENING.—(From our own Correspondent.) Her Majesty and the Prince Consort took their usual early walk this morning through the plantations in the Home Park, in the private kennel and the Royal aviary. The Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal rode out on their Shetland ponies; and the remainder of the Royal Family were taken for airings in the private carriages. This afternoon, after partaking of luncheon with her Majesty and Prince Albert, their Serene Highnesses the Duke of Holstein Glucksbourg, and Prince William of Holstein, took their departure from the Castle for town; proceeding from Slough to Paddington by the quarter past three o'clock train. Count de Reventlow left the Castle at the same time with their Serene Highnesses for the metropolis. The Royal dinner party this evening included the Duchess of Kent, Lady Anne Maria Leveson, Miss L. Dawson Damer, and the Baroness de Speth. The band of the Royal Horse Guards was in attendance during dinner. Her Majesty's private band performed the remainder of the evening.

ACCIDENT TO THE PRINCESS ROYAL. While the Prince of Wales and Princess Royal were taking exercise in the New Park, Windsor, on Monday morning, the latter unfortunately was thrown from her pony, a fine young roan, and started off at full speed, before the grooms had power to secure them, both taking across the Park in different directions. The Prince of Wales fortunately retained his seat, showing great skill in the management of his steed. The Princess Royal, however, not having the same command over her pony, was thrown from her seat, but alighted upon the turf without sustaining the least injury.

DEPARTURE OF THE ROYAL SQUADRON. Her Majesty the Queen Dowager embarked at Portsmouth on Sunday, on board the ship Howe, 120 guns, for a voyage to Madeira. That vessel proceeded to Spithead, but an adverse wind prevented the vessel from sailing on that evening. On Monday morning, however, the wind shifted to E.S.E., and at six o'clock in the morning, the vessel weighed from Spithead and put to sea. On the arrival of the vessel at Lisbon, the Queen Dowager will land and make a short visit to the Queen of Portugal.

EXPECTED ROYAL VISIT.—The reigning Duke of Saxe Coburg and Gotha, the brother to the Prince Consort, is shortly expected to arrive in England, on a visit to her Majesty. The Court is expected to remain at Windsor Castle until after the arrival of his Royal Highness. It will then, according to present arrangements, proceed to Claremont for a few days, and thence to the Isle of Wight, to enable her Majesty and Prince Albert to superintend the planting of a large number of oak and elm trees on the Royal estate at Osborne. The Court will probably return to Windsor, for the winter season, early in December.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

CAMBRIDGE. Oct. 13.

Auditors.—The Rev. the Master of St. John's College, Mr. Fowler of Sidney, and Mr. Hardcastle of Catharine Hall, are appointed University Auditors.

The Caput.—At a Congregation holden yesterday, the following gentlemen were elected to form the Caput:—The Vice Chancellor Rev. the Master of St. John's—Dr. Hamilton, H. de Malus, D.D. Trinity Hall—Law: Dr. Dreaser, Caius—Physic: Rev. H. Fowler, Sidney—Senior Regent: Rev. C. Hardwick, Catharine Hall, Senior non-Regent.

TESTIMONIAL TO THE BISHOP OF SODOR AND MAN.—On Wednesday a magnificent service of plate, styled the "Eden Testimonial," was presented to the Bishop of Sodor and Man, but more popularly known as the Hon. Mr. Eden, late Vicar of Battersea, at the Retreat, the residence of Valentine Morris, Esq. The testimonial consisted of a dinner service, numbering twenty-seven pieces; the cost being 500 guineas. The silver bears the following inscription:—"This silver forms part of a service of plate presented to the Hon. and Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Sodor and Man, by the parishioners of Battersea, as a token of their gratitude and affection." At five o'clock the chair was taken by Mr. H. S. Thornton, who read an appropriate address, which was acknowledged in feeling terms by his Lordship. The Bishop of Sodor and Man, and a large party, were entertained in the evening by Benjamin Edgington, Esq., at his residence on Lavender-hill.

CABINET COUNCIL.—Another Cabinet Council (the third this week) was held at the Foreign Office yesterday. Nearly all the members were present.

DEATH OF DOWAGER LADY WATERPARK.—The Dowager Lady Waterpark died on Monday last, at her residence in Rutherford-street.

DEATH OF MAJOR-GENERAL THOS. PHIPPS HOWARD, K.H.—The above gallant General died on Monday last at his residence at Weymouth, at an advanced age.

DEATH OF DR. ROOKE, NOTTINGHAM.—On Thursday morning the ceremony of laying the first stone of the new post-office at the corner of Albert-street, Nottingham, was performed by Mr. Cripps, the Mayor, attended by the members of the town council, the town clerk, corporation surveyor, &c. His worship address and the numerous assemblage collected together in an appropriate speech, and remarked that no occasion of a similar kind had been attended by the completion since the foundation of the General Hospital in 1781, and he felt that the event was one of an interesting and important character. His worship then gave a detailed statement of the post-office for many years, and described the improvements in the transmission and delivery of letters, and the advantages that would arise from the establishment of the projected building. The inconveniences at present experienced would be put an end to, and the new building would be sufficiently extensive and complete in its arrangements for the transaction of the greatly increased public business.

FIRE IN STAMFORD-STREET.—On Thursday afternoon, a fire broke out in the manufactory belonging to Mr. James Bickerton, hatter, of Stamford-street, Lambeth, which was not extinguished until the building in which it commenced was burned out, and the contents consumed. Mr. Bickerton was insured in the Sun Fire Office. The boiling over of a can of "proofing," it is supposed, was the cause of the disaster.

THE ACCIDENT ON THE BRIGHTON RAILWAY.—Captain Symonds, one of the Inspectors of Railways, made an official inquiry on Thursday into the recent collision between the passenger trains at the Keymer Branch Junction on the above line. (See page 247.) He was attended by Mr. Peter Clarke, the Acting Manager, and several of the company's officers. From the evidence taken, it appears that the engine that met the one attached to the Lewes train with its tender was thrown off the line, and a horse in the rear of it was crushed; and a number of fragments standing in the end of a first-class carriage. Captain Symonds also interrogated both drivers of the trains, as also the man who had charge of the company's signals at the Keymer branch, and was, we understand, satisfied that no blame could be attributed to either party. It was admitted that the spot chosen for the junction of the Keymer branch was not the most eligible for public safety, being situated in a curve with cuttings on either side. The driver of the down train said the signals at the junction could be seen some distance off on the morning of the accident; they indicated "all right," until the train reached the bridge on the London side of the junction, when up went the signal "stop." He instantly shut off the steam, and applied the breaks of the tender; the guards also applying theirs. Had they been in working order, however, they would have brought the train within the distance given by the signals to the junction. The engine and tender were quite new, and the non-acting of the breaks was attributable to the screws being "fixed." Captain Symonds was informed that since the accident the Company had altered the junction, and that the down train would now pass over the Keymer rails, which cross the down-line, without the aid of the pointsman. In the course of the proceedings, it was mentioned that the son of Mr. Mitchell, one of the other gentlemen who were injured by the accident, are favourably progressing.

ANOTHER IRISH MURDER.—The Dublin papers mention another atrocious murder that of Thomas Kelly, a road-sweeper at Castle Otway—which was perpetrated at eight o'clock on the night of Thursday (last week). This, perhaps, is one of the most mysterious assassinations perpetrated for many years. No assignable cause can be given for the deed. Hardly much in the confidence of the Hon Mrs. Otway Cave, and her agent, Edwin Taylor, Esq. He occupied one of the offices near the court-yard of the mansion; in fact, within a few paces of the dwelling-house in which Mrs. Otway Cave had spent a good portion of last winter and spring. On Saturday an inquest was held on the body. The Jury returned the following verdict:—"We find that Timothy Kelly came by his death in consequence of a gun-shot wound in the left shoulder, inflicted by some person or persons at present unknown, at Castle Otway, on the night of the 7th of October instant."

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

BELGIUM.

M. de Vlesse, Editor of the Courrier Français, was on Wednesday found guilty of a libel on M. Dumon, in charging the Minister and his son-in-law with corruption; the Editor was sentenced to six months' imprisonment and a fine of 6000f. with all the costs.

SPAIN

The Paris Correspondent of the Times quotes a letter from Bordeaux, dated on Monday last, which gives some very interesting particulars of the secret departure of Queen Christina for Madrid. The letter says, "Queen Christina and her husband, M. Munoz, travelling with a single carriage and an escort courrier, passed through Jonzac this (Monday) morning on her way to Bayonne, travelling incog.; but she was recognized by a postilion. They arrived at Tours, from Paris, by railroad, early yesterday morning, and proceeded without stopping. Some hours later I met a brûlée, going in the same direction, which contained some of her suite."

The Correspondent proceeds to say: —"This sudden and secret move of Queen Christina is thus accounted for:—A telegraphic despatch received in Paris on Friday, from Narvaez, informed her that "if she would not see all the good that had been achieved lost, she would instantly repair to Madrid;" that "all had been settled with Serrano, who would immediately withdraw from Madrid, leaving the field open to her (Queen Christina), who communicated to the course of one day with her advisers, but, above all, with Don Louis Philippe.' The result was, her resolve to leave secretly for Madrid, which she did after an interview with M. Mon. The motive for secrecy was to avoid the possibility of being preceded by any announcement that she was on the road. Her arrival would, therefore, be a surprise on the Queen, her daughter—over whom, she still possesses considerable influence and prevent resort by her own enemies to such measures calculated to defeat her schemes. The object of the Queen-mother is to effect a reconciliation between Queen Isabella and the King her husband. If she be true, a quasi reconciliation may be effected, but how long it will last, or in what way it will end, would be a bold guess. In short, Queen Christina is now in Madrid."

The National of Thursday confirms the departure of Christina for Madrid, and asserts the expulsion of Serrano from the Spanish capital; but the truth of this latter statement is rather doubtful.

SUDDEN DEATH OF SIR THOMAS PIGOTT, BART.—Sir Thomas Pigott, Bart., expired suddenly, on the 7th inst., at Dennion Hall, Suffolk. The deceased was out on a visit to S Y. Benyon, Esq., and was dressing for dinner, when he was suddenly seized with faintness, and Lady Pigott rang for assistance; but he expired almost immediately. A post mortem examination was made, and it appeared that there was enlargement of the heart quite sufficient to account for his death. The deceased was fifty one years of age. An inquest was held on the body, and the Jury returned a verdict accordingly. The late Baronet was formerly Captain in the Royal Horse Guards (Blue).

FRIGHTFUL GUN ACCIDENT IN DEVONSHIRE.—On Thursday afternoon (last week), Samuel Whitaway, Esq., banker, of Teignmouth, was shooting with a double-barrelled gun, in the neighbourhood of Chudleigh, with Mr. Watts and Mr Whidborne, of the same town. Mr. Whitaway had just fired one of the barrels at some game, and was in the act of reloading, when the other barrel went off, and the charge passed upwards from his chin through his head, causing instantaneous death. The deceased was a gentleman highly esteemed by a large circle of friends and relatives. It is supposed, as the butt end of the gun was resting among some heath, atwig caught the trigger, which caused the gun to go off.

FATAL EXPLOSION OF GAS IN WALSALL CHURCH.—On Sunday evening, immediately after service, and while the last of the congregation were leaving the porch, a terrific explosion was heard, which shook the building, blew out almost every window, and shattered the pews in every direction. When the alarm had somewhat subsided, the building was entered, and a scene of appalling interest presented itself; and among it all lay the body of the beadle, a man named Lunn, dreadfully shattered and mangled. It appears that for some weeks past an escape of gas had taken place under one of the churchwarden's pews, and Lunn had gone to the spot with a candle immediately after the congregation departed, and the gas coming in contact with the flame, the explosion resulted. The damage done is estimated at upwards of £1000.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

BUCKINGHAM PALACE.—Last Saturday the new wing at Buckingham Palace attained its elevation, and the marble arch, built by George IV., at a cost of several thousand pounds, is about to be demolished, and the materials sold to defray the expense incurred in building the new wing.

IMPROVEMENT IN ST. JAMES'S PARK.—A stone footway for the accommodation of pedestrians has been commenced, which is to be laid down from Storey's to Buckingham Gate. It is also intended to lay down similar footways to the Stable-yard Gate, to Spring-gardens, and the Horse Guards.

THE NATIONAL ANTI-GOLD LAW LEAGUE.—On Wednesday evening, a public meeting was held at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, of the persons forming part of this assocol, now newly formed with the title of the National Gold Law League. About 200 individuals were present, including, besides the speakers, Messrs. John Taylor (of Upper Gower-street), A. Spottiswoode, F. Shelley, Edwards, and Mr. T. C. Anstey, M.P. for Youghal. Mr. Bannister, the President of the League, referred to the existing commercial panic, and ridiculed the idea that the progress of commerce should depend solely upon the value of gold. Mr. J. Duncan explained the principles upon which the League was founded, and said that destruction awaited the country, unless Sir R. Peel's monetary system were destroyed. Several other persons made speeches, but nothing very specific was proposed, nor were any resolutions submitted, and the meeting separated without obtaining any result, so far as we could discover.

SUNDAY TRADING IN THE METROPOLIS.—On Wednesday night a meeting of Parishioners was held at the Infant School-room, Three Colts-lane, Limehouse, for the purpose of adopting a petition to Parliament, in co-operation with other metropolitan parishes, against Sunday trading.—Mr. Hayman, on a deputation attended on behalf of the Association of the Parochial Authorities of the Metropolis. The Rev. Mr. Rawlings, Curate of the Parish, was called to the chair, and the following resolutions were carried:—"That in the opinion of the meeting there exists no real necessity for Sunday trading, and that the majority of tradesmen themselves are most anxious to be relieved from its continuance." "That a Committee be formed in this parish, consisting of the Parochial Authorities and other inhabitants, to co-operate with other metropolitan parishes, to prepare a bill for abolishing unnecessary Sunday trading." Mr. Hayman stated that it was intended to confine the bill to the selling of articles, and to impose penalties on a person selling. The scale would be—for the first offence, 5s.; for the second, from 5s. to 20s; and the third offence, from 20s. to 40s.; and, after that, for every separate act of selling, 20s. Several interviews had been obtained with the Secretary of State, for the purpose of determining what trades should be exempted from the imposition of penalties. It was the opinion of the Secretary of State that the selling of fruit might be permitted in the interval of the hours of divine service. This will, therefore, be allowed to the shop-keepers and to poor people in the streets. Bakers and barbers will be permitted to pursue their avocations, as they are not cases of selling. The great profits of the bankers on a bill has been to make it as liberal a measure as possible. A petition was subsequently adopted

WHITECROSS-STREET PRISON.—The new arrangements in Whitecross-street Prison for the classification of the prisoners are complete, and are expected shortly to be enforced. The prison will now be used for commitments from the City Sheriffs' Court under the act for Facilitating, &c. By the regulations to be adopted, there will be separate places for debtors committed for forty days from the County Courts and for remanded prisoners from the Insolvent Debtors' Court, as also for debtors committed by Magistrates. The same will be the case with those signed by the Secretary of State for the county gaols. The number of prisoners now confined in Whitecross-street is inconsiderable.

FIRE IN BLACKFRIARS.—Early on Sunday evening, the premises belonging to Messrs. Whitaker and Co., furniture brokers, of 28, Water-lane, Blackfriars, caught fire. Mr. and Mrs Whitaker were from home, but Mrs. Hamilton, one of the lodgers, and her three children, were in one of the upper rooms, and it was with great difficulty that they escaped. The fire, however, has been attended with fatal consequences to an elderly female, who lodged in the upper part of the house, and known as Miss Purdey, a teacher of music. The poor creature was told by one of the females that a fire was raging below, and that she must make the best of her way down; instead of doing so she ascended to the upper floor, where she was eventually discovered by the fireman. On Wednesday, Mr. W. Payne, City Coroner, held an inquest at the Queen's Head, Water-lane, on the body of Miss Frances Purday, aged sixty, a teacher of music. He was informed by Mrs. Hamilton, who occupied the front room on the first floor, and on the night in question, about ten minutes past seven o'clock, she smelt fire, and on opening the door a dense volume of smoke rushed up the stairs. In a few minutes the staircase was quite impassable, and she, and her children, gave the alarm of fire. The poor deceased in her excitement went up stairs, otherwise she could have escaped as well as witness. George Flemming, of the Fire Brigade, proved having found the body of deceased on the third floor front room, quite dead, lying on her back near the window. Mr. Whitaker stated that he occupied the whole of the ground floor, and was the last person on the premises. He went towards Blackfriars-bridge to fetch his wife home, and in about ten minutes before he heard his premises were on fire. Mr. Braidwood, Superintendent of the London Fire Engine Establishment, said that there was nothing suspicious about the fire; but it was clear the moment the metal of the gas pipe became thoroughly heated, there would, although turned on very slightly, be a full supply of gas; and this pipe being situated near the walnscot, would almost instantly ignite. The Coroner's Jury recorded the following verdict:—"That deceased was accidentally burnt to death, but as to the origin of the fire there was not sufficient evidence before the Jury to enable them to decide."

COUNTRY NEWS.

SIR ROBERT PEEL'S VISIT TO LIVERPOOL.—LIVERPOOL, Wednesday.—The arrangements for the reception by the town authorities of Sir Robert Peel have been somewhat altered. The wish of the Right Hon. Baronet, it is understood, is that there be as little of public demonstration as possible; and that, in this respect, he may be enabled to preserve a comfortable privacy in viewing the Docks and paying compliments on 'Change. On his arrival, therefore, he will, avoiding the town, proceed direct to Mosley-hall, the seat of Mr. Charles Lawrence, where the Right Honourable Baronet purposes staying, and the circle to which he will there be introduced will be of a very select character. It was at first intended to take advantage of the presence of the Right Hon. Baronet, and on the elevating the Statue of Huskisson to the prepared pedestal in front of the Custom-house, to give that ceremony all the importance which could be derived from the circumstance of the most distinguished of the colleagues of that statesman taking part in the proceedings. The suggestion, however, has not met with the approval of the Right Hon. Baronet, and the affair will pass off much more quietly than was anticipated. It is yet even doubtful, indeed, if Mr. Gibson, who is in town, will not enjoy alone all the honours of the day. Sir Robert Peel will walk through the town, sail on the river, and chat on 'Change; and, in the evening, he will dine with the Mayor (Mr. G. H. Lawrence). Sixty gentlemen, it is said, are in the commercial world, will meet him.

MANCHESTER ATHENÆUM SOIREE.—The approaching festival will be graced by the presence of Charles Dickens, Esq., who has signified his intention of taking a part in the proceedings of the evening. G. L. Craik, Esq., well known as the author of a great portion of "The Pictorial History of England," and Dr. Bowring, M.P., for Bolton, will also be present and address them.

VIEW OF THE ECLIPSE AT CHESTER.—The Eclipse, which took place on Saturday last, though unseen by the inhabitants of London and its vicinity, was visible in many parts of the country. At Chesterfield generally, the Eclipse was distinctly seen throughout great part of its duration. It began, as affects that locality, about fifteen minutes before sunrise, or nearly six o'clock; but, owing to the haze, it was only in the course of a quarter before seven that the whole of the sun's surface was covered by the smaller planet. A considerable part of the Eclipse was distinctly visible by the naked eye, the intervening haze acting as a kind of smoked glass, rendering the sun's surface not unlike the full moon of a visible part of the sun. When this haze was not present, smoked glass was required. The close was not distinctly seen, owing to the view being interrupted by clouds.

DEPRESSION OF TRADE IN LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE. The present state of trade in Oldham is deplorable in the extreme. A very large number of the manufactories are working short time; some not more than two or three days a week. In some instances, the operative spinners and other factory operatives, have submitted to a reduction, in a few cases to the extent of 10 per cent; but no general notice of any distinct reduction appears to have been yet given. About twelve concerns are at an entire stand At Stockport, several of the principal mills are altogether closed for the present, and others are working only two days a week. The workers generally fear that this state of things may lead to a reduction of wages, and, to avoid a result which they so much dread, it has been suggested by some to cease working altogether during the winter months.

THE QUARTERLY COURTS OF SESSIONS.—The second of the quarterly meetings of the iron trade was held at Wolverhampton on Wednesday, and was numerously attended by the representatives of nearly all the large firms in the district. The dreadful weather and the recent depressing influences on the commerce of the country generally would not lead to a reduction of the price in this branch of our manufacture; but the state of the trade was such as to call for no alteration in the existing prices of last quarter, and no alteration took place.

FIRE AT BROUGHTON HALL, NEAR MANCHESTER.—Broughton Old Hall, near Manchester, was partly destroyed by fire on Saturday morning, and damage was done to the extent of nearly £1000. The fire was entirely subdued in less than two hours, after destroying a large portion of the roof over the staircase. The north front, besides the upper part of the grand staircase. As the walls and ceilings were in course of receiving embellishments, they also suffered much injury both from fire and water. The disaster is attributed to the upper part of the premises having left a very hot fire in one of the rooms, which had ignited some pegs, the ends of which in one direction communicated with the flues, and in the other with the wood boards of the room.

MORE RIOTING AT-OVER-DARWEN, LANCASHIRE.—The peace of this village was again disturbed on Monday afternoon. The outbreak commenced with the destruction, during the Golden Cup, on the Blackburn-road, of the cupola over the farriers, belonging to a mechanic and other hands from Preston, who had been engaged by Messrs. Walsh. The "turn outs" first unleaded one of the carts and broke it; after being reloaded, they again tore it off the cart, and smashed it to pieces. They then returned to the village, and, the spirit of mischief being up, commenced an attack on the cottages of Messrs. Walsh's hands (the "knobsticks"), tearing down or driving in the doors and window-frames of above twenty of them, situated near the weaving sheds at the bottom of the village. The mob then proceed as further up the village, and commenced a furious attack upon the George Inn, belonging to Mr. Ralph Walsh, a brother of the partners in the manufacturing firm. The mob smashed all the doors and windows, tore down the bar, breaking all the glass, &c., within their reach.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

COLLISION ON THE BRIGHTON RAILWAY.

A collision took place on Saturday last, between two passenger trains. Some exaggerated accounts of the injury done have appeared, and there is much confusion in them, but the accident seems to have been of a serious character It occurred soon after nine o'clock, at the junction of the Keymer branch line, situate between Hayward's Heath and Hassock's-gate stations, and about nine miles from Brighton. The branch, it should be observed, has not been opened more than a week or two, and was constructed to avoid the circuitous route from Hastings, Lewes, &c., by the old line via Brighton. The trains that met with the disaster were, the first down or parliamentary train, and the morning express train from Hastings, the former leaving London-bridge terminus at seven A.M., and the latter Hastings at twenty minutes past seven. At the junction the Company have placed signals, and the instructions were exceedingly explicit as to trains passing from the branch on to the main line. Both trains are due at this point near the same time, and the custom is to signal the down parliamentary train to wait until the express has passed over. It appears, in this instance, that, when the "parliamentary" approached the Junction, the signal was given that all was right, and to go on, and it did so at the usual speed. On nearing the points, however, the engine-driver perceived the express coming up, and the driver of the express engine also laboured under the same impression as to the signal being all clear. The moment they saw their dangerous position, the steam was instantly shut off, and those on the parliamentary train engine, perceiving collision must inevitably ensue, saved their lives by jumping off. Unfortunately, neither of the trains could be stopped in time to prevent the lamentable consequences; and at the moment of the express crossing the junction, it was cut in two by the engine of the parliamentary down train.

The chief injuries were sustained by Mr. Wynn, the medallionist to the Royal Mint, and Mr. Driver, the land and estate agent, of Parliament street.

A gentleman named Lane, a passenger, writes to the Times as follows:—

"The collision was of a most frightful and terrible nature. I was thrown violently against a lady who sat opposite to me, and who for a few minutes believed that she had met her death. In addition to the general convulsion occasioned by such a shock, my left knee is seriously injured, and altogether disabled, though no fracture has taken place. After a few minutes the numbness which ensued enabled me to go from the carriage with difficulty and seek a surgeon for Mr. Wynn; I was informed that one had been sent for to set a broken or dislocated thigh, and he would soon be with Mr. Wynn. While passing several carriages in advance of ours, I saw such evidence of other injuries as is furnished by marks of blood on the steps, and was told that many of the passengers were injured, but no one killed. I saw the demolished engine, horse-box, and the shattered buffer-board of the engine, and the broken tender.

"When the surgeon examined the injury sustained by Mr. Wynn he directed his removal to a farm-house in the neighbourhood, to which he certainly did walk, with the assistance of the medical gentleman and Mr. Wynn, jun., who also suffered from the concussion, and from a similar, though less severe cut to that which his father received. Fortunately the stimulus which created

TRENTHAM, THE SEAT OF HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF SUTHERLAND.

MARRIAGE OF THE MARQUIS OF KILDARE WITH LADY CAROLINE-LEVESON GOWER.

On Wednesday, to quote the Morning Post report, "another daughter of the house of Sutherland extended the chain of aristocratic connections which this noble family already boast, by bestowing her hand on the young heir to the Dukedom of Leinster."

The betrothment of the Lady Caroline Leveson Gower and the Marquis of Kildare has already been announced in our Journal. The marriage was to have been celebrated on the 30th ult.; and, a paragraph from a contemporary, stating it to have taken place on that day, was inadvertently copied into a portion of the impression of our Journal for October 2. The event was, however, owing to the non-completion of the arrangements, postponed to Wednesday last.

The day was truly auspicious; and a bright autumnal sun lit up the magnificent Hall at Trentham, as well as the natural and artificial beauties of the grounds. The demesne is beautifully situated on the Trent below Newcastle. The mansion was originally a heavy brick pile, resembling Buckingham House, St. James's Park; but, within a few years, Mr. Barry has re-faced the exterior, and crowned it with balustrades and vases, and a Belvedere tower, 100 feet high; to the principal building have also been added superb pavilions conservatories and suites of apartments, of truly palatial character; so as to render it one of the most princely residences in England. There is a splendid terrace, descending to a "Pleasaunce," or Italian Garden, on the margin of the lake, which covers about eighty acres. In this garden has lately been placed a colossal bronze group of Perseus and Medusa. We have engraved a view of the Garden, as well as of the splendid Mansion.

The company invited to take part in the interesting event of Wednesday had been assembled, with few exceptions, some days at the Hall. The Duke of Leinster and Lady Jane Fitzgerald, sister of the noble bridegroom, came over from Ireland about three weeks since for the express purpose of being present. The Duchess of Leinster would also have been present, had her Grace's health permitted. The Duke and Duchess of Bedford arrived on Monday from Woburn Abbey; and the Duke of Devonshire on Tuesday, from Hardwicke Hall. The Duke and Duchess of Argyll and Lord and Lady Blantyre had been staying at Trentham since the arrival of the family from Scotland. The Hon. W. and Lady Caroline Lascelles and the Misses Lascelles, Mr. Sanford, Mr. Charles Barry, Mr. Sneyd, and some two or three other gentlemen, completed the party, which, with the family circle, numbered about thirty.

The inhabitants of the country, for several miles round anxious to testify their regard and affection for the Sutherland family, began to flock into Trentham at an early hour; and long before the household were astir, the Park in the vicinity of the mansion was thickly dotted with spectators.

At ten o'clock, a company of male and female villagers from Trentham sang, with good effect, "Hail! smiling morn," and "Hark! the lark at heaven's gate sings." This aubade was performed under the windows of the room where the family were seated at breakfast; and the Duke and Duchess, as well as the young Marquis, appeared much pleased with the incident.

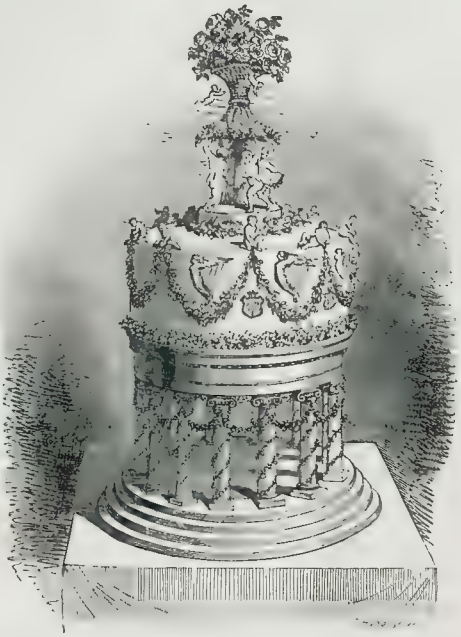
Shortly before eleven o'clock the doors of the village church (which closely adjoins, and is entered from the mansion) were thrown open, and almost immediately every corner was occupied.

The children of the parochial schools of Trentham, Hanchurch, and Hanford—amounting collectively to nearly 200—the whole of which are under the immediate patronage of, and chiefly supported by, the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland, entered the church at eleven o'clock, and lined the path which the bridal party were to take in their progress to the altar. The centre aisle was supplied by between fifty and sixty little girls educated in the Duchess' own school, all of whom wore white dresses, and straw hats trimmed with a wreath of green leaves; each bearing a small basket filled with the choicest flowers. All the boys wore white favours.

At twenty-five minutes to twelve, the bridal procession left the principal drawing-room, and passing through the conservatory, proceeded along the corridor to the church at the entrance of which were the officiating clergymen, viz., the Rev. E. J. Edwards, incumbent of Trentham; the Rev. J. Hutchinson, perpetual curate of Blurton; the Rev. H. Bunsen, incumbent of Lilleshall; and the Rev. H. Howson, private chaplain to the family; who preceded the procession to the altar.

The Bride, who was superbly attired, was attended by four bridesmaids, viz., her sister, the Lady Constance-Gertrude Gower, the Lady Jane Fitzgerald, Miss Lascelles, and Miss Henrietta Lascelles.

The Duchess of Sutherland walked with Lord Kildare and leading Lord Albert Leveson Gower, a child of surpassing beauty.



THE BRIDE CAKE.

The Duke of Bedford came next, leading the Duchess of Argyll; the Duke of Leinster with the Lady Blantyre; the Duke of Devonshire, with the Duchess of Bedford; the Duke of Argyll, with Lady Caroline Lascelles; the Marquis of Stafford, Lord Frederick Leveson Gower, and the other members of the party following in succession.

Lady Caroline wore a magnificent dress of guipure lace, over rich white satin, ornamented with garlands of convolvulus and orange blossom. Her Ladyship's head-dress was composed of a guipure lace veil, with a wreath of convolvulus and orange blossom; and in her hand she bore a bouquet of white roses and orange flowers.

The bridesmaids were severally attired in embroidered Tarletan dresses, and each had a bouquet of white roses interspersed with the mandevillea sanveiera.

The Duke of Bedford, the Duke of Devonshire, and the Duke of Sutherland wore the insignia of the Order of the Garter. The Duke of Argyll appeared in a Highland dress, as the Chief of the clan Campbell.

On the procession arriving at the altar, the officiating clergyman passed within the screen, in front of which the noble bride and bridegroom took their places; and the various members of the party having formed around the principal group, the ceremony commenced.

The service was read by the Rev. E. J. Edwards, the responses being chanted by the school children, assisted by the congregation.

At the close of the religious portion of the ceremony, the noble Lord and her Ladyship signed the usual record in the register of the parish of Trentham; the Duke of Sutherland, the Duke of Leinster, the Duke of Bedford, the Duke of Argyll, the Duke of Devonshire, and the Marquis of Kildare, being the attesting witnesses.

The household of the Duke of Sutherland witnessed the ceremony from the private gallery belonging to the family.

As the bridal party returned to the mansion, the school girls strewed the path with flowers.

A large concourse of spectators then collected in front of the mansion to witness the departure of the newly-wedded pair, who, at one o'clock, left the mansion, in a chariot and four, amidst enthusiastic salutations, for Lilleshall, the Duke of Sutherland's seat in Shropshire. The carriage was preceded by the park keepers and grooms in their state liveries, to the gates of the Park; and was escorted by about 150 of the Duke of Sutherland's tenantry on horseback.

After the departure of the newly-wedded pair, the company at the Hall sat down to a déjeuner in the grand dining room. The principal object on the table was a superb Bride-cake, measuring four feet high and 65 inches in circumference; the design, an Ionic temple, of great beauty. The ground-work was a plinth of silver, the Cake being supported by twelve Ionic pillars, festooned with shamrock and wreaths of "Forget-me-not," ornamented with festoons of orange blossoms supported by Cupids, and decorated with the Irish harp and shields of arms of Kildare and Sutherland quartered. The whole was surmounted by an ornamental basket formed of cornucopiæ, supported by Cupids, and filled with white roses.

After the déjeuner, the Duke of Sutherland proposed the "Health of Lord and Lady Kildare"—a sentiment which, it need scarcely be added, was most feelingly responded to.

In the afternoon, the tenantry dined together at the Trentham Inn, in honour of the happy event.

In the evening, a Ball was given to the Household at the Hall. Nor were the school children forgotten; but they were liberally regaled with cake and wine.

Our acknowledgment for the details of the ceremony is due to the Morning Post.

The Stafford Shire—for noble seats,
Albeit its fame resounds—
Hath none whose grace or glory beats
The TRENTHAM's princely grounds.

A mansion, with palatial air,
In splendid landscape set;
Like diamond 'mid the jewels rare
Of ducal coronet.

Embosomed stands the palace-home
In that enchanted place;
As though proud ART had thither come
For NATURE's best embrace.

The sun shines out with deepened ray,
More glory to impart,
Where TRENTHAM's Halls send forth to-day
Their Pageant of the Heart!

The Kildare—Leinster's Province-King,
Tree of the crownèd head—
To-day his topmost branch shall bring,
With Gower's joy to wed.

His love and pride, the Sutherland,
Shall lead in beauty rare,
To bind her white and virgin hand,
With joy to the Kildare!

Prize for the bright Kildare to claim;
Pure lustre for Love's arms!
A young bride, born to Beauty's fame—
Queen of a line of Charms!

A youngster wearer of the ray
That lights her Mother's face,
Whose angel looks have gleam'd their way
Through all her lovely race!

No marvel that the morn should shine
So fair and very fair,
To grace the Lady Caroline,
And bless the Lord Kildare

DEPARTURE OF THE DUKE AND DUCHESS DE PALMELLA.—The Duke and Duchess de Palmella, family, and suite, embarked at Portsmouth on Wednesday for Lisbon.

LADY WETHERELL.—The Queen has granted to Lady Wetherell, the widow of the late Sir Charles Wetherell, her Royal licence to adopt the surname of Warneford, in addition to and after that of Wetherell, in accordance with the directions of the will of Lady Wetherell's father, Col. F. Warneford, deceased.

THE MARRIAGE PROCESSION OF THE MARQUIS OF KILDARE AND LADY CAROLINE-LEVESON GOWER.

THE THEATRES.

MARYLEBONE.

We believe we are but echoing the opinions of several of our contemporaries when we say that the audiences appear to enter more fully into the spirit of Shakspere, in the theatres of the suburbs, than in the larger houses of the metropolis; that, also, the "Macbeth" at Sadler's Wells is, upon the whole, a more perfect and intelligent representation of the tragedy, by the unpretending, although excellent company of that theatre, than the "Macbeth," aided by the greater prestige, at the Princess'. The name that Sadler's Wells has acquired, for its productions and revivals, has been for some seasons an honourable one; and now Mrs. Warner, at the Marylebone, is coming forward in excellent imitation of the best features of the management just mentioned. Rivalry or opposition there is none, for the two theatres, each almost at an extremity of the town, are sufficiently wide apart to preclude all idea of interfering with one another's interests. On Monday evening, "Hamlet" was performed at the Marylebone Theatre for the first time, the directress taking the part of Gertrud, and Mr Graham that of Hamlet.

The lady's performance of the character has long been familiar to the public as an admirable piece of acting; and Mr Graham's was a lucid, judicious interpretation of Hamlet—a very fair concentration of the various recognised points—which, if it did not altogether reach any high standard of excellence, never descended to mediocrity. Mr. J. Johnstone was the Claudius; Mr. G. Vining, the Ghost; and Mr. Harvey, Polonius. Ophelia was played by Miss Huddart. The getting-up of the tragedy, however, calls for greater praise than the acting. We observe, both here and at Sadler's Wells, that the management always aims at improving scenes of the effective in the pieces brought out; and is uniformly successful. On the present occasion, an excellently-contrived arrangement of gauze gave a most unearthly appearance to the Ghost, which appeared to dissolve, as it were, into a mist.

We are happy to say that the house was well filled; and with an audience evidently of a superior character. Every playgoer, we are sure, must watch the progress of the season at the Marylebone Theatre with interest.

HAYMARKET.

"London Assurance," the first of modern comedies, was revived at this house on Tuesday evening, and the audience once more cheered to the echo Mrs. Nisbett's glorious and inimitable Lady Gay Spanker. We never saw her look better, nor did she ever play with more vivacity than on the present occasion. Mr. Keeley was in his original place as her Dolly, and must have been much pleased with his reception; and Mr. Farren was still the polished Sir Harcourt Courtly. Mr Brindal also played his well-part as the original novelty in the cast was Mr. H. Farren's appearance as Dazzle; and we are sorry we cannot speak in high terms of the performance. He lacked ease and self-possession; and his mere manner of walking about the stage was wrestled to a very palpable degree; indeed his whole bearing was rather that of the "gent" than gentleman; and he should recol ect that Dazzle, through all his escapades, is, in bearing, the latter. Mrs Jul a Bennett made a pretty Grace Harkaway as could well be found. On the whole the comedy went off spiritedly, and the house was well filled, if not absolutely crowded.

We hail with pleasure the return of Mr. Ranger to the London boards. This gentleman has appeared in his own piece of "The Romantic Widow," with signal success, proving himself one of the first "character" actors of the day. His reception was very gratifying, and his performance was truthful and spirited, that his name is sure to prove an attractive feature in the Haymarket bills.

PRINCESS'.

It is somewhat novel to see the last act of a tragedy played amidst the laughter and ironical applause of the audience, but such was the case on the occasion of the revival of Shakspere's "Henry the Eighth," at these Princess' Theatre, on Wednesday evening. From the inefficiency of the subordinate performers, the spectators got into such a merry vein, that all the impressions created by Mr. Macready and Miss Cushman were quite obliterated, and they began to enjoy themselves, receiving every speech that Mr. Cooper gave, as Bluff King Hal, with the same sort of hearty that would have been called forth by Mr. James Bland or Mr. Frank Matthews in the part of a burlesque monarch.

It is some years since "Henry the Eighth" was performed—we think Fanny Kemble was the heroine on the occasion. What its representation might have been in the days of John Kemble and Mrs. Siddons, we only know by tradition; but as acted on Wednesday evening, it was heavy in the extreme, the only points made being Mr. Macready's admirable reading in the scene with Cromwell, at the end of the third act, for which he was deservedly recalled after the drop fell. It struck us, however, that as made the character throughout, too aged and infirm. The falling step of the broken down man was not suited to Wolsey at the close of the action of "Henry the Eighth." Miss Cushman's Queen Katherine somewhat disappointed us in the trial scene more especially. She is deficient in the dignity required for the proper interpretation of the character. In the fourth act she was more successful; although it might be urged that the physical detail of the situation was too evident y elaborated. She is a great—a very great—melodramatic actress; and in that line we are anxious to see her. Mr. Ryder's performance of Buckingham was sensible and effective.

Nothing remarkable had been done in putting the piece upon the stage; the scenery and costumes were, for the most part, old friends; and the whole formed a pageantry very absurd. The revival of "Henry the Eighth" is not calculated to benefit the cause of the legitimate drama; nor will it do much service to the treasury of the theatre, although the interest excited respecting it drew together a densely crowded audience on Wednesday. Some time ago, we expressed our opinion of the management of the Princess', and stated that the "star" system was the worst to be pursued with respect to the permanent interest of the house; the present arrangements have not induced an alteration of our notions upon the subject.

A piece called "A Romance of the Rhine," produced last week, was played after the tragedy. It appears to be a translation, not very effectively made, but served to introduce Miss Villars, late of the Lyceum Theatre, to the audience. This lady is an acquisition to the ensemble corps of the Princess'.

SURREY.

The ballet of "Le Diable à Quatre," which enjoyed such popularity at one or two of our theatres, a couple of seasons ago, in different forms, was reproduced here on Monday, being its first performance in the transpontine districts. We doubted at the commencement of the ballet, whether the Surrey audience would altogether comprehend, or enter into a story told by mere pantomime; they appeared to be waiting for the dialogue, and uncertain as to what they ought to applaud. But, as the ballet proceeded, their delight became very apparent, and in the scene of the Basket-maker's cot age, where he brings home the termagant Countess as his wife, and compels her to dance, with the large stick, they laughed and applauded more lustily than they had ever done at the broadest low comedy and pantomime of old melodramas. Mdlle. Louise played the Countess admirably, and Mdlles. Addie, St. Louis, and Annie Payne, supported the other characters, aided by Mr. W. H. Payne, as the Basket-maker. The scene was again densely crowded, at the commencement of the third week of the career of "The Crowded, at the commencement of the third week of the career of "The Bohemian Girl" in Surrey.

ASTLEY'S.

It is time a little novelty was brought out at this theatre; and we hope, under the stage direction of Mr. T. West, also, a little improvement in the spectacles produced. There is no want of liberality at Astley's. The scenes are heavy with paint, and the dresses loaded with spangles; but there is an absence of all attempt at artistic effect and keeping, without which an equestrian drama, with its stilted dialogue and strong-lunged corps, is but a sorry entertainment. It is much to be regretted that those at the head of this style of production do not take a hint from the admirable manner in which these things are managed on the Continent. At the gorgeous Hippodrome, or the Cirque Nationale, in Paris, every dress is a picture, even down to that of the most unobtrusive supernumerary: whereas here, a company of Indian warriors may be Armenians, Turks, Chinese, Persians, or a union of all, as far as their costumes show great latitude being allowed to the Eastern style.

Some new artists have appeared in the circle. A coloured rider is very active and daring on a single horse; and Mr. Barry has a comic scene with some little sweeps and a portrait-painter, which elicits loud laughter from the gods and pittites. Mademoiselle Valentine is still engaged; and some clever feats by Mr. Ruley, by a "Professor," are neatly accomplished on the stage.

We believe three five act plays, written respectively by Sir E. Bulwer Lytton, Mr. Sullivan, and Mr. G. P. R. James, are in preparation—the two last at the HAYMARKET, and the former, the subject of which is "Cromwell," at the PRINCESS'.

Mr. Bunn is collecting a company at the SURREY for the performance of melodrama. Many of the members of the old troupe are engaged, and the first piece to be played is by Mr. Fitzball.

A meeting of a few friends of the late Mr. R. B Peake took place at the Café de l'Europe, in the Haymarket, on Tuesday, for the purpose of forming a Committee to raise a fund for the support of his widow and four children, besides two of his late brother's family, who were also dependent upon him. Mr. Rodwell, who had been active in forming the meeting, announced that he had met with cordial sympathy and effective co-operation in all quarters; and, even at that early period of his labours, read a list of subscriptions proving the high esteem in which the deceased gentleman was held. A performance of an unprecedented kind, which the first dramatic talent of England, will take place forthwith, at one of the theatres; the theatrical funds will also, we believe, evince their accustomed liberality, as well as the literary fund; and the most hearty warm exertions are being made in private to collect subscriptions. As we said last week, Mr. Peake's claims are not of a common order. His life was spent in honourable industry and friendship with all his literary fellow labourer: whilst his brother's death threw an additional burthen on him, to be supported by his pen. His presence shed kindliness and good temper upon all social occasions of meeting; and it will be some time before one of the genus irritabile passes through life with so few enemies.

EPITAPH ON RICHARD BRINSLEY PEAKE.

The truest, kindest, gentlest heart on earth,
Not unlamented, now lies broken here;
The favour'd votary of harmless mirth,
For every smile he rais'd now flows a tear.
Nor hath he left one foe would check the sigh
His wit and worth claim for his memory.—KAPPA.

LITERATURE.

ARCHÆOLOGICAL JOURNAL, No. XV.

We return to this work for the sake of a further notice of the "Chronicle of the Mayors and Sheriffs of London, from 1188 to 1274," just reprinted by the Camden Society First, of BUILDING REGULATIONS IN THE 12TH AND 13TH CENTURIES.

We gather from this document, that, in the 12th and 13th centuries, London houses, mostly still of wood, never exceeded one story in height; the ground-floor being called a cellar, the upper story a solar; the shops, too, were generally wooden sheds, erected in front of the inhabited tenements. There was much gardenground within the walls, and we read of boys stealing apples in the orchards of Parcemoner-row and Ivy-lane. "Still," says the Reviewer, "the necessarily close proximity of dwellings in the main streets led, at an early period, to the enactment of stringent regulations for the protection of individual rights, and the settlement of disputed boundaries. The assize of 1189 is entitled to be considered the prototype of the act relating to party-walls which was passed in our own times; it fixed the thickness of the wall of these best intervened the right of property in it; regulated the construction of gutters, and even went so far as to establish 'that if any one should have windows towards the land of his neighbour, and even though he had been seised of the view of the said windows for a year and a day, and his neighbour before that time, without any writing to the contrary.' Two parties agreed to build a party-wall, was to be constructed at their joint expense; its ordinary height being fixed by the assize at sixteen feet; either party having liberty to raise his own half of it, as might be deemed expedient. Any householder might lay down a pavement before his tenement, provided it were not to the nuisance of the city, or of his neighbour."

SANATORY STATE OF LONDON IN THE 12TH CENTURY.

We now arrive at some direct information as to the provision made for the sanatory condition of the metropolis in the 12th century, from which time to our own, judging by the present agitation, London would almost appear to have been stationary. "We have seen," says the Reviewer, "that so early as 1189, the due construction of gutters, and the convenient dispersion of waste water were objects of consideration; the cameræ privatæ of the ordinary were not left unregarded; they were prohibited within the distance of one foot from a hall, or three and a half feet from a neighbouring tenement; and the propriety of their construction was also taken notice of by the justices in eyre, who, in the year 1244, instructed the jury of every ward to present to them, any houses or tenements in the suburbs of London, with an easy descent towards the Thames, which were prejudicial to surface draining, sided, in a great degree, by these natural streams which then flowed open to the river, the Walbrook and the Fleet, the cleansing and maintenance of which in a proper state was, from an early period, objects of solicitude to the magistracy. It may be collected, also, from the perusal of ancient evidences, that narrow channels ran down the centre of many of those streets which led directly to the river side; but as the effect of these contrivances, if enforced, and we still groan in the nineteenth century, under an infliction which our less refined ancestors tried to avoid in the thirteenth."

We trust that we have not devoted space overmuch to this reprint of what the Reviewer, we consider justly, calls "a curious and invaluable record of a stirring period in our national annals, and of popular manners and popular struggles, in an almost forgotten age."

NEW CURIOSITIES OF LITERATURE AND BOOK OF THE MONTHS. By GEORGE SOANE, B.A. 2 vols. Churton.

With the view of making out a case for the publication of the present work, the author has, in his preface, somewhat uncourteously depreciated the labours of his contemporaries in the same vocation. This, after repudiating all interference with D'Israeli's "Curiosities," Mr. Soane condemns Rose's "Every-Day Book" as "no more, for the most part, than a compilation from newspapers;" Brande's "Popular Antiquities" as "generally edited by Sir Henry Ellis;" and Foster's "Perennial Calendar" as not giving much ate tion to the very topics which Mr. Soane has looked upon as most essential. It remains to see how far this treatment, with the addition of the "New Curiosities;" that it is not a popular or successful mode of proceeding, very little experience in the world will satisfy any one.

The plan of the work is, to give the nomenclature of each month; its climatology, and natural appearance, and phenomena; and its memorable days, &c., with details of national customs, relics of bygone days, and "New Curiosities" of each description, whether literary, social, antiquarian, or historical. In these sections the author manifests extensive acquaintance with the old English dramatists, poets, and chroniclers; as well as with the old Romancers. Between the lights of clever illustration, and of wo ld as disquisition, is the result. The long chapter of some sixty pages, on Rosicrucianism and Freemasonry, attacks the craft in good set terms: here is a specimen:

"The grand secret of the Freemasons, derived, as they pretend, from Solomon, if not from Adam, should make them wiser, or better than their neighbours, or it is worth nothing. Has it done so? Does the fraternity, as a body, and the like any other association of human beings, contains both bad and good men the worst, no worse than may be found elsewhere, and the best no better. In regard to art or science, as a body, they have brought forth nothing; and in regard to religion, they surely do not pretend to the knowledge of a purer faith than is in the Scriptures, or to a more perfect interpretation of them than is given us by our numerous guides to salvation. Their own, compelling the people, under severe penalties, to abide in ignorance while they kept all the light they could collect to themselves. It was not much to be sure, but what it was they retained and guarded with a jealousy most unbecoming fallacy. Such has been the case in all ages of which we have any record.

* * * * *

"But the day of mysticism has gone by; and, though it is only the first dawn of real knowledge that is breaking upon us, yet, even in this early twilight men for the most part can see too plainly to be the dupes of such absurd pretensions. The very attempt, however, to continue the old effort to perpetuate ignorance, and error; and, upon this principle, the sooner the Freemasons lay aside their aprons and talk like the rest of the world the better. And now let me say a few words in justice to the much abused Alchemists, whose relationship the Freemasons are so anxious to deny; they, at least, amidst all their dreams and follies, had much practical knowledge, which is more than can be said of the Freemasons, simply considered as such, were of service to mankind. If they did not find the philosopher's stone, they were not less the fathers of chemistry, and were much better informed in general than the world is willing to give them credit for."

The anecdotes of popular superstition abound with amusing antiquarian gossip, interspersed with some wholesome correctives of vulgar errors. The whole work will, doubtless, effect much good, at the same time that it will afford an ample store of amusement.

THE PICTORIAL BOOK OF BALLADS. Washbourne.

The popularity of the Ballad has been, in all ages, invariably great, however the character of the composition may have changed with the progress of literary taste. Among some nations, the ancient Germans for instance, Ballads were the only annals. In Gaul, Britain, Wales, and Ireland, the bards were the panegyrists of warrior-merit. Edward I., we know, butchered the Welsh bards; but their compositions survived; and a writer, as late as Queen Elizabeth's time, describing North Wales, says: "When the Sundays and holidays, the multitudes of all sorts of men, women, and children of every parish die use to meet in sundry places, either on some hill, or the side of some mountain, where playing, singing and crowthers sing their accustomed songs of the doings of their ancestors." But, instances of the love of Ballad lore may be found in the history of every age and country: their very dramatic spirit would seem to indicate the love of them as natural to man, and therefore strong and abundant in our own country, from the famed "Cuckow Song" of the 13th century to the lyrist of our own times

Bardorum etiheres pariti qui cedit iatro
Quam Tenedos notus ante fuit modo Troja sepulchrum.

The embellished volume before us is likely to gratify this universal taste for ballad lore, and that to a large extent. It contains fifty ballads, each illustrated with an engraved head and tail-piece: yet the book is cheap almost beyond belief. The editor modestly says that much critical nor reading is to be looked for in the work, the object of which is simply to bring under the notice of those who might be considered unlikely to go in quest of it themselves, the beautiful stories and sentiments of their early days. Still, we regret to find that the publisher's expectations as to the class of his patrons have been disappointed, and his work has been encouraged amongst a higher class than those for whom it was designed. With all the benefit and effect of cheap literature, we suspect that the over-production of the printing-machine has indirectly supplied the literary market with a vast proportion of trash, which causes the public mind to retrograde, or, at least, become stagnant upon such peradious ...

The national collections of Percy and Ritson have mostly supplied the staple of this volume; but less accessible and familiar sources have been resorted to, and some of them contemporary: "The Worme of Lambton," reprinted from "Tait's Magazine," is an instance of the latter.

Prefixed to each Ballad is an introductory Notice, stating its literary history, &c., chiefly drawn up by an active member of the Percy Society. The judgment shown in the selection, as well as the low price of its publication, ought to secure the work a large sale.

THE PLEASANT ART OF MONEY-CATCHING. Hamilton, Adams, and Co.

This is a reprint of a little book of about 140 years since; and, in accordance with the taste of that time, is as full of maxims as an egg is full of meat. Still, it is a certain sort of lip-wisdom applicable to all times and states of society which the world is governed by money, the lever which Archimedes only wanted to fulfil his mechanical boast. The book is, indeed, a bundle of truisms and oddities. Thus, from the opening chapter, we learn that Cain was the first miser, and the Lydians first coined money; though Abraham paid twenty-five pounds of our English money for a burial-place for himself and family. The misery of wanting money, and the unhappiness of being compelled to borrow it, next shows with a pretical postscript on Dans, by Randolph. In one of the pages, we find the germ of a modernized story: "A man in the ... time, having his coat catched by a nail, and so stopped, he prese ly cried out, 'At whose suit?' as supposing it had been a sergeant that had arrested him." The Causes of Men's Wanting Money is the staple of the next chapter: "I remember," says the author, "in Queen Elizabeth's time, a wealthy citizen of London left his son a mighty estate in money; who, imagining he should never be able to spend it, would usually make ducks and drakes in the Thames with shillings, as boys are wont with tile-sheards and oyster-shells, and in the end grew to that extreme want, that he was fain to beg, or borrow sixpence, having many times no more shoes than feet; and sometimes 'more feet than shoes,' as the beggar said in the comedy." From other chapter we gather that at Greenwich, in King James's time, my Lord Northampton's gentlemen were charged eight shillings for an ordinary capon, seven or eight shillings for a pair of soles, and four shillings for a dozen of larks. Curius (that noble Roman), by the way, was an odd fellow: when the ambassadors of the Samnites (whom he had conquered) brought him a vast sum of gold, they found him sitting by the fire, and boiling turnips for his dinner, with an earthen dish in his lap, at which time he gave them this answer: "I had rather eat in this dish, and command over them that have gold, than be rich myself." The author repels the scandal that the English are the greatest trenchermen of the world, though he confesses that we have had some remarkable eaters amongst us; "as Wolmer, of Windsor, and one Wood, of Kent, who eat up at one dinner, fourteen green geese, equal to old capons in bigness, with gooseberry sauce, according as has been affirmed to the Lord Richard Earl of Dorset, at a dinner-time at his house at Knowle, in Kent, by one of his gentlemen, who was an eye-witness to the same." There is a quip of experience in the next extract which secures it our day:—"Is any man's present piece of logic it is:—"If a man goes into a public-house and calls for a full pot of beer, it is three to one but that by reckoning it up, he shall want above a quarter of a shil of his expenses; and if a man takes notice of it, and shows that he is being filled up, it is looked upon as impertinent, and a piece of rudeness; and yet if a man wants but a farthing or a halfpenny of his reckoning, they will not suffer him to stir out of the house till he has paid for it, or left a pledge for it."

This is a piece of world-knowledge as applicable to our time as to 1710. "How to pay Debts without Money" is a disappointing chapter: indeed, there is a superficiality about many passages which cannot fail throughout the book. Here is one of the ways of turning a penny:—"Though the Master of the Rolls be an honourable as well as a profitable place, yet for a penny you may take two of the best places you can find in the Master's house."

To be more practical, there are given Dr. Tyrpn's eighty methods of prepering dishes, upon most of which he dined, and may live for twopence a day; a fast sermon by Lord Bacon's epicure, who lived by smelling a wisp of onions! To conclude, "The Art of Money-Catching," is both a pleasant and profitable little book, as we have shown, "full of wise sa—s and modern instances," and by no means to be despised in these economic times.

CONCERTS OF ANCIENT MUSIC—1847. By H. FIELD. J. Mallett.

These amateurs who are desirous of preserving records of musical events, cannot do better than purchase some volume of the yearly issue of the Concerts of Ancient Music, annually published by Henry Field. John Parry, B.A., the Honorary Treasurer to the Royal Society of Musicians (father to the singer of that name), has appended an historical sketch of the rise and progress of these concerts. He gives the names of the distinguished artists who have sung for the last twenty years at the Ancient Concerts. In this volume will be found a list of directors, Subscribers, orchestra, principal singers, leading vocalists, &c. An index is also given, with the titles of the compositions, and the names of the composers

THE GREAT SOLAR ECLIPSE.

On Saturday morning, October 9, the weather was so very cloudy at nearly all places in the south of England, that no observations could be made of the Solar Eclipse. The state of the sky seems to have prevailed generally over which the Eclipse would have been seen annular, except about Walmer, Dover, and Margate, at which places we understand that the Eclipse was seen, but we do not know whether any observations were made there. The Eclipse was seen well at Nottingham, and generally in the north of England. A Correspondent at Kirkby Moorside has been kind enough to send us the following particulars:—

"The town of Kirkby Moorside is about 1 fity miles north of the city of York, by the side of a considerable range of hills, east and south. From the top of these hills was the Eclipse seen. It was about half after six when I ascended (previous to ascending, I could only discern the reflection of the rays above the hills); at that time the Sun was visible and bright, save about a third of the part to the south; this continued gradually to proceed until about forty minutes after seven, when it resembled the plate on the northern limit (as seen in the Chart in the Illustrated London Almanack); then the mist immediately rose from the valleys and hills below, and encircled the whole, leaving a faint appearance of the top, similar to the plate of the Sun shining through. This lasted for about one minute and a half; at that time it was very cold, and neither horses nor trees could be seen below. To the north-west, the clouds were gathered in dense masses. Shortly after, when the Sun shone out again, they dispersed. I must mention, also, that, previous to the mist rising, the whole atmosphere, east and south, was of a reddish colour, bright canopy. The greatest Eclipse, then, I should say, was forty minutes past seven, according to my judgment. Every circumstance connected with it, save the variation at its greatest Eclipse, was exactly as given in the Chart. Throughout the day it continued to shine brilliantly, occasionally shadowed with clouds for a short time."

We have also been favoured with a communication from a kind Correspondent in Jersey, at which place the beginning of the Eclipse was seen. Arrangements were here made for a series of sextant measures of the eclipsed portion, but the weather was too cloudy to admit of such being taken. The appearance at Jersey, at 25 minutes past 6, A.M., is shown in the annexed Cut, as taken by Mr. Le Gros APPEARANCE OF THE ECLIPSE AT JERSEY, 25 MINUTES PAST SIX, A.M.

Several other correspondents have communicated with us relative to the Eclipse, and we beg to take this opportunity of returning our thanks to them for their kindness.

It has been generally remarked that the degree of darkness was somewhat less than was expected, but it is a well-known fact that it is the last portion of the Sun that is hidden which causes the great darkness in eclipses; and it was the knowledge of this fact which caused us to say in our Almanack "that a very great degree of darkness was not to be expected." The degree of darkness during the great Eclipse on May 15, 1836, which we observed, was less than it was previously expected to be.

At Lincoln the Eclipse was seen; about seven-eighths of the Sun was covered; the night part formed a beautiful crescent, with well defined cusps. The sky wore the deep azure colour which characterizes the evenings of December and January. The stars were visible.

THE SCIENTIFIC CONGRESS AT VENICE.—"The closing of our Scientific Congress," says a private letter from Venice, dated Oct. 1, "took place the other day rather in a noisy manner. There were above 3000 persons in the great hall, and some speeches were delivered on subjects of high interest to Italy. M. Cantu, an Italian author of high repute, especially distinguished himself by a speech in favour of an Italian National Union, and for so eulogy on Pope Pius. The loudest applause was expressed at his discourse, notwithstanding the presence of Archduke Rainer, the Viceroy, and the other authorities. But, what is most worthy of remark is, that when a cheer was proposed for the Emperor, the deepest silence was maintained."

FATAL CARELESSNESS OF HOP-PICKERS.—A fire took place on Tuesday, at Barden, near Tunbridge, by which the life of a child was lost, whilst another child and a man were most dangerously burned. The mischief arose from some hop-pickers drinking too freely, and then falling asleep in a barn, which was subsequently found to be in flames, the pipe of one of the drunkards having fired the building. The young sufferers were the children of one of the party.

CHESS IN ITALY.

The three following games, with notes, are extracted from the "Berlin Schachzeitung," and, as the editor of that periodical remarks, must prove a rich treat to amateurs and, at the same time, prove that Ercole del Rio's disciples are in every respect worthy of their great master.

GAME I.

BETWEEN MESSRS. DISCART AND BONETTI.

WHITE (Mr. D.)	BLACK (Mr. B.)	WHITE (Mr. D.)	BLACK (Mr. B.)
1. K P two	K P two	10. Q Kt to B 3d	Q B P one
2. Q P two	P takes P	11. K Kt to B 4th	Q to K Kt 4th
3. K B to Q B 4th	K B checks	12. Q Kt to K 2d	Castles (d)
4. Q B P one	P takes P	13. K R P two	Q to K 2d
5. P takes P	Q Kt to B 3d (a)	14. Q to K R 3d	Q Kt P one
6. P takes B	Q takes R	15. Kt takes P	Q takes Q Kt P (ch)
7. Q to her Kt 3d (b)	Q to K B 3d (c)	16. Q B to his 3rd	Q to her Kt 8th
8. Q P to Kt 3d	Q to K 3d	(ch)
9. K Kt to K 2d	Kt to K R 3d	17. K to Q 2d—and wins

(a) This move, which Bilguer gives with the remark that b, K B to his sq. again would very much confine Black's game, appears to us of very doubtful merit, since we have examined more closely the consequences of b, P takes B, as ventured in this game. We think now, in any satisfactory defence will be found against the subsequent attack The variation of the game on, which we give from Black's 7th move, appears also favourable for White. A careful examination of this highly interesting position by the strong players of the day is much to be desired.

(b) Recommended by Bilguer for White's 8th move; it is here still stronger, on account of the dangerous opened for the Q's Bishop.

(c) By unfolding Kt Q P, Black might somewhat relieve his game, e. g.—

7. Q to her Kt 5d	Q P two	13. K Kt to K 2d	Castles (Q side)
8. P takes P	Q B to K 3d	14. Castles	Q Kt to Q 5th
9. B takes B	P takes B	14. takes Kt	Q takes Kt
10. Q takes P (ch)	K Kt to K 2d	15. Q Kt to B 3d, &c. &c
11. B to her Kt 3d	Q Kt to B 3d

(d) It is worth remarking that in these games played in Italy, and by Italian players, evidently a favourite mark and Ideal-hood, the method of Castling is not the prevalent one of the country, but is generally abandoned throughout Europe. We trust the may be considered as earnest of an intention of the Italian players to conform to the general practice of Castling, and that we shall no longer have to complain of an exception which must operate prejudicially to the interests of the game.—ED. I. L. N.

GAME II

BETWEEN MESSRS DISCART AND N.

WHITE (Mr. N—).	BLACK (Mr. D.).	WHITE (Mr. N—).	BLACK (Mr. D.)
1. K P two	K P two	13. B takes P (ch)	Kt to K 1 d

11. B takes K (ch)	K takes B	23. R to Kt sq	Kt to Q B 7th
12. Q to R 8th (ch)	K to B sq	And wins.

(a) Interesting, if we could assent, to move 10. K Kt P two, if White took Kt with Kt. Black would then have three Pawns for his piece. Astounding, rather, we should think, to play 10. Q to her 2nd thus regain the pawn.—ED. I. L. N.

(b) We should have preferred—10. Kt takes Kt; the attack is, however, very interesting, although not lasting

(c) An exceptional check, by discovery, which Black holds, in reserve, saves the game, But for that, White would now win the Q.—ED. I. L. N.

GAME III.

24. Q Kt to Q R 3d	Q Kt P one (c)	41. K to Q 3d	B to K 5 2d
	Drawn Game.

(a) Black dare not take the Kt, as the attack from the Pawn that retook would be overpowering

(b) Here the passer battaglia (the free passing of the Pawn), which is universally practised in Italy, is an important stratagem. Without this, Black would have much difficulty even to draw the game.

(c) Bishop takes P would be unprofitable, on account of R to Q square

(d) In the difficult position Black displays that co nsiess and judgment which characterise the great player

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE great autumnal week at Newmarket was put on the scene, and enacted with considerable éclat. The sport and the seasonable appliances were all that might be desired. The chief event, the Cesarewitch Handicap, came off, as we ventured to anticipate in our last. "The right volley is always to go against the stream, as relates to a great Handicap favourite. In the present case, though the weighting is not a perfect performance, it is good enough to bring the field together on very fair terms, and to leave a good average chance on the cards for all the starters, presuming, as we are entitled to do, that they come to the post in their forms." Thus we wrote, and the result has shown that the view was a clear one. Passing, however, from by-gones to matters of present account, an event which has recently frighted the yachting circles from their propriety, calls for especial notice.

"The Channel was his Heliopont, and Aquavitæ the name of the nymph that threw him, mightily across the surge." Such were the characteristics of an individual who furnished the hero for a newspaper paragraph in the early part of the week. His rank was stated to be ducal and as there are but three Dukes identified with nautical matters and pursuits, the public voice announced one of the trio as the "Will Watch" of the aforesaid paragraph. Those noblemen having indignantly flown to their pens, the calumny was disposed of, and the saddle shifted to another back—whether the right one or not, remains to be shown. However that may be, it is understood that a large seizure of contraband spirits has been effected at the residence of the Duc de Stacpole, in the vicinity of Farningham, and that his yacht has also been taken possession of. The mere rumour of such a scandal is much to be deplored.

Of all our national pastimes, yachting has heretofore been the most distinguished for its chivalrous spirit. Its patrons were all gentlemen, and its purposes befitting those who had adopted it as a source of recreation. The Government lavished favours and privileges upon it; and its flags were passports to observance in every foreign port. Once, indeed, the burgess of a Royal Club was disconcerned in former times by practices similar to those now imputed to the owner of the Gipsy Queen, but not the less has the case at issue fallen as a heavy blow upon the friends of this noble sport. Still, as it has for months been known to the Excise that a schooner yacht was engaged in smuggling, it was better that the whole truth should be revealed than that suspicion should attach to men of honour. A nobleman, whose yacht is schooner-rigged, told us that he was aware that a vessel was under the surveillance of the Custom House authorities since June last! The party said to be implicated has not, we believe, been very long a member of any of the English Royal Yacht Clubs; though if we are not misinformed—the schooner Hornet, formerly in the name of Mr. Marriott, belonged partially, if not wholly, to him. The Duc de Stacpole, however, now belongs to the Royal Thames Yacht Club; and, in a spirit that does them all honour, the moment the charge against him became known, it was resolved that a strict inquiry should be made into it. To that end the following requisition, sig ed by many of the most influential members, was addressed to the Secretary

"SIR, A statement having recently gone the round of the newspapers, to the effect that a member of the Royal Thames Yacht Club has been guilty of a violation of the privileges accorded by the Government to the yacht clubs of the kingdom, we, the undersigned members of the Royal Thames Yacht Club, request you to call forthwith a special meeting, to institute an inquiry into that report, and to take such further steps as may seem meet in this matter." The reply to this was:—"I hereby state that Thursday, the 21st, is to be the day for the special meeting. (Signed) F. Durand, Sec., R.T.Y.C."

The steps finally adopted will, of course, be regulated by the result of the legal investigation; but the jealous spirit of honour which has called forth this notice of the scandal in house is guarantee that the members of the great metropolitan sailing club are resolved their motto and their maxim shall be "sans peur et sans reproch."

GRAND TROTTING MATCH AT MANCHESTER.—On Saturday afternoon the much-talked-of "extraordinary trotting match" came off on the race-course of the Belle Vue Gardens, on the Hyde-road, and attracted nearly all the élite of the Manchester sporting world. The match, which was for 100 sovereigns, was got up by Mr. Burke, of trotting celebrity, half the sum having been subscribed by the two gentlemen of the course, Mr. Jemmison, and the remainder by a few sporting gentlemen. The conditions of the match were, that the winning horse must not run a less distance than 17½ miles within the hour; the horse which performed the greatest distance within that time to be declared the winner of the stakes. A whisper having got abroad that a Yankee horse, "up to anything," was entered, a great amount of money was staked that eighteen miles and more would be done in the hour. Two started first under saddle; one of them, a brown horse, named by Mr. Pearce Mergan, and the other a chesnut horse, called "Sir William," named by Mr. Lawson, veterinary surgeon, and brought from England about eight months since, during which time he has been in training at Ambres, near Liverpool. On the signal to start being given, both horses got well off together; and, for a short time, the brown one appeared to have the best of it, going very well for some fourteen or fifteen times round the course, when his rider was obliged to give in, the horse being out of condition. The Yankee, "Sir William" (who seemed to improve in his work), then made a gallant sprint for the race, and, vigorously laying his legs down to the task, completed a distance (within the hour) of eighteen miles and a half less about sixty yards, coming in at first heats, at least so little distressed that it was asserted on Monday that he was already in a condition to be backed to do the like again. He never broke from his trot during the whole distance, and (his rider not having heard the report of the pistol first by the judge at the expiration of the hour) went round the course after the hour was up, as fast, and with as little apparent distress, as during the latter half of the time. Of course, the utterance of this unparalleled feat called forth loud cheers. The jockey, John Spicer, who, like the horse he rode, is also Yankee, was, it is almost needless to state, much exhausted with his exertions, and had he not been supported on dismounting, would have fallen to the ground. Mr. Burke's grey mare after words started, and for the first seven or eight times round kept better time than the horse, but was withdrawn, after going a distance of about twelve miles, in consequence of showing symptoms of distress

THE HERO.—A beautiful Portrait of the celebrated winner of the last Goodwood Cup is just published by Mr. J. Moore, of Upper St. Martin's-lane, and from the fidelity and excellence of its execution, is not unworthy of the long list of winners which have emanated from this national gallery of British sports.

SCOTLAND.

GLASGOW UNIVERSITY AND THE LORD RECTOR.—Lord John Russell, we believe, is remembered, was elected last session Lord Rector of the University, has intimated his intention of paying a visit to Glasgow at the commencement of the session, when he will deliver his inaugural address.

THE EDINBURGH UNIVERSITY.—The Hebrew Chair in the Edinburgh University has been conferred on a Dissenter. The election, which, invested in the Town Council, took place on Tuesday, when Mr. Macdowall, classical teacher, Dundee, was appointed by a majority of ten. The other candidate proposed was Mr Liston, brother of the celebrated surgeon. The votes stood: Macdowall, 20; Liston, 10. Mr. Liston is a licentiate of the Established Church, while Mr. Macdowall belongs to the Free Church

DEATH OF THE DEAN OF BRECHIN.—The Dundee papers record the death of Mr Horsley, Dean of Brechin, and senior minister of the Episcopal church in that city. Mr. Horsley was the eldest son of Bishop Horsley, and edited the posthumous works of that learned divine

VIEW OF THE ECLIPSE FROM EDINBURGH.—The Edinburgh Advertiser, referring to the eclipse of Saturday last, says:—"The sun arose veiled by black clouds, through which the eye could scarcely pierce to the point of attraction. Occasional and transient glimpses, however, were obtained when the denseness of the vapour at intervals somewhat alleviated. The solar disc, at the greatest phase of the eclipse, nearly presented the appearance of an opaque body, encircled by a bright ring; we say nearly so, as the annulus was only partial at Edinburgh, the magnitude of the eclipse here being 0.829 on the southern limb. At the height of the eclipse the shade thrown over the sky gave an appearance similar to the twilight before sunrise, only perhaps surpassing it in intensity of gloom"

THE MONEY CRISIS IN SCOTLAND.—The monetary pressure is making itself very evident in Scotland, as well as in England, by the increased number of bankruptcies which appear in the Gazette. From the 21st ult. to the 8th inst. Thirty-six sequestrations have been published in the Edinburgh Gazette, a larger number than for many years. Fifteen of the sequestrations are against firms in Glasgow.

DEATH OF THE GIPSY KING Will Faa, the gipsy king, died at Kirk-Tetholm last week, the old man having attained his 96th year. He is the last of the Faa tribe; and, according to tradition, he is the blood royal, at least, he was by direct transmission, will wield the sceptre by sufferance. Faa kept his crown tolerably unsullied, having never been in gaol during his long life.

THE FEVER IN GLASGOW.—There are seventeen district surgeons in Glasgow, who have had under their care, from 1st January till 1st October, 1847, no less than 16,256 fever patients, being nearly an average of one thousand to each. During the corresponding periods in 1844, 1845, 1846, not taken separately, but added together, i. e. the total of the twenty-months mentioned in the computation, the whole cases amounted only to 18,396. Thus the nine months of 1847 nearly, have exceeded the aggregate of the first nine months of the three preceding years by 1199 cases. Allowing six visits to each case, the district surgeons have, during the nine months in question, paid 96,270 visits. The results may easily be anticipated. Since January three of the surgeons have died of fever, two are at present ill, one has recovered; while, of the rest, all of them have had fever previous to the present year.

THREE CHILDREN BURNED TO DEATH.—A horrible and fatal accident occurred on Wednesday night, at the Blackhaw Huts, on the Caledonian Railway, above Rutherglen, by which three children were destroyed, and two severely and seriously injured, one of whom is not expected to recover. It appears that a man named Roberts and his wife had possession of two huts, in which lodgers were taken in and fed. In these two huts, besides Roberts and his wife, there lived two lodgers, the wife of one of them, two girls of Roberts, one two years and a half, and the other a year old, and a young girl, between ten and eleven, who acted as a servant. The three children slept in a loft, they, along with the other inmates, had all gone to sleep, except Roberts's wife, the husband having been from home, who sat up later. In going to bed, or, at least, into the bedroom, her candle had, by some means or other, come in contact. It is supposed, with some of the bed-clothes, and before the alarm was given, and the lodgers roused, the whole of the loft was in flames. They had barely time to escape, bearing the unfortunate woman along with them, when the roof of the hut fell in, bringing down the bodies of the poor children, which were almost burnt to ashes. The fire spread with great rapidity, and speedily consumed Roberts's other hut, and an adjoining one, belonging to James Wright. The whole of Roberts's furniture and clothing, as well as several barrels of ale, were destroyed. His wife was so severely burnt, that there is very little hope of her recovery. The unfortunate woman, it is supposed, first burnt on the left arm and shoulder. They have both been removed to the hospital.

LORD MORPETH AT STRATFORD-UP-N-AVON.—Yesterday, (Friday week), Viscount Morpeth, in company with Mr. C. H. Bracebridge, visited Stratford. At five o'clock, a deputation from the Royal Shakespeare Society, consisting of the Vicar, the Rev. J. Clayton, Dr. Thomson, Mr W. O. Hunt, and Mr. R. B. Wheeler, waited on his Lordship at the White Lion Hotel, and escorted him to the poet's birthplace, the church, the site of New-place, (now the residence of Mr. D. Hice,) and afterwards Lord Morpeth met the Committee of the Shakespeare Society of the Shakespearean Hall, which was lit up, to afford his Lordship an opportunity of viewing the portraits of Shakespere and Garrick. At seven o'clock, he honoured Dr. Thomson with his company to dinner, when a select party was invited to meet him; and on Saturday morning, in company with that gentleman, he visited the Grammar School, where the head-master, the Rev. I. E. Medwin, A.M., received him. His Lordship subsequently made an excursion to the village of Shottery, and viewed Ann Hathaway's house. At eleven o'clock he returned, and immediately took his departure, having previously expressed the pleasure he felt in making the visit.—Worcester Journal.

THE "BANSHEE," MAIL STEAMER.

THE "BANSHEE" MAIL STEAMER.

This new steam vessel is one of the four which have been ordered by the Admiralty, for carrying the mail between England (Holyhead), and Ireland (Kingstown). The Banshee has been built by Mr. Thompson, at the Commercial Dock Pier, Deptford, from a design by Mr. O. W. Lang, jun., assistant master shipwright of her Majesty's Dockyard, at Chatham. She is constructed of wood, on the diagonal principle, and is a remarkably fine vessel in appearance, firmly put together, although light in her outline to the eye. Her principal dimensions are as follows:—Length between the perpendiculars, 185 feet; length of keel for tonnage, 173 feet 9½ inches; breadth extreme, 27 feet 2 inches; ditto, moulded, 27 feet; ditto, for tonnage, 26 feet 2 inches; depth in hold, 14 feet 9 inches; burden in tons, No. 670 5.94; horse power, 350; paddle-wheels, 26 feet in diameter by 9 broad; and as her draught is only 9 feet, her paddle-boxes appear a great height above her deck.

The new vessel was to have been launched on Monday at half-past two P.M. The bottle was broken on her bows; but, the first cheer had hardly ended, when the vessel stopped on the slip, after having glided onwards about 40 feet. Every exertion was subsequently made to set her in motion again; for this purpose, the crew of the Monkey steam-vessel attached a seven-inch hawser to the Banshee; but, on the power of the Monkey being applied, the hawser broke like a piece of thread. It is supposed the stoppage arose from the cradle having become rbund bound, owing to the guide planks laid upon the ways being narrower near the river than they are at the starting point; and this is the more likely to be the cause, as the united powers of the Monkey (Government) and Tenny (hired) steam tugs, in addition to a powerful screw at her bows and a large tree used as a battering-ram, with levers to raise the fore-part, did not move her nearer the river; and the vessel was then shored up, to wait for the next afternoon tide. The brass band of the Royal Sappers and Miners were present, and thousands of spectators remained until they ascertained that no further attempt would be made on that day to launch her.

On Tuesday the efforts were renewed, but without success. On Wednesday, however, the vessel was launched with ease, and in a few minutes after the signal was given she glided into the water in fine style, amidst the enthusiastic cheers of the spectators. The Banshee was then taken in tow by the Monkey, to Messrs. Seawards', at Limehouse, to have her boilers put on board; and she will thence be taken to Messrs. Penn's, to have her engines fitted. In addition to her being riband-bound, which prevented the launch being effected on Monday, the ways appear to have sunk in one place, where the ground was soft, and raised the other end. The vessel is now fortunately launched free from injury, and her entire appearance reflects great credit on both her designer and builder. She is to be a vessel of superior accommodation and extraordinary speed.

NEW LIGHTHOUSE ON TREVOSE HEAD.

The construction of this Lighthouse, upon the north-west coast of Cornwall, has been suggested by necessity; there having been previously no leading Light from Land's End to Lundy. Trevose Head lies a few miles W.S.W. of the haven of Padstow; and is the most prominent headland on this side of the county; so that the position could not have been better chosen.

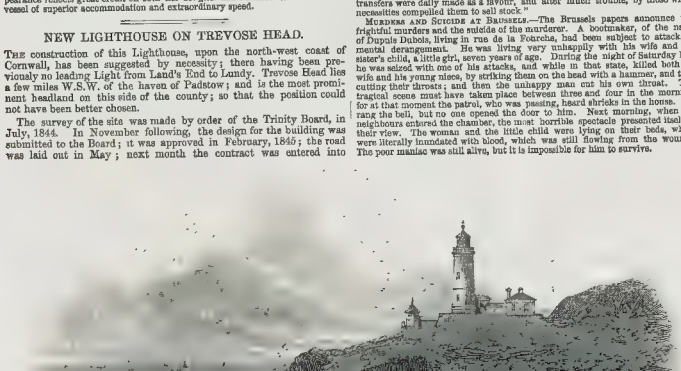
The survey of the site was made by order of the Trinity Board, in July, 1844. In November following, the design for the building was submitted to the Board; it was approved in February, 1845; the road was laid out in May; next month the contract was entered into with Messrs. Olver, of Falmouth, and the work was forthwith commenced.

By reference to the Illustration, it will be seen that there are two Lights. Upon the completion of the upper one, it was found to be liable to be mistaken, under certain circumstances; and, accordingly, in June last, the erection of a second, or Low Light, was determined upon. It stands about fifty feet in advance of the High Light; and, between them, is a covered passage of communication for the use of the Light-keepers.

The elevation of the High Light is about 200 feet above high-water; of the Low Light, 130 feet. Both are substantially built of stone found upon the spot, the dressings being of granite.

The Light is a fixed Dioptric of the first order, consisting of refractors and zones of polished glass, with one central lamp of four concentrated wicks. The manufacturers are Messrs. Wilkins and Co., of Long Acre.

The new Light will be exhibited shortly; of which due notice will be given by the Trinity Board.



NEW LIGHTHOUSE ON TREVOSE HEAD, CORNWALL.

Cabinet Council.—A Cabinet Council was held on Tuesday afternoon at the Foreign-office. It was attended by all the Ministers, with the exception of the Earl of Minto. The Council sat an hour and a half. Another Council was held on Thursday.

Prorogation of Parliament.—On Tuesday Parliament was prorogued by writ till Thursday, the 11th of November, when it is said that it will meet for the arrangement of the formal business necessary on the assemblage of a new Parliament.

The National Debt.—Francis, in his "History of the Bank of England," after mentioning "that the complete results of Mr. William Ray Smee's Stock-Office arrangements, whatever moment may be attached to them, are probably not yet attained either by the Bank or the public," says, in allusion to that gentleman's plan, "a most important result, far greater than any pecuniary consideration was arrived at. The Directors were enabled so far to consult the accommodation of the public, as to enable the transfers in the various offices to be made eight or nine days later than usual; the business which formerly occupied about thirty-two days, being accomplished in about twenty-three. That this is a most important result, and that it would be found highly beneficial during monetary crises, may be gathered from the fact already given, that during the panic of 1825, when the demand for money was so extensive, upwards of one hundred transfers were daily made as a favour, and after much trouble, by those whose necessities compelled them to sell stock."

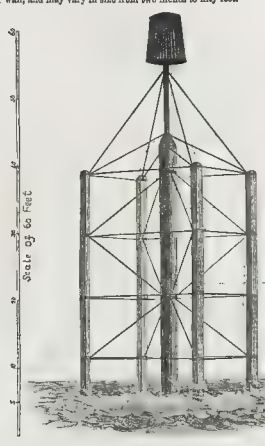
Murders and Suicide at Brussels.—The Brussels papers announce two frightful murders and suicide of the same day. A bootmaker, of the name of Dupuis Dubois, living in rue de la Fourche, had been subject to attacks of mental derangement. He was living very unhappily with his wife and her sister's child, a little girl, seven years of age. During the night of Saturday last, he was seized with one of his attacks, and while in that state, killed both his wife and his young niece, by striking them on the head with a hammer, and then cutting their throats; and then the unhappy man cut his own throat. This tragical scene must have taken place between three and four in the morning, for at that moment the patrol, who was passing, heard shrieks in the house. He rang the bell, but no one opened the door to him. Next morning, when the neighbours entered the chamber, the most horrible spectacle presented itself to their view. The woman and the little child were lying on their beds, which were literally inundated with blood, which was still flowing from the wounds. The poor maniac was still alive, but it is impossible for him to survive.

NEW BEACON ON THE GOODWIN SANDS.

We present our readers with an exact drawing of the Beacon just erected on the South Calliper of the Goodwin Sands. At this dreadful spot, perhaps, more noble vessels have been wrecked than on any other sand-bank in the world. Close to the main track of commerce, a ship may be at one moment in ten fathoms soundings, and in another moment strike upon a bank which is dry at low water, for such is the variation within a cable's length. To guard against this danger, the Hon. Corporation of the Trinity Board have erected this Beacon. The centre column is a tube of cast iron, 3 feet 6 inches in diameter, put together in 10 and 20 foot lengths; it is inserted 33 feet deep into the sand, by means of Dr. Potts's newly invented process of atmospheric pressure; the four surrounding tubes are of 15 inches diameter: the whole is bolted together, and surmounted by a cage of 7 feet diameter, the top of which is 56 feet above the sand level.

The process by which the foundation of this important Beacon was secured is this:—Hollow tubes or piles are employed, which may be formed of any material, and almost of any shape. The lower extremity of the pile is open, and the upper one fitted with a cover. It is placed upon the bank or ground, whether composed of sand, shingle, mud, clay, bog, or other material, in any moist situation, or under deep water. From the tube or hollow pile the air is extracted by pumps, the condensation of steam, or any mode effectual in producing that action which we call suction; being, in fact, the removal of the pressure of the atmosphere, or the partial formation of a vacuum.

When the air becomes sufficiently attenuated, the shingle, sand, or mud, flow up through the tube or hollow pile, the rush of water from below breaking up the natural arches which solid particles form together, and undermining the lower edges of the tube, which then descends by its own gravity, and the pressure of the atmosphere on its upper extremity. As often as the pile or tube is filled, the contents are discharged by a suction pipe, or other means; and not only the solid particles, but the water may be removed to the depth of thirty feet. It is obvious that the particles of sand, or other solid matter, may be removed from the interior of the tube to a much greater depth, provided the water be freely admitted to the interior of the tube. The importance of the time gained in extensive works is obvious. A succession of tubes may be added to the first, by means of screw, flange, or other joints. The shape of the tubes may be cylindrical, angul r, or conical, so as to fit each other, and form a continuous line or wall, and may vary in size from two inches to fifty feet.



NEW BEACON ON THE GOODWIN SANDS.

In works where an insular or detached erection may be required, as in the commencement of a Breakwater, at a depth of several fathoms in the sea, tubes of very large diameter may be used; or a series of them may be fitted to form, as it were, staves of a vat of vast dimensions, confined together by hoops and bolts, gradually put together in the water. The tubes may be floated to the spot where the insular rock is required, and there sucked down, thus penetrating any sand or shingle that may occur, so as to secure a firm foundation in any bottom. After nearly one hundred experiments on cements acting in or under salt water, some cheap varieties have been found, which at once unite shingle and large stones into a perfectly solid rock. Into this composition masts or wrought iron bars may be inserted, and the weight such structures will sustain is shown by experiment to be enormous. Thus, 19 piles of one foot in diameter support a pier of the stone viaduct erected by the Chester and Holyhead Railway Company over a branch of the sea in Anglesey.

Our readers will perceive the value of this discovery in the formation of foundations for the construction of Harbours, Docks, Railroads, Bridges, Lighthouses, Batteries, &c., is dependant on the ease and rapidity with which it may be applied, not only where the ordinary modes of proceeding are of difficult execution, but where the employment of the means hitherto known is practically impossible.

By a certificate from the Trinity Board, it appears that a tube of 2 feet and a half diameter was forced by Dr. Potts's process 33 feet into the Goodwin, where Admiral Beaufort could only force down a steel bar 8 feet with a sledge hammer. Captain Bullock, R.N., found that a pointed iron rod of 3 inches diameter, at the depth of 15 feet in the sand, took 44 blows of a donkey of 1 cwt. with 10 feet fall, to drive it one inch.

These facts demonstrate how erroneous is the popular notion that the Goodwin Sands are readily penetrable from their surface to the chalk on which they rest.

ART-MANUFACTURES.

Many of our readers may have observed, of late, in the shops of china-dealers, printsellers, and booksellers, about town, some specimens of a very superior class of familiar objects in daily use—such as jugs, inkstands, &c.; evincing refined taste as regards design, and rare excellence of material. These novel productions are termed "Art-Manufactures," from their showing "the union of Fine-Art with Manufacture." The idea originated with the gentleman rejoicing in the nom of Felix Summerly, who thus explains his intention: "Francesco Francia was a goldsmith as well as a Painter. Designs for crockery are attributed to Raphael. Leonardo da Vinci invented necklaces. In the Gallery of Buckingham Palace is a Painting by Teniers, to ornament a harpsichord; and in the National Gallery there is one by Nicolo Poussin for a similar purpose. Holbein designed brooches and salt-cellars. Albert Durer himself sculptured ornaments of all kinds. At Windsor is iron-work by Quintin Matsys. Benvenuto Cellini, and a host of great artists, decorated books; and, in fact, there was scarcely a great mediæval Artist, when Art was really Catholic, who did not essay to decorate the objects of every-day life. Beauty of form and colour, and poetic invention, were associated with everything. So it ought still to be, and, we will say, shall be again." With this resolve Felix Summerly set about his work: he obtained the aid of some of our best artists, including Cope, Creswick, Herbert, Horsley, Maclise, Mulready, Redgrave, and Townsend, painters; and Bell and Joseph, sculptors. It was then arranged that these artists should aid in reviving "the good old practice of connecting the best art with familiar objects in daily use;" to be manufactured in glass, porcelain, papier-maché, carved wood, iron, silver, &c., by the most eminent firms; for, "manufacturing skill is pre-eminent and abounds; but artistic skill has to be wedded with it." It must, however, be allowed that some progress had been made; for, as shrewdly observed in the Edinburgh Review, several years since: "let any one recollect the ugly forms of our ordinary crockery and potter's-ware forty or fifty years since, when the shapes were as deformed as that of the pipkin which cost Robinson Crusoe so much trouble, and observe the difference since the classical outlines of the Etruscan vases have been adopted as models for our Staffordshire ware."

In our notice of the last Exhibition by the Society of Arts, we engraved one of the series of articles collected by Felix Summerly; this was the Bear Jug, in Parian, designed by Townsend. Another object in Parian and Porcelain is the Bride's Inkstand, designed and modelled by Bell: it consists of a long oval Tazza, with a pair of lizards for handles. Upon one side of the Tazza is the winged boy, half kneeling; the torch serving to hold the taper; his quiver, the pens; and a vase the ink. There is a slight disproportion between the Cupid and the Tazza, arising from the unequal shrinkage of the materials; the figure being in Parian, and the Tazza in ordinary Porcelain. The manufacturers are Messrs. Minton, of Stoke-upon-Trent: the Inkstand is usually white; but the Tazza is also coloured in blue, and the lizards are gilt. It will be executed in bronze and in silver-gilt. As characteristic appendages, Mr. Bell has likewise modelled and designed a pair of Kneeling Children, surmounting a Paper Weight; and a Boy and Dolphin, as a Seal or Paper Knife handle. Both are of Parian.

We have engraved the next specimen, the highest in artistic character, Dorothea, a Statuette, in Parian (by Messrs. Minton), modelled by Bell; from the marble original in the possession of the Marquis of Lansdowne, in the collection at Bowood. This is, indeed, a charming production impersonated from "Don Quixote;" the illustrated passage being as follows: "They espied a youth dressed like a peasant stooping to bathe his lovely foot in a rivulet that ran by. ..... The lovely maiden looked up on hearing them approach..... In doing this, so exquisite a face was displayed that Cardenio said to the Priest in a low voice, 'Since this is not Lucinda, it can be no human creature.'" This is a high point of excellence to attain; but, in the Statuette, the loveliness and purity of the features are exquisitely beautiful; their expression of surprise is perfect; whilst the costume and drapery, and the graceful lower limbs, alike attest the mastery of the sculptor.

The "Bitten Tongue, a Mustard Pot," in Porcelain and Parian, is also by Bell. The Pot is of octagonal form, the sides white picked out with brilliant blue; and the figure of a Boy with the "Bitten Tongue," crowns the domed lid.

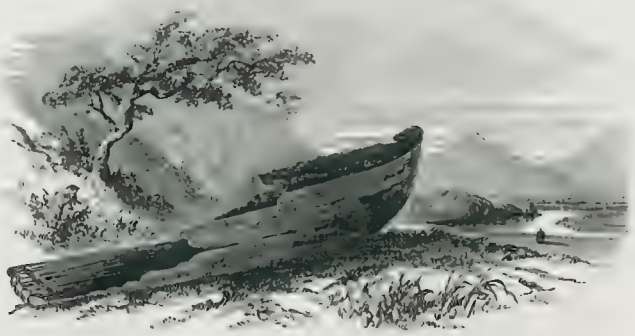
In Glass, we have Felix Summerly's Prize Milk Jug, colourless body, with a green handle. This is also executed in Porcelain and Silver.

The several articles may be seen at Mr. Cundall's, 12, Old Bond-street.

Among the articles announced as nearly ready, are an ornamented Shaving Mug, with brush and brush-dish en suite; a gilt enamelled Champagne Glass; a Fish Knife and Fork; an enamelled Wine Glass and Finger Glass; a gilt enamelled Glass Cake Dish; a papier-maché Supper Tray; Table and Dessert Knives and Forks; a Child's Mug; and a Britannia Metal Teapot. The latter, we hope, will be moderate in price, so as to displace the unsightly forms of teapots now in general use. It is not, however, intended to exclude the larger articles of furniture from the Collection. Thus, we find promised, a Grate, with chimney-piece, ender, and fire-irons; a metal and porcelain Clock-case, carved Chairs, &c.

ART MANUFACTURES.—STATUETTE OF DOROTHEA, BY BELL.

As the "Art-Manufactures" are praiseworthy attempts to raise the standard of public taste, the intention has our best wishes for its success; and we shall duly report its progress. We only trust that the demand for the several articles may justify the projectors in extending this refined taste throughout our domestic manufactures. Mr. Thomas Hope, we know, was twitted as the author who "meditated muffineers and planned pokers;" and the study may be treated lightly by unthinking persons. It has, however, a national object in view—the enabling of Great Britain to assume an artistic station proportionate to her rank in manufacturing skill.



CANOE FOUND ON THE CLYDE.

CANOE FOUND ON THE CLYDE.

A few days since, some workmen, in excavating a new quay at Springfield, on the Clyde, found, at 17 feet below the surface, and 100 feet from the margin of the river, a Canoe, rudely hollowed out of the trunk of an oak tree. It measures 10 feet in length, and about 18 inches in depth; it is somewhat decayed in the stern, which is about 2 feet in breadth, and tapers to a point towards the prow. The wood has become quite black, from lying imbedded in the earth. Similar vessels to the above have, at different periods, been dug out of the banks of rivers in Scotland: they, unquestionably, belong to a rude and early mode of navigation, especially in contrast with the commodious and elegant vessels which are built in the above localities at the present day.

MUSIC.

M. JULLIEN'S CONCERTS.

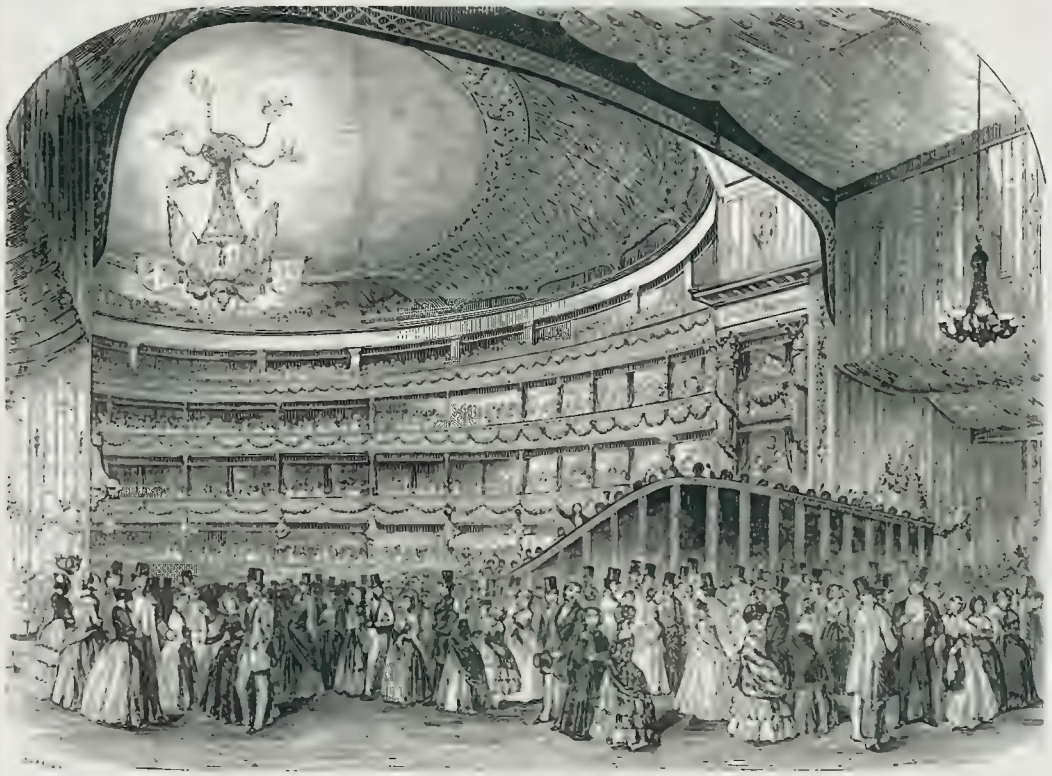
The progress of Instrumental music in this country has been very remarkable. The few professors who, some thirty-five years since, met to establish the Philharmonic Society, little imagined that in a quarter of a century such rapid improvements would take place in our orchestras. There is little doubt that the glory attached to the bands formed in Leipsic, Berlin, Vienna, &c., and, above all these, to the celebrated Conservatoire phalanx, directed by the veteran Habeneck, had a great effect in our onward march. The Philharmonic Society for many years had the monopoly of fame; but the quick perception of Laporte, for so many years the Manager of the Haymarket Italian Opera, distinguished in Costa the genius for orchestral command, which has produced such important results for art, and has secured such material advantages for artists. The creation of a band at the Opera House, which in course of time eclipsed the executive feats of the Philharmonic Society, may be stated to have been the primary cause of the establishment of concerts, at which dance, music, and fantasias were at first only found in the schemes; but, as the public became more familiar with the nature and characteristics of instruments, the mighty inspirations of the master-minds of the age were brought before audiences, to whom the scores had been hitherto a sealed book. The advantage of extended familiarity with great works has, however, not been confined to the artistical world. The amateurs have taken the field. In the formation of the Sacred Harmonic Society, and in the recent starting of the Amateur Musical Society, it has been proved, that the practice as well as theory of the science of sweet sounds has reached every class of the community.

M. Jullien has, in his various musical undertakings, displayed much tact and energy. We are not altogether admirers, perhaps, of his system of attracting notoriety. His announcements partake too much of puffery—his bearing in the orchestra has earned for him the reputation of being the Polichinelle of conductors; but, with all his eccentricities and his absurdities, he has earned for himself the character of being an enthusiastic musician and a man of integrity in all his dealings. For the struggling instrumentalist he has provided a market for his talent in the dull season. For the amateur, he has secured the chance of hearing the classical gems, intermingled with light, pleasant, and champagne-sparkling compositions.

We are pleased to find that M. Jullien takes such pains in the improvement o his band. He is following in the wake of Costa, in the strengthening of the stringed instruments, against the weight of brass and wood. We count now eight double basses, eight violoncellos, eight tenors, and a due proportion of first and second violins in his present force. It must be borne in mind that M. Jullien for his solo pieces, must necessarily select players who have a great name: but it by no means follows that these executants for individual display, are the most effective orchestral artists. M. Jullien, therefore, for his promenade concerts, cannot be expected to enrol such an orchestra as that which so astonished and delighted the musical world at the Royal Italian Opera last season, but there can be no question that he has collected this season a finer band than ever before was heard at such entertainments. When we mention the names of Sainton, Case H. Blagrove, Nadaud, Tolbecque, Payton, Watkins, Goffrie, Hill, Alsopt, Rousselot, Piatti, Hausman, Lavenu, W. Loder, Hancock, Howell, Pratten, Rowland Anglais, Casolani, Harper, Cioffi, Barret, Prospere, Richardson, Lazarus, Jarrott, Collinet, Kenig, Platt, &c., every reader acquainted with the talents of our instrumental stars, will recognise some of our best executants.

The disposition evinced to encore movements from Beethoven's Symphonies, is one of those signs of the times that ought not to be overlooked. We should be sorry to see the main principle of this undertaking changed by the introduction of too much vocal music; but the engagement of such an excellent vocalist as Miss Dolby, after a piece in each part, must be pronounced as highly acceptable to the general public.

The novelty of the season is the Swiss Quadrilla, illustrative of the peculiar musical effects of the land of the mountain and flood, but of this novelty we must write on a future occasion



DRURY LANE THEATRE, REDECORATED.—JULLIEN'S PROMENADE CONCERT.

The theatre has been cleansed throughout—a labour as requisite here as in the Augean stable of old. We have engraved the newly-decorated Auditory of the House, as seen from the stage; with the orchestra and floored pit, during a promenade concert. The ground-colour throughout is a faint blossom. The fronts of the boxes, and of the lower gallery (to which the whole of this upper portion is now appropriated) are laced with a bold trellis of gilt moulding, upon which are suspended festoons of flowers, also gilt. On the dress circle the festoons are looped through wreaths; and, on the other tiers, are set plain and simpler festoons, without the wreaths. The coved, or outer circle of the ceiling, is broken in the centre by the upper gallery, which has an unsightly effect from the stage; but, on each side, are coved niches, having pendants, with bold foliage, richly gilt, on the piers and above the arches; over these is a deep coving of lattice, gilt: and next is the bordure—a bold wreath inclosing the inner circle of the ceiling. This is painted to imitate the cloudless blue sky, around the circle are jets of gas, and, from an aperture in the centre, hangs a vast chandelier of cut glass: the aperture is wreathed, and around it are six winged boys, bearing festoons of flowers, in effect supporting the centre. The main design of the latter is six flags, of drops, with the lines of the Union-Jack marked on each by light. There is also a profusion of drops, in large tassels, festoons, and garlanded forms, too various to describe. The effect of the whole, when lighted, is remarkably brilliant. Around the dress and first circles, are also hung small lustres, with the gaslights in ground-glass shades.

The family boxes have been removed from the back of the dress circle, and an inner lobby formed in their place; but, as the backs of the boxes are low, their occupants are exposed to draughts of air from the continued opening of the lobby doors; this will soon be remedied by a glass screen, and will be considerable remedied. The first circle is exclusively in private boxes; the draperies of which, as well as of the other circles are of scarlet cloth, trimmed with gold colour. The chairs, of the same hue, are of a graceful, light, easy, and less a mean effect. The boxes and lobbies are lined with a crimson ground and yellow patterned paper; and the reeded pillar supports of the boxes are entwined with gilt flowers and fruit.

In the Proscenium, there is little change: the crimson velvet and gold draperies have been displaced by the scarlet; the superb columns have been regilt in the cast and the pierced shafts are now enhanced by bold wreaths of flowers, richly gilt. The drapery of the Proscenium arch is plain crimson, without fold or flute, faced with gold braids. It reminds one of the gilt fashion of an Anna Boleyn cap front.

The draperies, inclosing the stage, are white and gold, of the usual design for the concert performance; and the orchestra is made as harmonious, this portion of the house being lighted by gilt lamps suspended from the flies. We should not omit to mention that in the rear of the stage is a spacious reading-room, a new feature of accommodation.

The decoration of the Auditory has been designed and superintended by Mr. Frederick Gye. The general effect is novel and sparkling; and, with the immense flood of gaslight, it is well adapted for the present performances: though the brightness of the embellishments does not show to advantage the black mass in the promenade. Possibly, before the dramatic season commences, it may be advisable to modify the brilliancy, or partial effect, as the more attractive hours in such luminous excess may be less pleasurable to the audience than was intended.

The whole of the ornaments—mouldings, fruit and flowers are of papier-mâché, and were made, gilt, and fixed by Mr. Bielefeld, in five weeks; the manufacture involving an extraordinary application of the steam-engine to decorative art.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.—In our next number we shall give a notice of the débuts of Madame Castellan in Lucia, at the Italian Opera in Paris, and of Mdlle. Alboni, at the Académie Royale de Musique, supplied by our Correspondent.

COBDEN'S RETURN.

Now, welcome, Richard Cobden!
Right welcome to thy home:
Thy mission has been that of Peace—
Done not, the fruits shall come.

Soon shall we all be brother-lands,
Bound by a common tie—
Communal good, and Moloch's hands
Shall be of days gone by.

The nations rose to greet thee
From Volga to the Po.
They built thee as their common friend,
Who dared to strike the blow!

That burst the shackle, link by link,
Which chill'd the breast of Earth,
When lands were tottering to the brink
Of the most direful dearth.

Thou hast seen the vines of Coté d'Or,
The olive groves of Spain—
Italia's wealth from shore to shore,
And Poland's boundless grain:

England hath treasures great as these;
Let Commerce the scales hold
Between the nations—then wouldst see
And the true cause uphold.

IRELAND.

MELANCHOLY CATASTROPHE. The Irish papers mention the partial destruction of Lissanmore Castle, near Ballymeroy, the seat of George Macartney, Esq., which unhappily also caused the death of his wife. It appears that Mr Macartney had in one of the rooms a number of casks of gunpowder, for the use of the tenantry, in which force he held a commission. He was examining the powder, under the impression that it had caught damp, and had left Mrs Mowatt and her child in the adjoining room, at the present performances; though the latter until he could examine it outside. By what means the casualty took place may never be known; but he had scarcely left the castle when a tremendous explosion occurred, which blew the whole frontage of the mansion, and instantaneously deprived Mr. Macartney of life. The body was absolutely blown into fragments. By the decease of the lady, it is said, £5000 a-year passes from the Macartney family. Although there were a number of servants in the castle at the time of the explosion, no one was injured save their lady, they being in the wing situated at the other extremity of the building.

SPIRIT OF CLASS CONFLICT. The Clare Journal of Monday reports several cases possessing the usual features of agrarian uncivilisation and disorder. On Friday last week a man named Frawley, previously reported to have been much injured by an attack of a party who came to him on his return home from the town of Ennis, died of his wounds. The man had been engaged, by Mr. Gubbins, M.P. for Kinsale, in the service of ejectment processes, and that incurred the malice of the lacking fraternity. A verdict of "Wilful Murder" has been found against parties unknown. Several persons returning home in the evening from Ennis market have been fired at. On the night of the 11th last the greenhouse at Moyreisk, the property of Lord Fitzgerald, was broken into by some persons unknown, who destroyed the grapes and injured the vines, broke eleven panes of glass, and pointed a threatening notice on the door, warning the steward, John Finch, to leave his employments, or he would be shot. A general hostility is manifest against the enforcement of all or any demands of rent by landlords, in whatever shape they may take proceedings to gain them.

EXPLOSION IN THE COUNTY LONGFORD. Last Sunday week there was an alarming explosion near the lodge of the New Castle. Just as Mr. and Mrs Hart, man were in their carriage, on their way to Rockingham, a nice shooting box on the road-side, used as an office and a store for the men working on the river, was blown to atoms. The walls, with the exception of one gable, were torn from their foundation. The check clerk, Mr. Richard Butler, was blown through the door, and miserably scorched and bruised. A man of the name of Lones and his wife were dreadfully hurt, and also their infant, but no lives lost. There were on the loft 18 barrels of gunpowder, containing 2381bs each.

THE FENIANS OF THE NOE. Last week, a meeting of magistrates of the county of Limerick was held at Cashel, to consider the course necessary to be pursued in consequence of the dreadful murder of the late William Roe, Esq. The meeting was numerously attended by the magistrates of the South Riding. Lord Viscount Suirdale explained the object of the meeting, and remarked that Mr. Roe had, during the last period of his life, made every exertion that it could be possible for him, to alleviate the distress of his dependents, and the poor in general in his neighbourhood. He established, at his own expense, a Kitchen for the purpose of providing food for the destitute, which was conducted in the most judicious manner. He caught fever from coming in contact with the poor. Lord Glengall next bore testimony to Mr. Roe's character, than whom there did not exist a more upright, charitable, benevolent, a more gentlemanlike, and, in every respect, a more praiseworthy man. His Lordship proposed a memorial to be adopted by the meeting to his Excellency the Earl of Clarendon, detailing the facts of the murder, the amiable character of Mr. Roe, his unbounded charity, tenantry, and remission of rents on his lands, and proving that great insecurity to life and property arises from the indiscriminate possession and use of fire-arms by the very lowest class of the population. Lord Hawarden seconded the address, which was unanimously adopted. A subscription was then entered into as a reward for bringing to justice and apprehension the murderer or murderers of Mr. Roe

COMMERCIAL AFFAIRS ON THE CONTINENT.—It is a remarkable fact that while nearly all the markets of Europe are suffering from the financial crisis, and while there are fresh failures in London almost every day, the quarterly pay-days appear to have been declared on the Exchange at Amsterdam. Letters from Hamburgh say that an unexampled panic prevailed in all the Hanseatic Towns. By the English failures alone the merchants of that city have lost more than 150,000,000 marks banco. At Berlin one of the first commercial houses has been obliged to stop payment, and the countenancing influence is felt in all the northern cities of Germany. At Brussels also a house of note has stopped payment.

THE NEW STREET CAB.—On Wednesday, several of the new patent cabs commenced running; they are of a superior description to the generality of hansom cabs, having similar in appearance to a private clarence carriage, only much lighter. They are drawn by one horse, and each vehicle is fitted with the patent odometer, having a dial plate inside the carriage by which a passenger can the mediately ascertain the distance he has travelled. The index is worked by the near hind wheel; and the apparatus, which is extremely simple and not likely to get out of order, occupies very little room, and, but for the dial-plate, would not be perceived.

THE RECENT POISONINGS IN THE ISLE OF ELY.—The inquiry into the mysterious case of poisoning in the Isle of Ely, was resumed on Wednesday, at Manea, before Mr. Pratt. The investigation was a very protracted one, the principal evidence being that of Mrs. Young and her husband, who both proved the finding of a paper containing a white substance like arsenic near the fireplace, which Barnes, the mother-in-law, caused to be burnt. There was much recrimination between the old woman and these two witnesses. The medical evidence was again repeated, and, at half-past eleven at night, the following verdict was returned, namely: "That the three deceased children, Eliza Hardley, Whitewell Ardley, and Mary Ann Young, died of the administration of arsenic by some person or persons unknown."

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—Although the arrivals of English wheat coastwise during the present week—viz., 5006 quarters—have been tolerably good, the show of samples here to-day was small, nevertheless the demand for all descriptions was in a very depressed state, and, to effect sales, lower prices must have been submitted to. Upwards of 43,300 quarters of foreign wheat have come to hand since Monday last. The large supply and a very dispiriting influence on the demand, and the quotations receded 1s per quarter. Most of the supply of barley has been taken by the maltsters and others, at Monday's quotations. Superfine malt was likewise in very limited request, at late prices. The value of grinding barley has scarcely been supported. The oat trade was very dull, and the inferior parcels of foreign were 6d per quarter cheaper. Beans and peas supported late rates, but no other articles were in very active inquiry.

ARRIVALS.—English (per coast), wheat, 1080 quarters; barley, 1910; oats, 1830. Irish: Wheat 640, barley,—; malt,—; oats, 1000. Foreign: Wheat, 43,770; barley, 4990; malt, —; oats, 4250. Flour: 2310 sacks, 4310 barrels.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 50s to 57s, ditto white, 56s to 63s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 50s to 57s, ditto white, 53s to 58s; rye, 34s to 36s; grinding barley, 23s to 30s; distilling, 30s to 32s; malting ditto, 32s to 37s; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 65s to 68s; brown ditto, —s to —s. Kingston and Ware.—Chevalier, 65s to 69s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 19s to 23s; potato ditto, 22s to 26s; Scotch ditto, 23s to 26s; Irish ditto, 20s to 22s; tick beans, new, 37s to 40s, ditto old, 41s to 46s, grey peas, 44s to 47s, maple ditto, 47s to 49s, white, 46s to 48s; bollers, 49s to 53s, per quarter. Town-made flour, 44s per sack. Suffolk, 38s to 40s. Shropshire and Yorkshire, 38s to 42s per 280lbs. Foreign.—Dantzic and Konigsberg wheat, 54s to 58s; Barley,—s to —s; brank,—s to —s; beans and peas,—s to —s per quarter. Flour, American, 34s to 38s per barrel; Baltic, —s to —s per sack.

The Seed Market.—For all kinds of seeds—the supplies of which on offer are tolerably good—we have to report a very unsettled demand, at almost nominal currencies

Linseed, English, sowing, 46s to 48s per qr.; Baltic, 42s to 44s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 42s to 45s. Hempseed, 35s to 38s per quarter. Coriander, 16s to 21s per cwt. Turnip Rape seed, 34s to 38s; White ditto, 37s to 40s. Carraway, 28s to 30s per cwt. Brown Rape seed (new) 23s to 25s per last of 10 quarters. Linseed cakes English, £13 to £13 10s; ditto foreign, £9 5s to £10 5s per 1000. Rapeseed cakes, £6 10s to £6 15s per tun. Canary, 64s to 68s per quarter. English Clover-seed, red,—s to —s extra.—s to —s; white,—s to —s; extra up to —s. Flanders ditto,—s to —s extra.—s to —s; white,—s to —s; extra,—s per cwt. Essences.—The prices of wanders tread in the Metropolis are from 7½d to 8d; of household ditto, 6d to 7d per 4 lbs loaf.

The Corn Trade of Liverpool.—Wheat, 54s 2d; barley, 33s 4d; oats, 22s 11d; rye, 34s 2d; beans, 37s 2d; peas, 44s 6d.

The Provincial Markets.—Wheat, 53s 8d; barley, 33s 11d; oats, 22s 8d; rye, 32s 8d; beans, 43s 2d.

This animated statement was very dull, and to effect sales, lower prices must be submitted to by importers. The deliveries are by no means large

For all kinds of fine meats, we have again to report a dull inquiry, on somewhat lower terms. Brown lumps are selling at 58s 6d; and standard ditto, 55s 6d per cwt.

Coffee.—Ceylon qualities have fallen from 2s to 2s per cwt. All other kinds of coffee are nearly dead and easier to purchase.

Rice.—Such parcels as are fit for sale, are steady.

Provisions.—The best qualities of Irish butter are in moderate request, at about last week's prices; but the middling and inferior sorts are 2s to 3s per cwt. lower. Choice Limerick, Waterford and Limerick, selling at 90s to 96s; Cork, 92s to 96s; Waterford and Limerick, 84s to 88s; and Sligo, 87s to 88s per cwt. Of foreign there is nothing doing. Bacon is dull, and 2s to 3s per cwt. lower. Fine Dorset, 46s to 48s; middling ditto, 42s to 44s per cwt. The arrivals of Irish bacon are small, yet the demand for that article is very languid, at barely stationary prices. Irish, 42s to 44s per cwt.; Waterford, 42s to 44s; and old parcels, 40s to 42s per cwt. Prime bladebone and sprats, and quite as dear. In other kinds of provisions a moderate business is doing, at full prices.

Tallow.—This market is quiet, at 46s 3d to 46s 6d for P.Y.C., on the spot, and 45s 9d to 46s for delivery all the year. Town tallow is 46s per cwt.

Oils.—For all kinds of oil, except cocoa-nut, which is £10 per tun dearer, we have to report a heavy inquiry, at barely late rates.

Spirits.—The rum market is very dull, at further depressed rates. There is a fair supply of West India on offer, at from 1s 8d to 1s 7d for low to fine. Scotch and Irish malt, distilled, is 5d per proof gallon. Brandy has declined 2d per gallon. In corn spirits we have no alteration to report.

Hay and Straw.—Old meadow hay, £3 3s to £3 18s; new ditto £2 8s to £3 8s; old clover, £4 3s to £5 5s; new ditto, £3 12s to £4 10s, and straw, £1 8s to £1 14s per load.

Wool.—As the buyers are operating with extreme caution, the public sales of colonial wools, at which about 20,000 bales will be offered, the demand by private contract is heavy, at barely last week's quotations.

The supplies of potatoes continue good, and the demand is somewhat inactive, at from 80s to 110s per ton.

Friday.—Stewart's, 23s; Lambton, 22s 6d; Gosforth, 21s 6d; Wylam, 18s 3d; Hastings, 18s 6d; Walker, 18s 6d; Hetton, 18s 6d; Haswell, 18s 6d; Kelloe, 18s 6d; Belmont, 18s 6d; Eden, 18s 6d; Tanfield Moor, 18s 6d; Tanfield Lea, 18s 6d; Russell's Hetton, 18s 6d; Braddyll's Hetton, 18s 6d; Adelaide, 18s 6d; Harton, 18s 6d; Hartley, 18s 6d; Seaton Delaval, 18s 6d; Seaton Carew, 18s 6d; Tees, 18s 6d; Wear Clavering, 18s 6d; Tyne Main, 18s 6d; Tyne Hetton, 18s 6d; Tyne Wallsend, 18s 6d; Tyne Percy Main, 18s 6d; Tyne Hartley, 18s 6d; Tyne Seaton Delaval, 18s 6d; Tyne Seaton Carew, 18s 6d; Tyne Tees, 18s 6d; Tyne Wear Clavering, 18s 6d; Tyne Wear Main, 18s 6d; Tyne Wear Hetton, 18s 6d; Tyne Wear Wallsend, 18s 6d; Tyne Wear Percy Main, 18s 6d; Tyne Wear Hartley, 18s 6d; Tyne Wear Seaton Delaval, 18s 6d; Tyne Wear Seaton Carew, 18s 6d; Tyne Wear Tees, 18s 6d; Tyne Wear Wear Clavering, 18s 6d; Tyne Wear Wear Main, 18s 6d; Tyne Wear Wear Hetton, 18s 6d; Tyne Wear Wear Wallsend, 18s 6d; Tyne Wear Wear Percy Main, 18s 6d; Tyne Wear Wear Hartley, 18s 6d; LANDSCAPE GARDENING.—J. MAJOR and SON, Professors of Landscape Gardening, beg most respectfully to suggest to those Noblemen and Gentlemen who purpose employing Artists to lay out their Grounds, the propriety of consulting them at the same time with the Architect: for, prior to this, the site for a house, it is unquestionably the business of the Landscape Gardener, after carefully studying the nature of the ground, and the combinations of the surrounding scenery, to point out not only the best views, but the best approach, and consequently the principal entrances to the house. The expense of this most necessary preamble has too often, in J. M. and Son's experience, been attended with most serious inconvenience and considerable expense. In some instances the approach has been obliged to pass through and therefore ruin the appearance of the pleasure ground, and disturb the privacy of the living rooms, and in others the kitchen garden, stables, and out-offices, have been garishly prominent: all which nuisances might have been avoided by an earlier consultation with the Landscape Gardener. J. M. and Son wrote more at large on this subject some years ago, and if any may feel disposed to peruse the same, a number of instances in which they have since been consulted either along with the Architect, or prior to [illegible]

THE TEA ESTABLISHMENT,
NO. 8, LUDGATE-HILL.
LONDON, OCTOBER 15TH, 1847
We never remember or the Finest Tea so cheap as at the present moment
We have this day made the extensive purchases of the finest importations of Black and Green Teas, from fourpence to sixpence below what the same parcels sold at only four months ago
The ruinous loss is attended with most extensive results to the Merchants; but the public to this extent are gainers.—that they may now purchase a Single Pound of Tea at our Establishment in London Cheaper than the importer can buy his thousand chests at Canton
The system of our business has been uniform.
We have ever been actuated by the principles of FAIR DEALING, I meeting the utmost reimbursements of Profit, and never by Extortion. This charge has been so frequently and unjustly made, and we gratefully acknowledge a large share of confidence and patronage.
We especially invite attention to the Remarkably Fine Black Tea, which we are charging only Four Shillings per Pound. Very Choice Gunpowder at Five Shillings and Fourpence, and Refined Sugar at Fivepence Halfpenny
The importation of COFFEE is very large, the qualities Very Good, and the Prices TREMELY LOW.

THE PANIC.

DEPUTATION TO THE MINISTER.

THE DEPUTATION.

The Minister sits with his brow encapt
With the gloomy crown of Care,
And listens with dread to the evil tread
Of "Panic" on the stair!
Anon the hand of a victim band
Hath raised his knocker's din;
And his sad eyes droop to the Merchant troop
Whom his voice hath summon'd in!

He listens then to the failing men—
"May nothing, Sir, be done?
Though Discount kills Exchequer Bills,
With the funds at 81?"
But the Merchant crowd remonstrate loud
In vain of their ruination;
All the Minister's scope is—one word of hope,
And a bow to the Deputation

THE BILL DISCOUNTER.

Here is a man, whose pocket-book,
Once lined with golden fleece,
Now wears the blank and naked look—
Bills! Bills! and no release!
Panic, with Discount on his back,
Comes climbing to his brow;
Poor Bill discounter! He, alack!
Is at a discount now!

The Bank, unmoved, folds Six per Cent.
Around him like a pall;
The private banks assail his flanks
With No per Cent. at all;
Their wants of cash on all men flash,
While this poor luckless elf
Is told his bills cannot be done,
Tho' he is done himself!

THE CITY ATTORNEY.

The City Attorney can scarcely complain
That the times are uncommonly dull;
For with Panic for plaintiff, and Ruin to reign,
His hands are unusually full!

Common Law may be slow—even Equity low—
And Conveyancing stupidly short;
But with failure each minute, the dickens is in it
If he fails in the Bankruptcy Court.

THE CORN SPECULATOR.

"Lay not your treasures up on Earth."
This was a mandate given—
The Soul of Love should hoard above,
And seek its wealth in Heaven!
Bar not the food gates of the Poor—
With greedy, grasping hand—
Lest that high Heaven unbar the door,
And corn sow all the land.

If there be failure where the Staff
Of Life has been restrained,
At those who fail men neither laugh
Nor weep they have not gained!
But deem the Corn-Miser has paid
To Justice a due debt!
When Panic guides him from the Grain,
And gulphs in the Gazette!

"MORE RAILWAY CALLS."

More Railway Calls!—the fever burns,
And riots in blood heat;
More outlay! outlay! no returns!
The Panic brings the treat!

These shares are ploughshares; for they plough
Through every mortal's purse—
The funds become no better, now,
But the Railway Calls are worse!

"You have a hundred in the funds,
Worth eighty to sell out!—
Sell out, and pay your Railway Calls,
For so you must, no doubt."

Twenty, of course, you make of loss
In funded money spent:
Alas! when will your Railway Calls
Return as much per cent?

THE LIVERPOOL DEPUTATION.

THE Liverpool Deputation that waited on Lord John Russell, to urge him to do something to relieve the present pressure, has only furnished another proof of the inutility of such applications. The history of all of them is the same. They are received with the utmost courtesy, heard with official politeness, a slight expression of incredulity as to the extent of the peril is made by the hopeful Minister; and, with an assurance that the Government can do nothing, the Bankers, Merchants, and Manufacturers are bowed out, leaving the matter to the "most careful consideration" of those who have already said they are powerless; so, what the consideration will come to is easy to predict. This scene is so often repeated, and, in every particular, is so exactly the same at each repetition, that it begins to look somewhat ridiculous for men of business to waste their time by going through a process that ends in nothing. We cannot recall any one instance in which the reply of the Government was not this—that it could do nothing. Hearing it so often repeated really induces men to ask the question—what are the functions and duties of a Government? Is it a real power or a nullity? In all cases of difficulty to hear continually the same abdication of influence, is really discouraging. If the same principle were acted on in all the affairs of life the world would soon be unpeopled. Is a disease left to ravage unchecked? No: physicians do not sit down and say they can do nothing. We do not allow fires to burn themselves out, but provide an organized brigade of firemen and sufficient engines to quench them forthwith.

Men cannot altogether prevent calamities occurring; but a listless abandonment of all action and energy when evils do occur exposes them to contempt. Yet, of late years, passiveness and inaction have been actually elevated into a principle of Government—just as if the steersman ought to give up the helm the moment the tempest becomes formidable. Timidity and a reluctance to step out of the old course of routine is the vice of modern statesmen—the more dangerous because in accordance with an abstract principle that is a safe one in a natural and healthy order of things, but cannot be adhered to in an emergency. It will be an unfortunate thing for the Whigs, if they continually let pass every opportunity of acting with effect. The name of Sir Robert Peel is rapidly becoming the only one connected with a positive policy; men may differ as to its wisdom, but all must admit that he acts—he does something. The Whigs, with opinions and principles quite level with the age, in some things in advance of it, by a seeming fatality, always suffer their opponents to get before them in carrying them into practice. In the present instance, they will not suspend the operations of those Railway Companies that are declaring legal war against the shareholders, extorting money from them by a process equivalent to the pincers and thumb-screws of ancient times, and impeding all other business: if there be any money in any one's pocket, the chances are that some Railway has the first lien on it. For the last two years the Government and the Legislature have been warned that they were sanctioning more railway bills than the country could find money for; yet they were passed; and, now the mischief is visible, the Power that created the gold-absorbing monsters, will not suspend their ravages, as it might almost by a word.

The Liverpool Deputation, knowing that the present pressure is in a great degree caused by a want of confidence, ask the Government to influence public opinion, by some declaration that it will be prepared to act, if the pressure becomes greater; no, the Government will make no promise. It is suggested by Mr. W. Brown, one of the greatest merchants in the world, that an issue of Exchequer Bills, on the security of Consols and produce, would be a palliative; the Chancellor of the Exchequer does not think it would do. In 1825, an issue of notes, to the amount of five millions, it is stated, restored confidence; could not the Government authorise the Bank to make an issue of notes "on Government securities and East India Stock and Bonds, for a period of six months, at the rate of six per cent.?" No, says Lord John Russell; that was legal in 1825, but now the law is altered; it cannot be done. The inference is that, if we were in 1825, he might try it; but, as it happens to be 1847, it is impossible; a restrictive law has been passed in the interval.

This reply is a perfect illustration of that defect which we have stated as paralysing the efforts of the present race of statesmen. We apprehend that the very duties and functions of a statesman are wisely to depart from, and suspend the action of, laws that become perilous and oppressive. His should be the intellect that can rise above the letter of the Statute Book, when "the letter killeth." If the course suggested is a sound one, the fact that the last Bank Act prevents its being adopted forthwith is a very slight obstacle; the mere intimation that a short bill would be passed in the first days of the Session, "to amend so much of an Act as relates to," &c., would have a great effect; or the still bolder step would be for the Treasury to give the authority to the Bank to make an issue, and trust to an indemnity for over-riding the Act of Parliament. Pitt, in the present position of affairs, would do it without a moment's hesitation; at no period of his career—which was almost a continual crisis of twenty years—did he sit down, and "let things take their course"—the refuge of weakness or fear. It is a dreadful error for a country to suppose that a Government can do everything for it; but it is no less fatal in a Government to think it can do nothing. If that be all statesmen are fit for, we might as well be governed by idiots and imbeciles.

Chancellors of the Exchequer are generally men of very sanguine disposition: they always hope the best; they can seldom be brought to avow any great degree of apprehension, even in the most gloomy state of affairs; financially speaking, they are "jolly" under circumstances the most discouraging. The flourishing picture which the present Earl of Ripon once drew of public affairs at one particular period of his official life, fixed on him the not yet forgotten name of "Prosperity Robinson." Everything that can or does happen, may be interpreted by a Minister of this cheerful temperament into a sign of well-being. We are making large imports of corn? It is fortunate for us that other nations have a surplus to send us. Is gold leaving the country? How lucky it is we have got it to spare. If there is a decrease in some branch of the revenue, there cannot fail to be a large increase in it in the next quarter. If there is an increase, we are congratulated on the improved condition of the people, indicated by the "increased consumption of taxed articles." Can a people be other than happy that absorbs such vast quantities of beer and spirits, and uses so much sugar to its coffee? Such is the general tone of the speeches of Chancellors of the Exchequer. They confront a deficiency with such a stock of hope, and open a loan with such a charming confidence in "the resources of the country," that deficiencies and debt almost seem to lose the character of misfortunes; they become mere "financial operations"—a term that disguises the harsh fact, that to the amount of the debt incurred the industry of all future generations is mortgaged; that the people must pay more; that life is rendered by so much more difficult, and a greater struggle to all.

Sir Charles Wood inherits this official capacity of carrying "smiles and sunshine in his face." He cannot bring himself to believe things are so bad; that the bankers are exchanging; that is quite sure that credit is still possible to the "best houses;" and altogether he exhibits such a cheerful spirit, contrasting so greatly with the tone of feeling out of doors, that the Deputation begin to suspect it is fostered to some extent by imperfect acquaintance with the real state of the case—at least the Liverpool gentlemen say as much. They think Sir Charles Wood, "up to the present time," has "not been sufficiently impressed" with the very serious condition of matters. We can imagine that the statements of the Deputation must have damped the Ministerial cheerfulness considerably. Of course it is not intended to charge Sir Charles Wood with ignorance of the position of the country, or with incapacity; but there really may be much with which a Minister, from his position, is imperfectly acquainted. We have often observed how incomplete is the information which the head of a department is supplied by his subordinates; we have seen a Secretary of State defend an official from charges of misconduct, and deny the possibility of them, though they were afterwards clearly proved. It is only when the Minister comes in contact with unofficial men, the suffering public, as they were represented by the Liverpool Deputation, that he becomes fully informed; and then the truth may be so much worse than he believed, that a little incredulity is quite natural. But it is strange that some such reflection as this does not cross the mind of a Minister so situated; "these men evidently know the extent of the evil better than I do. Is it not just possible their suggestions of the remedy might be worth trying?" No; the Minister lacks the courage to adopt what matured experience advises; "nothing can be done;" the "national agony" must be left to its natural termination; the fire must burn itself out; we cannot bring ourselves to believe that this is statesmanlike.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, October 19.

During the whole of last week the affairs of Switzerland have been the main battle-field of our press. All the Opposition papers commented with much acrimony upon the recent sale of arms and war ammunition to the Canton of Friburg. In answer to their accusations, the Débats maintained that the State had always been empowered by the law to sell such arms as had been thrown out of use, or whoever was disposed to buy them; that it had lately made over to the Pope 10,000 muskets, and about as many to the cities of Bologna and Ancona; and that it had no reason whatever to insult the Canton of Friburg, by denying them the 6000 muskets, two howitzers, and two mortars, they had applied to purchase. The Débats argued, besides, that the French Government was perfectly free to show its partiality to the Sonderbund; and, from its own avowal, it is not to be doubted that our Cabinet is formally decided, if not upon a military intervention against the Radical cantons, at any rate, upon favouring, by every indirect and diplomatical means, the resistance of the Catholic league.

It is certain now that Queen Christina set out for Spain on the 7th instant. Her departure from Paris had been surrounded by much mystery. Whilst she was leaving on Thursday, it was given out that she would hold a reception in the Rue de Courcelles on Saturday; and the guard, which is only mounted at the gate of her hotel when she is in town, was even left there up to the 10th. Do as days ago a rather exigeante person had the wonderful goodness to affect that the nomination of M. de Bacourt to the post of French Ambassador to the Court of Spain, had been made under the same Anglo-Russian influence that, in 1844, decided the expulsion of Mr Bulwer from Madrid. Queen Pomare, of course, the person hinted at; and the imagination of some ultra-Radical circles goes even to the angel of pretending that both Mr. Bulwer and M. de Bacourt are instructed to kill up a new "cordial understanding" the object of which are to be the abdication of Queen Isabella, the accession of the Duchess of Montpensier to the Spanish Throne, with the assent of Lord Palmerston, and the cession to England of Sicily or Malta. Quite seriously it is affirmed that M. de Bacourt hesitates to repair to Madrid, owing to the difficulties he expects for his diplomacy. Baron Billing, Minister Plenipotentiary of France at the Court of Denmark, is appointed Minister to the Germanic Diet, in place of M. de Chasseloup Laubat, deceased. Leave of absence for six months has just been accorded to Count Reynerval, French Chargé d'Affaires at St. Petersburg. M. Mercier, Secretary of Embassy, will represent Count Rossi during that time. M. Staples, the new Consul of the United States at Havre, where he is to succeed the late M. Bowley, arrived on Saturday at his destination in the American packet the New York. Captain Baudin, of the navy, has been promoted to the government of Senegal, left vacant by the death of M. Bourdon Gramont. We read in the Semaine that an important measure, carefully studied by the late Governor Bouet-Willaumez, is likely to be carried into execution. It consists in the occupation of Cape Verd and the tract of lands extending from the Fleuve des Mamelles to Cape Bernard. The concession of this territory, which has never been a matter of dispute, was made to France by three treaties, passed in 1763, 1765, and 1787, with the Damel, or Sovereign of Kaylor. It is stated that, in virtue of the new treaty between France and Persia, a French Consul is to be established at Tauris, besides the two Vice-Consuls, one at Chiraz, and the other at Sender-Bouchir. A Royal Ordinance has been issued prescribing the publication of a convention concluded on August 31, between France and the free town of Lubeck, for the reciprocal extradition of malefactors.

From an official return recently published by the Moniteur, it appears that the receipts arising from the indirect revenue and taxes for the last nine months, present but an immaterial decrease of about 2,500,000 francs compared with those of the corresponding months of 1846. If compared with 1845, there is an increase of 10,000,000 francs.

We learn from the Toulonnais, that the Prince of Joinville arrived at Toulon on the 10th, and embarked in haste, on board the steam-frigate the Cacique, to meet the Mediterranean squadron, which he fell in with off the Isles of Hyères, in the night of the 11th. On the 13th, the squadron under weigh stood out to sea. The three men of war, the Friedland, the Souverain, and the Océan, have orders to sail for Spezzia; the Jupiter for Leghorn, and the Jena for Genoa. Several steamers, and among them the Veuban, a frigate of 500 horse-power, will join the squadron, which is not even expected to return to France for wintering. Meanwhile, the steam corvette, La Titan, with the Prince of Joinville on board, entered again the Toulon harbour, on the 14th, in company of the steam-frigates, the Asmodée, the Cacique, and the Panama. All these steamers have put in to renew their fuel and provisions. It is reported that they are to remain under the orders and command of his Royal Highness; but for what part of the coast of Italy they are to steer is not yet known. It is stated in the Semaine, that, in consequence of the nomination of the Duke of Aumale as Governor-General of our African possessions, the agents of several foreign Powers at Algiers are going to take the title of Consuls General Chargés d'Affaires to the Government of Algeria. The similarity of this denomination with that of the Consuls in Egypt and Tunis, is interpreted by the Semaine into an intention of promoting the new Governor-General to something like a Viceroyalty. Within the last few days the rumour was generally current that M. Guizot had made up his mind to retire, but that nothing was spared to coax him out of his resolution, as his resignation could not but cause much embarrassment to the cabinet. It is added that his motives for retiring have no connexion with politics, or, at least, that he pretexted only his want of enjoying some repose. The Union Monarchique professes to know, from good authority, that an offer of the peerage had been several times made to the Duke d'Isly, but constantly declined. The Ministry are hoping his independence for the next session. M. Thiers is said to be greatly in favour of the opinion of Marshal Bugeaud, who highly disapproves of the nomination of the Duke of Aumale to the Government of Algeria. Notwithstanding a formal provision in the law for the fortifications of Paris, which declares that they shall not be armed without a special decision of the Chambers, the Patrie affirms that guns and gun-carriages in great number are brought from the arsenals at Metz, and transferred to the vaults of the detached forts.

Lieutenant-General Rerthezène, Peer of France, and formerly Governor-General of Algeria, died on the 8th, aged 73. The latest letters from St. Amans bring us notice that Marshal Soult, who had been attacked with a dangerous indisposition, is now so far recovered as to have resumed his ordinary walks. M. de Zumbolstand and Lord Brougham arrived on the 14th in Paris.

A General Meeting of the Shareholders of the Lyons to Avignon Railway, was held on the 11th in the former town, and, after very sharp discussion, the resolution came to was to wind up the affairs of the Company on November 30. If the cautious money is paid back by the Government the Shareholders will retire without any loss. It is the contrary event, which is more probable, they will lose from 30 to 35f. per share.

The bridge of the Boulogne Railway, at Etapes, has partially given way, owing to the wooden centerings having been removed from three of its arches. The vaults will have to be constructed anew, but the repairs will be easily complet ed by November 15, the period fixed for the opening of the section from Abbeville to Neile. The damage, which will fall on the contractors, is not estimated to exceed 30,000f. The Ministerial authorisation has been received at Marseilles for the inauguration of part of the railroad from Avignon. From Havre we have accounts of the opening of the Dunkerque Basin, the locks of which were no sooner unclosed than the splendid steamer the New York, of the Transatlantic Company, entered with perfect ease and was brought to her mooring up to the quay. Some months ago the Grand Boudry constructed, for the navigation of the Rhone, a steamboat, about 300 feet in length by 26 in breadth (7 metres) and of 400 tons burthen, with an engine of 260 horse power. For three months this bulky construction has been plying on the Rhone, and five other vessels, on the same model, are on the eve of being launched, three of which will exceed the former one by 70 feet in length, and have a steam engine of 320 horse power. The success of these constructions is referred to their tubular boilers, the same system which had been adopted for the Comte d'Eu, where its mismanagement resulted in such fatal consequences.

Of all the Opposition papers, there are none certainly that the Cabinet wants more particularly to crush than the Courrier Français, the Réforme, and the Gazette de France; and they do not seem to have more mercy to expect from the Jury of the Seine. Heavy condemnations have lately passed upon the Réforme and Gazette de France. As to the Courrier Français, its responsible editor, M. de Vresse, who appeared on the 13th to plead in arrest of the judgment lately pronounced against him, in default of appearance, for a libel upon M. Dumon and his son-in-law, was again declared guilty, and sentenced to six months' imprisonment, and to pay a fine of 6,000 francs, besides all the costs of the proceedings

M. Beauvallon has appealed to the Court of Cessation against the sentence of the Assizes, condemning him to eight years' reclusion. The appeal of M. d'Ecquerlby to the same Court has just been rejected.

Sixteen individuals, calling themselves Communists, were sentenced on Saturday to several terms of imprisonment (from four years to six months), for forming an illegal association, and possessing munitions of war. Among the charges brought home to them was that of having concocted a number of fulminating bombs, calculated to set on fire everything within their reach. With these infernal machines, it seems, the prisoners hoped to cause such destruction and terror as should enable them to overthrow the Government.

A most interesting exhibition is now open at the Pantheon. In 1835, M. Thiers, then at the head of the Government of the day, commissioned Mrs. Paul and Raymond Balze to copy, for the French Government, the whole series of Raphael's "Loggie," and eight of the large compositions in the "Stanze," namely—that "Fire at the Borgo," the "Interpretament of St. Peter," the "Miracle at Bossena," the "Parnassus," the "Dispute of the Sacrament," the "Heliodorus," the "Attila," and the "School of Athens." After ten years' perseverance, the brothers Balze have brought to a close their long labours, for which they have received a sum of 200,000 francs. Their copies, which are provisionally exhibited in the Pantheon, are perhaps somewhat flat and dry, but they are unexceptionable in point of design, and as true to the general character of Raphael's style as might have been reasonably expected. Previously to ordering these reproductions, our Government had given the Baron Sigalon, a commission to copy the "Last Judgment," and the "Prophets and Sybils of the Sextine Chapel." The "Judgment" is now at the Ecole des Beaux Arts; and the "Twelve Prophets, or Sybils," which, on the death of Sigalon, were continued by M. Numa, have been added to the Pantheon exhibition, of which they are not the weakest portion.

No novelty of importance has made its appearance at our theatres; but the Français, which reopens its doors to-night, enters upon its new campaign with a rich store of tragedies and comedies, among which are mentioned "Les Aristocrates," a five act comedy, by Etienne Arago; "Cléopatre," a tragedy, by Madame de Girardin; the "Puff," a five act comedy and a tragedy by Scribe.

SPAIN.

The Journal des Débats, which has an intimate knowledge of what is going on in Spain, mentions three important facts, which appear to be confirmed, viz., the reconciliation of the King and Queen, the departure of General Serrano on a most affectionate interview between Queen Christina and her daughter. Queen Isabella had consented on the 12th to the return of the King Don Francisco d'Assis to the Palace. The Queen Mother, who was instrumental in effecting the reconciliation, having obtained the authorization of her Majesty, had immediately convoked the Council of Ministers, to communicate to them that act of her Royal will. The meeting was appointed for the evening of the 13th to the Pardo, to announce himself to the King that fortunate event.

Queen Maria Christina arrived at Madrid at five o'clock A.M., on the 14th, accompanied by the Duke de Rianzares and a single servant. Her Majesty performed the journey from Paris in four days and a half. At one o'clock the Queen Mother repaired to the Palace, with the Duke de Rianzares and General Narvaez, and at three o'clock the conference with her daughter was not yet over. The King was not present at it
